Sir, what, let me ask, is after all the real character and object of this proceeding? The alleged technical violation of the tenure-of-office law is the pretext. The pretext is both frivolous and false. The cause for the attempted removal of the President, elected by the people, in the interest of a successor who has been repudiated by the people, is manifest from the history of the impeachment movement from its inception in the Wade and Davis manifesto to the present hour. It is nothing more nor less than the adoption and practice of a policy of administration which is supported by one and opposed by the other of the great political parties into which the people of this country are mainly divided. This is the case of a political prosecution for political offenses and for a partisan purpose. The object is, in reality, not to punish a criminal but to remove an obstacle. The design is not to vindicate justice but to grasp power.

Any party which embarks itself upon the experiment of a political prosecution as a means of getting rid of an obnoxious opponent mistakes the character of the American people. A political martyr in this country is a dangerous foe. The Senate of the United States made Martin Van Buren President by rejecting his nomination as a foreign minister. The same Senate endeavored to extinguish Andrew Jackson by a vote of censure. You know the result.

English history is crowded with such lessons. Some of them are quaintly summed up in the famous speech of Lord Carnarvon on the impeachment of the Earl of Danby. Carnarvon said:

"My lords, I understand but little of Latin, but a good deal of English, and not a little of English history, from which I have learned the mischiefs of such kind of prosecutions as these, and the ill-fate of the prosecutors. I could bring many instances, and those ancient; but, my lords, I shall go no further than the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, at which time the Earl of Essex was run down by Sir Walter Raleigh. My Lord Bacon he ran down Sir Walter Raleigh, and your lordships know what became of my Lord Bacon. The Duke of Buckingham he ran down my Lord Bacon, and your lordships know what happened to the Duke of Buckingham. Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterward Earl of Strafford, ran down the Duke of Buckingham, and you all know what became of him. Sir Harry Vane, he ran down the Earl of Strafford, and your lordships know what became of Sir Harry Vane. Chancellor Hyde Lord Clarendon ran down Sir Harry Vane, and your lordships know what became of the Chancellor. Sir Thomas Osborne, now Earl of Danby, ran down Chancellor Hyde, but what will come of the Earl of Danby your lordships best can tell. But let me see that man that dare run the Earl of Danby down and we shall soon see what will become of him."

A great deal has been said about the usurpations of Andrew Johnson, and the danger of his becoming a tyrant. This is the old story of the wolf, the muddy water, and the lamb. It is the detected pickpocket crying "stop thief!" Under the arrangement of powers in the Federal Constitution, the Executive is so limited that danger to our liberties can never arise from that quarter unless the President should accomplish his designs in the name and as the tool of Congress. But no Executive who is not the mere creature of a factious Congress, no Executive who is watched and thwarted by a hostile Congress, no matter how ambitious of aggrandizement, can possibly encroach either upon the lawful domain of the legislative branch, or upon the liberties of the people. Congress has the President under constant control through their command of the sources and resources of his power. Lying, as it does, between each of the other departments and the people themselves, Congress has its powerful hand at all times upon the lever which can put in motion or bring to a dead stand the whole machinery of administration. The sages, whose authority we are accustomed to invoke, all admonish us that if the liberties of this people are ever lost, if the experiment of self-government upon this continent is destined to fail, it will be through the usurpations of a partisan Congress, countenanced by the very people they enslave.

Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, has written, as if in anticipation of the existing emergency:

"It has been remarked with equal force and sagacity that the legislative power is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex."

"There are many reasons which may be assigned for the engrossing influence of the legislative department. In the first place its constitutional powers are more extensive and less capable of being brought within precise limits than those of either of the other departments. The bounds of the executive authority are easily marked out and defined. It cannot transcend them without being brought in contact with the other departments. Laws may check and restrain and bound its exercise. The same remarks apply with still greater force to the judiciary. The jurisdiction is or may be bounded to a few objects or persons; or, however general and unlimited, its operations are necessarily confined to the mere administration of private and public justice. It cannot punish without law. It cannot create controversies to act upon. It can decide only upon rights and cases as they are brought by others before it. It can do nothing for itself. It must do everything for others. It must obey the laws, and if it corruptly administer them it is subjected to the power of impeachment."

"On the other hand, the legislative power, except in the few cases of constitutional prohibition, is unlimited. It is forever varying its means and its ends. It governs the institutions and laws and public policy of the country. It regulates all its vast interests. It disposes of all its property. Look but at the exercise of two or three branches of its ordinary powers. It levies all taxes, it directs and appropriates all supplies, it gives the rules for the descent, distribution, and devise of all property held by individuals. It changes at its will the whole fabric of the laws. It molds at its pleasure almost all the institutions which give strength and comfort and dignity to society. In the next place it is the direct, visible representative of the will of the people in all the changes of times and circumstances. It has the pride as well as the power of numbers. It is easily moved and steadily moved by the strong impulses of popular feeling and popular odium. It obeys without reluctance the wishes and the will of the majority for the time being. The path to public favor lies open by such obedience, and it finds not only support but impunity in whatever measures the majority advises, even though they transcend the constitutional limits."

"It has no motive, therefore, to be jealous or scrupulous in its own use of power, and it finds its ambition stimulated and its arm strengthened by the countenance and courage of numbers."

"These views are not alone those of men who look with apprehension upon the fate of republics, but they are also freely admitted by some of the strongest advocates for popular rights, and the permanency of republican institutions. Our domestic history furnishes abundant examples to verify these suggestions."

Stripped of all disguise, the real, and indeed only cause for the attempted removal of the constitutional obstruction, is to be found in the conflict between the executive and congressional policies of reconstruction. Briefly stated, the issue is whether white men or negroes shall control ten States, and through them the nation. Whether the deranged balance of the Government shall be restored to harmony by the restoration of all its constitutional members, or whether a party monopoly shall succeed in maintaining a permanent two-thirds control of both Houses of Congress, drawing after it an absorption of the executive and judicial powers of the Government, and a practical consolidation of all these departments in the legislative branch. No better definition of a perfect despotism has ever been given by the experience of ages and the uniform testimony of all recognized authorities than the junction of legislative, executive, and judicial power in one and the same man or body of men. Montesquieu, Blackstone, Washington, Hamilton, Madison, Story, Webster, Kent, all agree that whatever may be the nominal form of government under which this concentration is effected, whether a republic, an aristocracy, or a limited monarchy, no matter whether by a single ruler or by a multitude, from the moment the junction of power is practically accomplished there is an end of public liberty. Cruelly as mankind has suffered from the selfish ambition of solitary usurpers no more odious or fatal despotisms have cursed the race than those of insolent and irresponsible pluralities. The Decemvirs of Rome; the thirty tyrants of Athens, with their impeachment and judicial murder of Socrates; the rump Parliament of England; the Jacobin revolutionary convention of France, with its guillotines and its San Domingo, each had its carnival of brutal tyranny, and each relapsed into the milder despotism of a monarchical or imperial sovereign. This is not the place nor the occasion for bluster and bravado. If the American people, besotted with party rage, have lost the spirit and forgotten the example of their sires; if the fatal proceeding inaugurated on this, the birthday of Washington, is to be carried to consummation with the approval of a majority of the people, then, and not till then, we have an accomplished revolution, a successful rebellion against the Constitution of our country, and triumphant treason to the cause of republican liberty throughout the world.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. DEMAS BARNES,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported from the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I rise upon this solemn occasion overpowered by the responsibilities of the hour. But a few days are wanting to complete a year since the assembling of the Fortieth Congress—the most remarkable for what it has done and for what it has failed to do of any Congress since the establishment of the Government. And now, when this most important measure of any which has ever been considered by an American Congress is forced upon us—introduced at two o'clock on Saturday, to be completed at five o'clock on Monday—we are denied the poor privilege of entering our protest against its adoption. When messages and appeals are reaching us hourly to avert this act, which may precipitate us into anarchy and revolution, more than half the members of the House are unable to say one word. During the different sessions of this Congress I have been content to listen to debate upon merely political questions. I have been well content to give way to others who, by experience and wisdom, are better entitled to the attention of the House; but when such measures are brought forward as are this day thrust upon us I feel it to be my duty, to be the duty of every man, to raise his voice, however feeble, in behalf of the Constitution, in behalf of justice, in behalf of order, and in behalf of the institutions of our country.

THE EXECUTIVE AND THE CABINET.

The engrossing of the functions of the executive department of this Government by the legislative, the impeachment and overthrow of the President, the conspiracy of members and of Senators with military commanders to defy and entrap the President, involves too much that is dear to us, takes too deep a hold of the fundamental principles of our Government, and interferes with too many vested rights, to be thus summarily, flippantly, and lightly disposed of.

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Barnes.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

The President of the United States is to be deposed. For what? The subordinates through whom the President directs the Army, the Navy, and the other departments of the Government constitute his Cabinet and his advisers. When the opinions and attitude of any of the heads of Departments are in conflict with the President, when they become refractory and refuse to obey his orders, the interests of the Government suffer, and every dictate of prudence demands that this officer be dismissed, and that his place be filled by one who will obey orders, and whose views are in harmony with those of the President. The President has solemnly sworn to see that the laws be faithfully executed. Without the power of selecting subordinates and advisers how can he execute the laws?

THE PRESIDENT, CONGRESS, AND STANTON.

Relations wanting in cordiality of opinion between Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and the President have grown into utter insubordination on the part of Mr. Stanton, and caused the President to suspend him from office in September last.

Since the advent of President Johnson to office Congress has sought to tie his hands, to impair his political freedom, and to strip him of power. Among other things Congress has passed what was known as the tenure-of-office bill, which undertakes to prevent the power of removal by the President of his subordinates. A portion of the language is, "and that the Secretary of State, of the Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, and the Postmaster General, and Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." This bill was vetoed by the President as being in conflict with public interest and the Constitution. The correspondence recently published between the President and General Grant reveals the fact that every member of his Cabinet, not excepting Mr. Stanton and the Attorney General of the United States, also pronounced the bill unconstitutional. The view of the most prominent Republican Senators was, that if it restricted the President's power to regulate his own Cabinet no man with self-respect would consent to stay for a day in a family where he was not wanted.

Nevertheless, a partisan Congress passed the bill over the President's veto, and it became a law on the 2d of March, 1867. When he (Mr. Stanton) was suspended by the President he appealed to the Senate to reinstate him. The Senate, being forty-three Republicans to ten Democrats, espoused his cause and restored him to office. Had Mr. Stanton resumed the office in an unobjectionable manner that would have ended the difficulty. But he did not. He returned there as a victor, defiant in manner and insubordinate in duty. Friendly or profitable intercourse could not be resumed.

The President's orders were again disobeyed, and on the 21st instant Mr. Stanton was removed from office. The War Department building is said to have been filled with military; the door was closed against the President's acting Secretary. Simultaneous with his orders to General Thomas to act as Secretary ad interim the President communicated his action to the Senate, reserving a full statement of the reasons therefor until he had time to prepare them, with documentary evidence, &c. Upon receipt of this partial information the Senate immediately closed its doors and went into a secret session, remaining for seven and a half hours. Acting only upon partial knowledge and wild rumors, without request and without jurisdiction, a portion of the Senators sent a resolution of condemnation to the President, while another portion of the Senators and members of the House repaired to the office of Mr. Stanton, remained with him during the night, advising him to resist the President and keep his appointee out of the office.

Never was so high-handed an outrage perpetrated under a free Government in a time of peace. The Senate is the court before which the President is to be tried—one of its members succeeding to the high position of President of the United States in case of conviction. Mind you, fellow-members, the insult by Mr. Stanton to the President was not denied. The tenure-of-office bill was considered unconstitutional by the President; it had not been considered otherwise by the proper legal tribunal; the facts reciting Mr. Stanton's misdemeanors had not yet reached the Senate; yet they prejudged the case and were afterward to hear the evidence. If the participants in this revolutionary scheme have not subjected themselves to arrest there can be no such thing as encroachment upon civil liberty, and there can exist no guarantee for civil liberty for a single day.

Why, what have they done? They have openly conspired with subordinate military officers to defy the will of the President; they have resisted the President's appointees; they have prejudged a case on which they are to be the court, and in the face of the fact that the Senate has a direct personal interest in the conflict, inasmuch as it can elevate one of their own number to the position of President, and they are at this moment assisting Mr. Stanton to remain in the War Office, which he and his guards have not left night or day since the order of his dismissal.

If the tenure-of-office bill is constitutional—and I hardly think any lawyer will now claim that it is—it does not prohibit the removal of Mr. Stanton. It only prevents the President from removing his own appointees during the existing term of his office. Mr. Stanton held his place only by the sufferance of President Johnson. He never was appointed by Mr. Johnson. He was appointed by Mr. Lincoln, during Mr. Lincoln's first term, not even during the term the balance of which Mr. Johnson is now serving. There is no doubt whatever that this tenure-of-office law, if constitutional, has no jurisdiction over or application to this case. It is the President's sworn duty to see that all laws are faithfully executed. This law is in conflict with public interest and with the Constitution. The President has taken measures to have its validity tested—nothing more—although the provocation was extreme. The right to command implies the right to obey. If the President can appoint he necessarily must have the right to remove. Section two, article two, of the Constitution says:

"The President shall be the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States."

How can he be Commander-in-Chief without power to appoint and remove subordinates? The supposition is a paradox, and such a law would be a farce. Section three, article two, of the Constitution further says:

"It shall be the duty of the President to see that the laws be faithfully executed."

How can he faithfully execute laws if compelled to retain subordinates who will not obey his orders? That such a bill could have passed two Houses of Congress seems most wonderful. It only shows to what extent passion and party discipline have crowded out reflection and warped judgment.

THE MOTIVE FOR CRIME ON THE PART OF THE PRESIDENT UTTERLY WANTING.

Crime is measured by intent. What are the actual and the circumstantial evidences of crime or usurpation surrounding this action of the President, for it is the intention that is to be punished. No man asserts or thinks public injury can follow the removal of Edwin M. Stanton.

The President has satisfied every impartial mind that Mr. Stanton is wanting in the elements of modesty, courtesy, and obedience, and that he ought not to have occupied his position as long as he did.

The President has sent prompt and good reasons to the Senate, he has employed no force, he has simply expressed his wish to conduct the affairs of the Department for the public interest; he has not filled the vacancy by an untrustworthy successor, but has this day nominated to that position Hon. Thomas Ewing, a man whose whole life and every part of it is a guarantee that the office in his hands would be as safe as if in the hands of George Washington.

The precedents of all other Administrations give indorsements to what the President has done—the Constitution justifies, the public good demands it. The law which the President is arraigned for having violated has been pronounced unconstitutional by all authorities who have voted upon it. The section applying to this removal has no application, Mr. Stanton not having been appointed by the President. Do these facts look like usurpation, like crime? Section four of the Constitution provides—

"That the President shall be removed from office upon trial for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Is this act of the President in removing a refractory and disobedient servant, and nominating to his place, subject to the approval of the Senate, one of the first citizens of the United States, high crime? Is it a misdemeanor? Does not this whole proceeding develop designs, intentions, and reasons still sought to be hid from the public eye, and not intended for the public good? The construction of the Constitution in our day is well understood.

THE OPINION OF THE FRAMERS OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Let us see what was the construction of its framers. In the Convention of 1787 Mr. Madison said:

"A dependence of the executive on the legislative department would render the legislative the executor as well as the maker of the law. It is essential that the appointments of the executive should be drawn from some source, and be held by a tenure independent of the legislative. A coalition of these two powers would be dangerous to public liberty."

Gouverneur Morris said:

"The Legislature will seek to perpetuate and aggrandize themselves, and will seize those critical moments produced by war, invasion, or convulsion for that purpose. It is necessary that the Executive should be the guardian of the public against legislative tyranny. It is his duty to appoint the officers and to command the forces of the Republic."

He again said:

"When a strong personal interest happens to be opposed to a general interest the legislative cannot be too much distrusted. In all public bodies there are two parties. The Executive will necessarily be more connected with one than with the other. There will be a personal interest of one of the parties to oppose and one to support him. Much has been said of the intrigues that will be practiced to get the Executive into office. I have heard nothing said of the greater danger—the intrigues which will be practiced to get him out of office."

Mr. Pinckney indorsed all that had been said upon this subject; and went further as to the proposed court of impeachment. He said:

"The two Houses of Congress ought not to be the court of arraignment and trial upon a charge of impeachment. They are political bodies, strongly swayed by political prejudices. If the Executive opposes a favorite law of the dominant party the two Houses will combine against him, and under the influence of heat and faction will throw him out of office."

I ask the majority, what then are the reasons for this extraordinary proceeding, for this hot haste in pushing through this revolutionary measure? The framers of the Constitution never supposed that in case of treason and impeachment of a President of the United States that a duly-elected Vice President would not stand ready to assume the presidential functions. But now it happens that the Vice President is President. If Congress can get him out of the way it transfers one of its own number to this powerful position. This accident, this opportunity, has developed the motive. I say, without fear of successful denial—and I leave the proof to the record of history—that the reasons for this dangerous action are political, and only political. Can any public good ensue if you are successful in your design? None.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Impeachment—Mr. Pike.

Ho. of Reps.

THE RADICAL PARTY OF THE COUNTRY.

The dominant party in this country are without fundamental principles of government; unless they are aggressive upon individual or public rights they must recoil and fall behind. This party cannot stand still, must advance even into barbarian confiscation and bloody revolution, or it is dead. The leaders of this party well know that they are to-day in a political minority throughout the country, and unless something can be done to give them unnatural power, unless they can illegitimately perpetuate the power which the convulsion and passions of the recent war have placed in their hands, their former acts will be repudiated, and the party dies. They are the same men who preferred a lingering war, to obtain political power, to a short and decisive one under the Constitution and within the law.

INEQUALITY OF REPRESENTATION—THE DEMOCRATIC AND REPUBLICAN PARTIES.

The legislation of the Radical party has been to one end, aim, and effect. In the last fall's election in the eastern, middle, and western States, in all the non-excluded States, the Republicans had 2,134,554 votes, while the Democrats had 2,190,169, a Democratic majority of 55,615. Instead of forty-four Republican and only ten Democratic Senators, as now, we should stand twenty-eight Democrats and twenty-six Republicans, and the House would be Democratic by one majority. New England has six Senators more than would be her proportion under an equal distribution of one Senator to four hundred and fifty thousand population. The party do not mean to lose the strength of these unfair advantages. They go further. Nevada, with 10,000 voters, is here with two Senators; Nebraska, with less than 9,000 votes, is here with two Senators; and Colorado is soon to be here with her two Senators and only 10,000 votes; while New Mexico with 17,685 votes, Montana with about 11,000, Utah with 16,280, and Idaho with about 16,000 votes, are excluded.

This is not strange, for Nevada, Nebraska, and Colorado are Republican, while New Mexico, Montana, Utah, and Idaho are Democratic. Democratic members are excluded from both Houses by a strictly party vote, and their places given to Republicans. Mr. Stockton, of New Jersey, was thus thrust from the Senate, and my colleague, Mr. Brooks, of New York, Mr. Baldwin, of Michigan, and Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, were also thrust from this House. Three years have been spent to see how the votes of the southern States could be absolutely controlled by a central directory, and five bills have passed this House to that end. You have not only calculated the physical capacity of the population of that section to vote, but you have nicely weighed the dignity, endurance, and humiliation of its more intelligent population to define what would cause them to refuse to vote, and just how far it was necessary to go in enfranchising the negro and disfranchising the whites to have your conditions—return here either negroes or profligate whites who would do your bidding.

The number of the Supreme Court has been reduced and its entire integrity attacked by your legislation for party purposes. The dignity of the presidential office and the powers of the Executive have been so impaired as to interfere with the collection of the revenue and the interests of the country. Bills are passed over the President's veto without one moment's discussion. A perpetual Congress has been instituted, and now it is sought to elevate one of your own number, one of the most extreme men of either House, over the ruins of the Republic to the presidential chair.

PASSION AND IMPEACHMENT.

The ex parte evidence upon which this House proceeds to act, and upon which the Senate has acted in this important measure, and the solid party lines by which the action is supported, leave no doubt in my mind that when these ex parte statements and wild rumors are thrown out before a final court by intelligent lawyers, when facts only are presented, and when circumstantial evidence is weighed, if this case is not dismissed, it can only and will only, be executed against necessity, against facts, against law, and by force and blood.

AN APPEAL TO DOMINANT PARTY.

I ask, gentlemen, what is to be the effect of thus hurrying this nation into the jaws of a revolution, the end of which no man can foretell? Can the material interests of the country survive such a precedent? Can the public credit sustain such a strain? Every condition exists, and every element in this country is ripe for revolution. The increase of population for eight years is unproductive in its character and has been almost entirely in towns and cities. The agricultural population has not increased—agriculture needs labor, and agricultural products are in short supply and command high prices. The bonds of the Government are in the hands of the few; the votes here, unlike those of England and France, are in the hands of the masses. Impoverished labor will not always voluntarily tax itself to pay interest upon the rich man's bonds. When machinery has more fully stopped, &c., when industry will not feed and clothe those who are dear to us, I say unto you that these questions will have to be met.

I beseech you to pause in these high-handed, these useless, these dangerous measures. Behold the stagnation, destruction, sorrow, and death which have already followed as the results of your legislation. Tell it not in the Halls of this national Capitol, or let the sound reach the hills and valleys of our distant homes, how liberty is this day to be sacrificed upon the very altar of her citadel; how the pillars of our Constitution this day tremble to their foundation; how vengeance here seeks another victim; how party has risen superior to country; how justice is overthrown by passion, and how not one voice among you all raises its thundering tones to avert these crimes. The history of the past admonishes you, the uncertainty of the future warns you, of what may follow. You are certainly sowing the seeds of anarchy, destroying national credit, and disheartening our already despondent people. You may be placing us within a step of the yawning gulf of revolution.

Robespierre, Marat, and Danton were less vindictive than many of the members of these Houses; and the bloody rule of the Jacobins was mild compared to that which is sought to be established by many here who now seek power. Tread not too far. Your vengeance must react. Your threats will not always meet abject or even patriotic hearts.

Retaliation is an element of human nature. Long pent-up rage strikes with mighty force when its chains are broken. Your zealous, enthusiastic, ambitious, and dangerous men control the action of unthinking good men. Your speeches here this day, and the vote you are to give here this day, show that the shackles of party are upon you. Will you not rise and break them in pieces before the car is in motion, and inflamed passions compel you to take a part which now you would shrink from with horror? The hand-writing is upon the wall. Be wise, be just, be humane, while yet you can. The memories of the past, the hopes of the future, our own liberties, the liberties and the prosperity of our children and of our children's children are involved in the vote you this day give. As for me, if you this day agree to impeach the President upon the evidence now before us, I shall consider our liberties less secure, our property less valuable, our honor tarnished, our country disgraced, our rights invaded, and you responsible.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. F. A. PIKE,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, the resolution proposing the impeachment of President Johnson for "high crimes and misdemeanors" was properly passed by the House. The recent disregard and contempt of the act of March 2, 1867, regulating the tenure of civil offices are peculiarly offensive, because the Senate has so recently passed upon his action in the suspension of Mr. Stanton in August last, and that, too, after an elaborate debate, in which the whole matter was fully considered. The President has thus taken occasion, in the immediate presence of Congress, to defy its action. The first section of that act reads:

"SEC. 1. That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as hereinafter otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The question of the constitutionality of this act I do not deem open to the House. For all our purposes it must be considered constitutional. It was considered, discussed, passed by both branches of Congress, vetoed by the President, and, in accordance with the terms of the Constitution, "reconsidered" and passed by the requisite two-thirds majority.

Upon what principle, then, can the House act upon the possibility of this law being unconstitutional? Shall the House wait for a court somewhere, somehow constituted, at some future time, more or less remote, to pass upon the question of the constitutionality of this law? And is anybody green enough to suppose that a court will decide this question free from the bias of politics? The Democrats of this House, without exception, so far as I know, those who have been on the bench and those who have not, pronounce the law unconstitutional. Every man in the country who thought it "unconstitutional to coerce a State" will deem this law unconstitutional. Shall we wait for an expression of opinion from such of them as happen to be on the bench? Would that be wise?

It is clear that we must treat this statute like all others and regard it in full force and vitality until the proper judicial authority shall pass upon it. It may be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States, and it may not. Should it be carried there, and should the court pass upon it unfavorably, I should cease to act upon it. Until then I know of no way that any member of this House may properly discharge his duties while disregarding it. For one I cannot shirk my obligations in that way. My oath of office, as I construe it, forbids me thus to trifle with my position. Members of this House should act on the law as they find it, and members of courts must pass upon the law when it comes before them.

What, then, does this section of the act mean? Does it include the case of Mr. Stanton? It is said Mr. Stanton was appointed by Mr. Lincoln, and must be considered as his appointee under this act. And it is said, further, that Mr. Lincoln's "term of office" expired with his death; and, therefore, according to this section, Mr. Stanton's term expired thirty days thereafter. Suppose this to be so; how, then, does the case stand? Mr.

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Pike.

Lincoln died April 14, 1865, and according to this mode of reasoning Mr. Stanton's term of office ended in thirty days thereafter, and so ever since the passage of this act, March 2, 1867, Mr. Stanton has been holding place without authority of law. In other words, there has been no legal Secretary of War since that date. If this be so, the Secretaries of State, of the Navy, and of the Treasury are in the same category. Being illegally in office, their doings are void. This looks like the most wholesale repudiation of the public debt that has yet been made. Hundreds of millions of the public debt depend upon the action of the Secretary since the passage of the act a year since. Old bonds have been taken up and new ones substituted, and the whole vast operation of the Treasury Department, embracing at least $500,000,000 of valuations has been conducted as though we had a Secretary of the Treasury with full authority. Shall they all be repudiated? And whose fault is it? The President examined this act when it passed. If under it and in accordance with its provisions Mr. Stanton's term expired, and Mr. Seward's and Welles's, why did he not make other appointments? Is he guilty of nonfeasance, or rather is he not guilty of malfeasance in holding out to the public that these men were Secretaries when they were not? And would it not be gross misdemeanor to do this? Surely, if this has been done, the offense is even greater than that alleged against him. It is clearly his duty to fill these high offices, and failing to do so he would be guilty of the grossest dereliction, and should be punished accordingly.

But the President has treated Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War. He has consulted him, and in common with Mr. Seward and Mr. Welles Mr. Stanton has formed part of the Cabinet. Does it now lie in Mr. Johnson's mouth to deny his being a Cabinet officer? In addition to this the President has "suspended" Mr. Stanton. He could only do this on the ground that he was a member of his Cabinet and came within the provisions of the tenure-of-office act. There is no other law except this that gives the power of "suspension." This power is quite different from that of removal. An executive of a State may remove a sheriff—unless he be elective—but he cannot say to him that he shall be "suspended" for a specified time, and after that may exercise his functions. And in the appointment of General Grant as Secretary ad interim he also recognized the tenure-of-office act, and that Mr. Stanton was "suspended" under it. The act of February 13, 1795, gives the President power to appoint ad interim in case of a "vacancy," and he claims under that act to have appointed General Thomas after he had made the "vacancy" by the removal of Mr. Stanton. But in August there was no such "vacancy." Unless he had authority given him by the second section of the tenure-of-office act to appoint General Grant he had no authority anywhere. It follows, then, that in the appointment of General Grant temporarily he recognized the validity of the tenure-of-office act, and that Mr. Stanton came under its provisions. And Mr. Johnson clearly recognized Mr. Stanton as coming under the provisions of the second section of that act when, in December, he sent in his reasons to the Senate for the suspension of Mr. Stanton. In these four different ways Mr. Johnson has recognized Mr. Stanton as coming within the provisions of that act; and how can he now deny the position? He has acted with deliberation, and after full discussion and consultation with his advisers, and how can he now say his whole conduct shall go for naught? Can he be allowed to say so? But if not, then, without further discussion, Mr. Stanton must be taken as coming within the provisions of the first section of that act, and is still properly Secretary of War.

That section provides for one method of removal, and that is "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." No other. That consent has not been obtained; and consequently Mr. Stanton, whether he be considered as Mr. Lincoln's appointee; holding during the term for which Mr. Lincoln was elected, or as Mr. Johnson's appointee by adoption, is still Secretary of War.

And the removal or attempted removal of the Secretary of War is in direct conflict with the sixth section of that act, which provides that "removals," and "issuing letters of authority for or in respect to any appointment or employment," contrary to the provisions of the act, is a high misdemeanor, and punishable by fine or imprisonment.

If, then, Mr. Stanton comes within the provision of the first section of that act it is clear that the President has laid himself liable to its penalties, because he has committed a flagrant violation of its provisions. But if that statute does not apply to this case still the President has no right to remove Mr. Stanton. The Constitution, article two, section two, gives him authority to appoint during the "recess of the Senate." This right of appointing has been construed to involve the right of removal. And such has been the practice. But it has only been done during the "recess of the Senate." When the Senate is in session there is no constitutional or other right of removal. And in no other case has Mr. Johnson, in his whole career of wild audacity, attempted the removal of an officer while the Senate was in session without first asking the consent of that body.

On the 21st of February Mr. Stanton was in his place in the War Office. He had been "suspended" under the tenure-of-office act by the President, and according to the terms of the same bill he had been restored by the Senate. No attempt had been made to "remove" him. He was still Secretary of War. Such being the case, it is clear that, whether his case came within the tenure-of-office act or not it was a palpable usurpation of authority on the part of the President to remove a faithful officer while in the discharge of his duties, and against the provisions of the Constitution itself. Such being the President's offense, the committee has done well to found charges upon it. A case is thus made out upon which judgment may well be based. But I wish the committee had gone further, and put in the indictment some of the other, if not graver, offenses of which the President has been guilty. The additional article proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] I shall vote for with pleasure. It supplies the want, in part, perhaps as fully as it can be supplied, consistently with a reasonable time, in the trial of the case.

It would, of course, be more satisfactory to the House and the country if the reasons for removing President Johnson could all be spread out on the record. The whole catalogue of offenses against the State—not doing what he ought to do, and doing what he ought not to do—is almost continuous with his official life. A brief display of extraordinary determination to teach the country its duty to hate treason and punish traitors, and that display limited to words only, is all that can be found in the history of his administration of the qualities that attracted the attention of the country and induced a powerful political organization to go out of its way and heed the strong persuasions of his friends to give him the second office in the gift of the people of the Republic.

Under one pretext and another he has utterly failed to meet the just expectations of the country. He has abandoned his friends. He has broken without hesitation all the implied obligations to the men who placed him in power. Those who gave their best exertions to defeat his opponent and give him place he has constantly termed fanatics and compared with the traitors of the South. And by rapid stages of degradation he soon came to abandon both his party friends and the friends of his Government during the great struggle, and on all occasions to ally himself with those friendly to the rebellion.

Could all his various alliances, addresses, conferences about appointments, and real reasons for public action be spread out on the record, no man could hesitate to say he should be ejected from place for the good of the Republic and in the interest of sound principles of political action for all time to come! The most those who now oppose this proceeding in the hope of party advantage could say would be that they "loved the treason and despised the traitor!"

And it is only in oblivion of history that any one can suppose Congress at fault in this difference that has been distracting the country for the last two years between the legislative and executive departments of the Government.

Mr. Johnson took possession of the office early in 1865, and Congress did not assemble until December. But it is susceptible of proof that in the autumn of that year he allied himself to the Democratic party and endeavored to defeat his friends in the fall elections! Montgomery Blair went through the State of New York speaking for the Democratic candidate, and alleging everywhere that the President was with him in feeling and desire, and when Republicans wrote the President for authority to contradict the statement he refused to furnish it! This was more than a month before Congress assembled.

And when Congress did meet he made no effort and tolerated no advances looking to mutual coöperation. It was evident that from the first he had determined to destroy the organization that had elevated him to place, and in its stead to create a new one made of hostile elements and devoted to his personal interests.

All this shows political turpitude of the most heinous kind, not of the character of "crimes and misdemeanors" specified in the Constitution. Such conduct still evinces a baseness that among honorable men prepares the way for belief in the most marked official misdemeanor that supposed personal interest might render necessary.

Congress and the country have already passed upon Mr. Johnson's usurpation of power in setting up States in the place of those in which, according to his Holden proclamation of May 29, 1865, "all civil government had been destroyed." If any popular verdict can be pronounced at the polls one was given in the election of the Fortieth Congress. The question then was: "Has the Executive usurped the power of the nation?" Discussed thoroughly everywhere, beginning with Johnson himself, the country understood plainly what the controversy was between the Executive and the Congress, and it returned a hundred majority here to pronounce its judgment.

The verdict was marked and distinct, and should be reckoned as conclusive, as that against the Bank of the United States or the Dred Scott decision. And usurpation of power is the highest of "crimes," leading, if unchecked, to a change in the form and a destruction of the Government itself. Thus usurping the power of Government, Mr. Johnson proceeded, in derogation of his high duties, to endeavor to excite the passions of the multitude against a coördinate branch of Government. Beginning at Washington and traversing half the States of the Union, he everywhere endeavored to bring Congress into derision and contempt, that thereby he might strengthen his own illegal purposes and defeat propositions for amendments to the Constitution submitted by Congress to the several States in accordance with the terms of the instrument itself.

Elected by the same constituency, and no greater than the Congress, he did not hesitate repeatedly to denounce it as no Congress, but a body "hanging on the verge of the Government."

Thus the "crime" of usurpation was endeavored to be supported by "misdemeanor;"

a misdemeanor so flagrant as to make the head of the nation a scoff and jest and by-word—bringing himself and the office, so far as lay in his power, into contempt among the people.

In pursuance of the same purpose to sustain this great usurpation, he has prostituted both the appointing and the veto powers. In a public speech at St. Louis he threatened both to "kick out of office" those opposed to his policy and to veto all measures that might be passed to override it. And how doggedly he has adhered to his purpose we who have been here the last two years know right well. No more active and persistent use of both veto and appointing powers could be made than has been made by him. On all occasions, everywhere, he has asked of applicants for place and of purpose of laws passed by Congress but one question, and that whether it favored or opposed his usurpation. Thus the executive authority has been prostituted on behalf of a great "crime."

And mean time Congress has protested and made laws for the purpose of restraint. Overruled by construction, which was but a subtle form of obstruction, Congress has repeatedly passed laws to make more plain its purpose of subjecting the rebel States to the authority of the laws of the United States, and has once assembled here for that sole purpose. And those laws have as constantly been met by the veto power in the first instance, and subsequently by continual obstructions in their enforcement. Whenever an officer has endeavored to discharge his duties under the provisions of the law for the government of the rebel States, he has been treated with hostile criticism on the part of the Executive, and upon the slightest provocation been removed. Sickles, Sheridan, Pope—men in whom the country has the highest confidence, and men who have given extraordinary proof of the warmest patriotism—have each in turn been removed for no other reason than a zealous performance of duty under the reconstruction acts.

Encouragement has in all possible forms been given to rebels, and their dormant hostility to the Government quickened into such active opposition that conflict has ensued, and murders without number have been committed; and the restoration of the whole southern country to a state of peace and comparative prosperity has been thrown back for years.

Had Mr. Johnson not advised the rejection of the mild and wise and moderate constitutional amendments those States would long before now have been restored to the Union, and the whole controversy settled.

And still Congress has foreborne to exercise the power of removal vested in it by the Constitution. Wisely or unwisely, it forebore with the hope of amendment. Pursuing toward the rebel States a policy which had in it no vengeance, and so presenting to the world the remarkable spectacle of a Government suffering the greatest rebellion, with the greatest sacrifice of life and property, and with the least attempt at punishment of crime. Congress has continued the same policy toward the Executive.

But the President has only become more and more set and fixed in his purpose. Instead of responding to forbearance, he has only been emboldened by it to more violence of action, until now he has undertaken openly to set aside laws of the United States under the pretense of a desire to test their constitutionality. Failing in his attempts to construe, he claims to abrogate by virtue of his position as President of the United States.

But the President has no more right than other citizens of the Republic to violate a law of the land. His oath of office to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution" is of no more scope than that taken by every officeholder in the United States to "support the Constitution." You cannot "preserve, protect, and defend" without "supporting," and if you fail to "support" you certainly fail "to preserve, protect, and defend." The duty imposed by either oath is the same; and the justice of the peace who has taken the official oath to "support the Constitution of the United States" may as well claim immunity from the laws because he believes them unconstitutional as the President. There is one law for all, the rich and the poor, the high and the low.

And the new plea that he violates to test the question of unconstitutionality, and therefore is not criminal, is equally unsound. It of itself shows an intention to violate, and that is all that is necessary to make out the crime.

It is no new plea. During the war we had just such propositions in relation to the enrollment law. It was alleged to be unconstitutional, and it was claimed that Mr. Lincoln should allow that question to be tested before it was enforced. The mob in New York was egged on in its mission of destruction with the claim that the enrollment law was unconstitutional and should be tested. The southern States seceded under claim of constitutional right. They desired to test the question of the constitutionality of secession, and they did. And any citizen of this country is at liberty to do the same thing. The only penalty that attaches is the penalty of the law. If he violates the law he must take what follows thereon. If he be part of a mob testing the question of constitutionality, he is liable to be shot down by the officers of justice or subsequently punished. If he be part of an army aiding States to test the question of the constitutionality of secession he must triumph or fail according to the fortunes of war. And if he be the President of the United States he must be dealt with according to the magnitude of the offense, and impeached and removed if the House of Representatives and Senate concur in thinking fit to do so.

In this case no one can presume him innocent of offense. The removal of Stanton and the appointment of Thomas is but part of a series of offenses in support of his great usurpation. It is the culmination of misdemeanors. It is the keystone of a whole arch of wrong doing. He would make his control of the Government complete. He would have his own creatures near him not to execute the laws, but to further his personal desires.

He would have no intervention between his own will and the power and Treasury of the Government. And so a faithful officer is removed, and a worn-out, imbecile old man selected to take charge of an important Department. The current history of the Administration connects the whole together, and so they must go into history.

The amendment proposed, or rather the additional article proposed, is necessary by way of spreading out on the record the purposes and designs of this man at the head of the Government, and by the light of it we read the criminality of his official acts. I would rather it should have included the principal transactions of his Administration that I have so hastily sketched; but I forbear to press any further amendment for that object, because the country is anxious to have an end of these proceedings.

I have voted against impeachment, but only for prudential considerations. Believing him guilty of high misdemeanors within the scope and meaning of the Constitution, I yet forbore by my vote to bring him to trial because of possible damage to the industrial interests of the country. It seemed to me better to "bear the ills we have than fly to those we know not of." I never believed it necessary to find an indictable offense in order to get a cause for impeachment. Small crimes against the individual are indictable, and great offenses against the State are not. It is indictable to steal a chicken, but not to usurp the powers of a State.

Sir, we ought not longer to delay. The highest interests of the Government demand immediate action. The offense is clearly made out. The law is plain. The remedy should be applied at once. And whatever hesitation I may have had heretofore, I am now satisfied that the business and material interests of the country will be immensely benefited by energetic action. The perverse action of Mr. Johnson has cost this nation thousands of lives and millions of money, and it will continue to be of immense injury. Every day's delay protracts business, uneasiness, and adds to the intolerant and cruel abuse of loyal men in the rebel States. Both sections of the Union are looking to us for relief. They have a right to demand of us a determined exercise of constitutional power. By impeachment only can the contest be ended. Impeachment is peace. Impeachment is reconstruction. It insures prosperity and relief to our burdened taxpayers. If it makes a martyr for the use of the Democracy they are welcome to him. He has in him the poorest stuff that ever martyr was made of. Let him be removed as soon as the forms of law will allow, and the whole country will rejoice!

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. SIDNEY PERHAM,
OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1868.

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

Mr. PERHAM. Mr. Chairman, we are today summoned to one of the most important duties that falls to the lot of the American House of Representatives to discharge. The President of the United States has been charged with high crimes and misdemeanors in office, which, by the law of the country, should the charges be sustained before the high court authorized by the Constitution to try the issue, would result in his removal from office. This is no ordinary occasion. Never before in the history of the country has the President been arraigned to answer to articles of impeachment, and we devoutly hope such an occasion may never arise again. It is no occasion for the partisan, but for the impartial exercise of a solemn and important duty.

I do not propose to make an argument on the legal questions involved in the subject before us. That has been ably done by others who have preceded me in this debate. I shall content myself with a brief statement of some of the facts in the case and the law appertaining thereto. And here it is well to remember, what some people seem to overlook, that the President has no authority beyond that of the humblest citizen, except such as is conferred by the Constitution and laws. His powers are all subject to the limitations and restrictions of law. By the Constitution the judiciary power is "vested in the Supreme Court and such other inferior courts as Congress shall establish."

The President is the executor, not the expounder, of the law, and has no right to disregard it because it does not meet his approbation. No position in this country is so high as to authorize its occupant to substitute his own will for the law or to violate its demands with impunity. When the tenure-of-office act became a law by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress it was a law to him just as much as if he had given it his approval, and he had no discretion except to execute it. With remarkable foresight the framers of the Constitution guarded against the power of the President to make his own will the law, and appoint important officers without the consent of the Senate. If they had foreseen distinctly just the present state of things they could not have expressed their intention to make the power of the President to appoint "officers of the United States" subordinate to the action of the Senate any clearer.

In support of this position I quote from an official opinion upon the powers of the President given by the then Attorney General, Jerry Black, and addressed to President Buchanan, in 1860.

Mr. Black says:

"To the Chief Executive Magistrate of the Union is confided the solemn duty of seeing the laws faithfully executed." * * * "But his power is to be used only in the manner prescribed by the legislative department. He cannot accomplish a legal purpose by illegal means, or break the laws himself to prevent them from being violated by others.

The acts of Congress sometimes give the President broad discretion in the use of the means by which they are to be executed, and sometimes limit his power so that he can exercise it only in a certain prescribed manner. Where the law directs a thing to be done without saying how that implies the power to use such means as may be necessary and proper to accomplish the end of the Legislature. But where the mode of performing a duty is pointed out by statute that is the exclusive mode, and no other can be followed. The United States have no common law to fall back upon when the written law is defective. If, therefore, an act of Congress declares that a certain thing shall be done by a particular officer, it cannot be done by a different officer. The agency which the law furnishes for its own execution must be used to the exclusion of all others."

The provision of the Constitution applicable to the case is as follows:

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

This authorizes the President to appoint "with the advice and consent of the Senate," but in no other method, during the session of the Senate. Neither can he create a vacancy. He has only power to nominate, and, after the Senate shall have given its consent, to appoint. This is the extent of his power, so far as the officers named are concerned, while the Senate is in session. During the recess of the Senate he can fill any "vacancy that may happen by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session." I take this provision of the Constitution to be conclusive that its framers did not intend to give the President the power either to create a vacancy by removal or to make a permanent appointment. During the recess of the Senate the President has power only to grant temporary commissions, limited in their duration to a time within which the Senate would have an opportunity to decide whether a permanent appointment should be made; thus keeping the whole power of permanent appointments within the control of the Senate. Does any one suppose that it was intended to give the President absolute power of appointment during the session when it was expressly prohibited during the recess?

Mr. Johnson has violated these plain provisions; first, by attempting to remove Mr. Stanton and creating a vacancy; and secondly, by appointing General Thomas, without the consent of the Senate when that body was in session, neither of which he had any authority to do.

"He shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States."

The Secretary of War is an "officer of the United States," and, by the plain terms of the Constitution, is to be appointed with the consent of the Senate, and in no other way. The Constitution confers no power of appointment upon the President except through the Senate, as follows:

"Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of the Departments."

The Secretary of War is not an "inferior officer," and the Senate cannot, if it desires, clothe the President with absolute power to appoint such an officer. It can only "vest the appointment of inferior officers" in the Executive.

The tenure-of-office act seeks to give practical effect to the spirit of that clause of the Constitution already quoted, a part of the law being simply a reenactment of its provisions. The first section of this act reads as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Nothing is plainer than that under this section an officer who has been appointed "with the advice and consent of the Senate" cannot be removed without "the advice and consent of the Senate." But it is contended that the proviso so modifies the first part of the section as to allow Mr. Johnson to remove such of his Cabinet officers as have not been appointed by him without consulting the Senate. The officers named in the proviso may hold their offices "during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter." The word "term," as here used, evidently has reference to the time for which the President is elected. The President is elected for a term of four years, and, of course, the term for which he is elected does not expire until the end of four years from his inauguration. Mr. Lincoln was elected for a term of four years from the 4th of March, 1865, and, though he has ceased to perform the duties of the office, the "term" for which he was elected will not expire until the 4th of March, 1869. Four years are a presidential term. No presidential term less than four years is recognized by the Constitution or the laws. Mr. Johnson is now serving not his own term, but the unexpired portion of Mr. Lincoln's term. If I am correct in this statement, the term for which Mr. Stanton was appointed will not expire until the 4th of March, 1869, and by the terms of the act under consideration he is entitled to hold his office "for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," but in no other way.

That the proviso was not intended to give the President power to remove his Cabinet ministers is apparent, when we remember that its object was to restrict, not to enlarge, the powers of removal given in the first part of the section; and that the bill was violently opposed both in this House and the Senate, because that under it the President could not remove his Cabinet officers unless the Senate should concur. And the President himself, in whose behalf this interpretation is set up, took the same view of the act. In his message vetoing the bill, he said:

"In effect the bill provides that the President shall not remove from their places any of the civil officers whose terms of service are not limited by law without the advice and consent of the Senate."

As late as August, and again in December last, the President himself recognized the binding force of this act in suspending Mr. Stanton under it and proceeding in exact conformity with the forms prescribed. This interpretation of the act, now for the first time set up to justify the President in his flagrant violation of the law, is an afterthought, and without the least grounds of support. There is little doubt that the President when he vetoed the bill had Mr. Stanton, whom he and his friends had been endeavoring to "smoke out" of the Cabinet, especially in his mind as one of the men that he would be expressly forbidden to remove if that act should become a law, and that this increased his opposition to the measure. The other sections of the act applicable to this case are as follows:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, accept any appointment to or employment in any office, or shall hold or exercise, or attempt to hold or exercise, any such office or employment, he shall be deemed, and is hereby declared to be, guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, he shall be punished therefor by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised, contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate."

The President's shameful attempt to induce General Grant to violate this act and become liable under this fifth section, by promising to suffer himself vicariously its fines and penalties, is too fresh in the minds of the people to need more than a passing notice. I greatly fear the President has already more sins of his own than he will be able to atone for, without making any contracts to suffer vicarious atonement for others. Certain it is that if he has many pledges of this kind it will be an act of great mercy to remove him from the scenes of his present temptations before the accumulation of his own political sins become any greater.

Mr. Johnson had suspended Mr. Stanton and had sent to the Senate his reasons therefor, according to the provisions of the act under consideration and by law. "If the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office." No language could be plainer. All the functions of the office from which Mr. Stanton had been suspended were restored to him when the Senate refused to concur in the suspension, and he became "forthwith" Secretary of War with all the rights belonging to the office, and the President had no more right to prevent his return to office by the appointment of General Grant, General Thomas, or any other man, than he would have to send either of those men to the office of Mr. Seward or Mr. McCulloch to take possession of the places occupied by the rightful incumbents. It is therefore plain that the President is guilty not only of conspiring to keep Mr. Stanton out of the office to which he was entitled by law, but of endeavoring to involve General Grant in the conspiracy, as well as to make him liable under the tenure-of-office act to "a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both."

The sixth section provides, with remarkable clearness, for the punishment of just such offenses as the President has been guilty of. He has attempted to remove Mr. Stanton "contrary to the provisions of this act." He has appointed a man to fill his place in defiance of law. He has issued a "letter of authority" to one Lorenzo Thomas without law, and in violation of its express provisions. These acts are declared by the law to be "high misdemeanors," and "high misdemeanors" are not only punishable under the law "by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both," but, under the Constitution, they render the perpetrator liable to "impeachment and removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." I submit this brief statement of a few of the facts and the law applicable to the question before us, as I understand it, and challenge contradiction to the general correctness of my conclusions.

But, Mr. Chairman, the charges in the articles before us include but a small portion of the crimes of this man, which may properly be presented to show his motives in the commission of the acts specifically charged.

The danger is more in the spirit which these acts reveal than in the acts themselves. The firing upon Sumter, considered apart from the spirit that prompted it, would not have aroused the people of this country as it did. But they had seen for months the preparations that had been made to break up the Government; they had heard the threats of disunion, and recognized in the firing of the first gun not only the signal of war, but the terrible spirit that prompted it. It was the revelation of the wicked determination which lay back of and inspired the overt act that aroused the people to a sense of danger and made every loyal heart beat in unison and nerved every patriot arm for battle. So in this case the people have looked on with anxious dread for the last two years. They have noticed with fear and trembling that the curses which the President was once wont to pour out upon rebels were changed to words of commendation. They had witnessed his efforts to install the leaders of the "lost cause" in power and subject the Union men of the South to rebel domination. They had seen his shameful disregard of all his promises made to them in his better days, and still they were not without hope that he would cease his wicked purposes to some extent, and that the balance of his political life might be endured. But they have been disappointed. His last acts have opened their eyes to see the spirit that controls him and the dark designs that lie back of and inspire these acts. They are now fully aroused to a sense of the danger that environs them, and with a unanimity scarcely less than that which followed the attack upon Sumter they demand his removal; and as before the war prominent northern Democrats assured the rebels that an army would never be raised in the North to subdue them, and that a battle must first be fought at home, and talked about marching over Democratic bayonets, &c., so now we hear from the same men threats of terrible things the Democrats of the country will do if the representatives of the people dare to restrain Mr. Johnson from the commission of further crimes against the Government.

What deeds of darkness and usurpation Mr. Johnson may have had in his purposes for the past and future we may never know, and it is perhaps better that they should not be revealed. Certain it is that all his talk about making himself "dictator" and "perpetuating his power," and the question so significantly asked by Mr. Seward, whether we would "have Mr. Johnson for President or king," could not be without some meaning.

In a speech delivered by Mr. Johnson on the 18th and 19th of December, 1859, he said, "I do not differ with my southern friends, only as to the mode of redress. I shall take other grounds while I try to accomplish the same result." This was said just previous to the commencement of hostilities. He did "take other grounds" from those taken by his "southern friends." How earnestly he has tried "to accomplish the same result" that they endeavored to effect the country knows too well.

Our financial interest calls loudly for the removal of the President. Property belonging to the Government to the amount of many millions has been illegally surrendered to parties in the South, a part of which is said to inure to his own personal benefit. Frauds unprecedented in the history of the Government are being perpetrated by officers that Mr.

Johnson and his subordinates are continuing in office, and have refused to remove after due notice of their crimes.

Ex-rebels from the confederate army, who have been appointed to lucrative and responsible offices, have been permitted to draw their salaries without taking the oath required by law. In this very large sums have illegally been drawn from the Treasury.

No American citizen can contemplate the frauds that are constantly being perpetrated under the supervision and protection of corrupt officials without a sense of shame and disgrace. There is no good business man in the country who would not be willing to pay the Government $130,000,000 annually, above all expenses, for the privilege which it has under the law of collecting the tax on spirits. There is little doubt that the tax if honestly collected would amount to very much more than the sum named. The president of the convention of distillers, held in this city in December last, stated that not more than five cents, instead of two dollars, per gallon have been collected. If this gentleman is correct—and he has much better opportunity to judge correctly than I—the sum we are losing is much more than that I have named. But allowing the lowest possible calculation, the Government is cheated out of $100,000,000 of revenue annually through frauds of this description alone. We are informed by the revenue officers that the frauds in the manufacture of tobacco have been almost equal to those in the manufacture of spirits. Various measures have been devised from time to time to prevent these frauds, but to no purpose; and so long as corrupt officers, under whose jurisdiction these frauds have been committed, are continued no legislation can secure an honest collection of the revenue.

It was very unfortunate for the country that so many revenue officers were appointed during the year 1866, while the President was turning his back upon the men who elected him, and seeking to form a sort of mongrel party, with such men from the Republicans and Democrats as were willing to abandon their political principles and rally to the "bread-and-butter" standard. Many good men were removed and their places filled with bad ones, and but few of the new appointments were fit to be made. The larger portion of those who rushed eagerly and swiftly, like hungry buzzards, to the embrace and patronage of Mr. Johnson in the summer and fall of that year were men who had failed to receive what they believed their services merited in the parties to which they belonged, and who were willing to sell their political principles and souls, too, for the sake of the crumbs that fell from their newly-chosen master's table; political weather-cocks who had no convictions that they could not easily waive for the sake of obtaining an office or continuing in one already obtained.

These men, for nearly a year, literally swarmed around the President, and while with one breath they praised him as the greatest statesman of the age, with the next they demanded the price of their devotion. A man who will sell himself for a place will sell himself for gold when the offer is made. The returns some of these men have made of the production of distilleries and other businesses which they have been placed fully prove that bribery is a principle to which they have become thoroughly accustomed. In no other way can the facts that are continually coming to light be explained. The overtaxed people of the country have been swindled out of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty million dollars, at the lowest calculation, within the last year by these Johnson officials. I am constrained to believe that a straight-out Democratic Administration would have made better appointments than these I refer to; and I am certain that the Republican party, to do its worst, could not find in its ranks another installment of men so wanting in all the elements that go to make up a good public officer as those who went out from them to espouse the cause of Andrew Johnson.

These remarks are not by any means to be understood as applying to all the men who hold official positions in the revenue department. Very many good and true public officers appointed by Mr. Lincoln the President has (thanks to an incorruptible Senate) been unable to remove. It is also very probable that Mr. Johnson has appointed some good men, though it has not been my good fortune to know many such. Once secure for the revenue what we are now losing by these dishonest officials and we can relieve the people from nearly all the burdens of internal taxation except on spirits and tobacco. This result, however, cannot be accomplished while the President is allowed to perpetuate, through his chosen instruments, these disgraceful frauds.

Mr. Rollins, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, has struggled hard to secure a faithful execution of the law, but, with the men who have been forced upon him as revenue agents and other officers, his efforts have been but partially successful. From time to time he has earnestly pleaded for some action that would remedy the evil, but without success. I quote a few extracts from his communications to the Secretary of the Treasury, to show that the attention of the Department had often been called to the enormity of the frauds of which we complain:

"The laws themselves, and their construction, with rules, regulations, and instructions under them, are of little profit if assessors and collectors lack either integrity or ability. A tarnished reputation even is a hindrance to success, and as much disqualifies a man for either of these positions as for the pulpit or the bench. He, too, should only receive appointment who has won the confidence of his community by fidelity in other places of trust, and who will give character to the office, rather than he who seeks prominence and importance through official position, and whose principal claim is political service."

"Unworthy men of little ability may possibly answer for other positions on the civil list where there is less opportunity for fraudulent collusion without detection, and where incompetency will not prove such a terrible cost to the Treasury; but unless great care is exercised in the appointments of which I am speaking, the administration of the revenue laws will be a reproach, and the laws themselves will soon become insufferable to the public, regardless of party."

"Frequent changes of officers I have always regarded as inconsistent with the successful administration of the revenue laws, and because of this I have deeply regretted the many changes of the last two months, and cannot but hope that with the vexed political questions measurably concluded removals and appointments may be substantially returned by the President to the Treasury Department, where alone they can be considered in connection with the good of the revenue."

"In the collection of the tax on distilled spirits these frauds have become so monstrous as to excite serious alarm, and unless they can be suppressed or materially checked will still further reduce the revenue and bring disgrace upon this office and upon the Treasury Department."

"It is because of this that the many and oftentimes repeated changes during the past year have prejudiced the revenue to the extent of many million dollars. I speak of this, and in this connection, with a hope that those may be appointed to place of the character I have indicated."

"I neither ask nor expect the preferment of men merely because they are Republicans. I ask nothing at all, nor do I claim anything, from personal or political considerations, for I would, if possible, take the service altogether out of party politics. I do not ask you even to hear me for the appointment of any particular man, although I believe that the practice which long prevailed under which nominations were made by this office to yours can alone secure thorough discipline and efficiency; but as Commissioner of Internal Revenue, charged with important public trusts, and solicitous for the success of the Treasury Department, I do pray you that in Ohio and elsewhere, wherever vacancies exist or shall hereafter occur, they shall be filled by those whose past lives and present reputations shall entitle them to the unmeasured confidence of the Department and the public."

"In many districts, as I have frequently stated to you before, and as you are aware, the officers are incompetent or unfaithful, and in others they are corrupt."

"For a time I hoped that good results might follow from the appointment of special agents and inspectors, but there is reason to fear that many of these have yielded to temptation, and as their number has been multiplied frauds seem to have increased."

"An efficient remedy is imperatively demanded. No legislation, however stringent, can avail without honest and capable officers, and I see no reason to change the views I have so often expressed to you that inefficient or dishonest officers must be removed and men of integrity and superior ability appointed in their places."

"I therefore respectfully refer you again to my communication of the 15th of July last, in which I recommended the retirement of the several officers therein named. I have seen no reason to change that recommendation, and now earnestly renew it."

Thus it will be seen that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in subdued terms and modest language, as becomes a subordinate officer, often and earnestly called the attention of the Department and the President to the folly of the course they were pursuing, and appealed to them to appoint better men; but his appeals fell on ears deaf to everything except to "perpetuate his power" through the very men who were thus swindling the Government while sworn to guard its interests. Mr. Rollins, it appears, stands in the way of the complete consummation of Mr. Johnson's unholy purposes, and because of his fidelity to duty—for there can be no other reason given—he has attempted to remove him, and is only prevented by the fidelity of the Senate. His shameful exhibition of himself on the day of his inauguration before the American people and the representatives of foreign nations—to say nothing of similar disgraceful scenes since that time—was a disgrace to the whole country, and, under the circumstances, well deserving impeachment and removal.

When, after the fall of Richmond, in the streets of Washington and other places, in exciting and intemperate language, he demanded the punishment of the rebels who had just surrendered to our victorious Army, and, breathing indignation and slaughter, invoked the curses of Heaven upon their heads, the whole country shuddered lest by some possibility this bloodthirsty man might be placed in a position to wreak his seeming vengeance in punishment and death upon those he then declared to be the enemies of the country to an extent that would be a disgrace to the nation and a foul blot on the civilization of the age in which we live. I confess that when he was elevated to the position he now occupies by the hand of the assassin I greatly feared that his treatment of the rebels would be unnecessarily severe. Immediately, however, a change came over him. The confiscated lands he promised for homes to the loyal poor were restored to their former rebel owners in violation of law; the men he had so recently denounced as traitors, and about whom he had called high Heaven to witness that if the power should be given him he would have them "tried, convicted, and hanged as traitors," became his confidential advisers and boon companions. All his terrible anathemas, once so vehement against the men who sustained the rebellion, were hurled at Union men North and South who aided in crushing treason on the field. The men who were to take "back seats" in the process of reconstruction were invited to the front, and the work of reorganization placed in their hands. And when these bloodthirsty tyrants, in pursuance of these wicked designs to crush out the loyal sentiment of the South, had rendered the condition of the Unionists intolerable, and when they, including the colored people, many of whom had bared their dark bosoms to the storm of battle that the country might live, appealed to him who had solemnly promised to be their "Moses" for protection, they were heartlessly remanded back to the tender mercies of their oppressors, and insultingly told that "this is a white man's government;" and when the public sense of the country became aroused and indignant at these unholy proceedings, and the representatives of the people remonstrated against the President's treasonable conduct, they were met with the insulting declaration that Congress itself is an illegal body "hanging on the verge of the Government."

Instead of organizing the States recently in rebellion, in the interest of loyalty he has persisted in forcing an organization that gives rebels absolute power and places the Unionists bound hand and foot under the control of those who but yesterday were attempting to destroy the nation's life. He has doggedly insisted in enforcing what he terms his "policy" upon the people, and every man who does not support this policy is, to use his own characteristic language, to be "kicked out." In the face of all these oppressions, usurpations, and lawless exercise of power, there is not a man in this country who eulogizes himself so much as Andrew Johnson. He is constantly proclaiming his own disinterestedness, his purity of motives, his unequalled love for the Constitution, law, and order, and that he is incapable of doing any wrong, either as alderman of a village in Tennessee or through all the grades of office up to President of the United States. Sir, there is much of the teachings of history in the remark of Mr. Johnson when he said:

"When you hear a man prating about the Constitution spit him; he is a traitor."

While the Constitution itself is the sheet-anchor of our national security, its name has been prostituted for the basest of purposes. In the name of that instrument, which the rebels were trampling under their feet, they protested against our right to interfere with their treasonable work. In that name their friends in the North protested against our right to coerce a "sovereign State," and opposed every really earnest and effective measure to crush the rebellion. In that name they demanded from time to time during the rebellion, and especially at their national convention in 1864, that the war should cease. In the name of that sacred instrument they have opposed, with Andrew Johnson at their head, the enfranchisement of the black man, and struggled for the restoration to power of the men who, by their treason, have loaded us with debt and filled the land with mourning.

The pretended religionist who talks most about his own piety is usually the greatest rascal. The politician who talks loudest about his regard and love for the "dear people" before election forgets them soonest after his purposes have been accomplished. The greatest criminals of which history gives any account have endeavored to put their intended victims off their guard by protestations of honesty of purpose. When a man has made up his mind to do a bad thing he usually attempts to make the people believe him incapable of doing such a thing.

Mr. Johnson is not an exception to this general truth. No man in the country has ever denounced and threatened traitors like him; and no man is now a greater or more intimate friend to them and their principles, or so earnest to shield them from the very punishment he once invoked. No man in the country was so loud or seemingly more honest in his promise to the Union men of the South as Mr. Johnson, and no man betrayed them so soon or has proved so great an enemy to them. If there is any one thing that surprises me more than another in regard to this subject it is that I, in common with others, did not, in the unusual demonstrations and professions made by this man before his elevation to his present position, detect the faithlessness of his motives which he has since so palpably revealed. After this it is hoped we shall be on our guard against such noisy pretenders.

It has been said by nearly every man who has spoken in defense of the President since this discussion commenced that this is a partisan movement, inspired by a desire to get control of the Government for the special benefit of the Republican party. Sir, I hurl back with scorn and indignation the charge. The patience and long suffering exercised by the majority of this House toward a man who has shamefully betrayed them and broken every pledge he has made to them for the last four years, and who has committed a series of disgraceful usurpations unequalled in the history of the Government, is a sufficient answer to this charge. We have earnestly desired to avoid impeachment, and have borne with his outrageous conduct until further forbearance not only ceases to be a virtue, but becomes a crime. Our desire to avoid the disgrace of having given our votes four years ago for a man whom we were obliged to impeach for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and an earnest effort to avoid the excitement in the country incident to impeachment, he has construed into cowardice, and his friends have given out that we dare not impeach him. He has, however, seemed to be determined to force us to this measure, and has at last put himself and us in a condition that leaves us no alternative. To pursue his present course is ruin to the country, and he has gone so far in his mad career and is so thoroughly committed to the rebels that he cannot retrace his steps. Even if he could and would, he would forfeit what regard his present pretended friends have for him, and could not regain the confidence of those he has betrayed. He is very much in the condition of one of Milton's noted characters, who is represented to have said:

"Which way I fly is hell; myself am hell."

The loyal people of the country, whom Andrew Johnson has betrayed, ask not for his blood; they only demand that he shall be restrained from further mischief. We deplore the necessity for impeachment, but we cannot disregard the stern demands of the law. In my judgment the time has come when we, as the representatives of the people, can no longer delay the resort to the method provided in the Constitution for the removal of a faithless Executive without becoming partakers in his guilt. In no other way can the majesty of the law and the safety of the Republic be maintained. The presentation of articles of impeachment is due to the President as well as to those who demand it. A very large number of the people believe him to be a bad man, guilty of misdemeanors, deserving of impeachment, and utterly unfit for the high position he holds. If their views are correct he ought to be impeached and removed from office. If he is innocent it is right that he should have an opportunity to vindicate his conduct before the country. The trial will give him ample opportunity to do this.

We ask to be relieved from the rule of a bad man, accidentally in the presidential chair, by the peaceful mode provided in the Constitution, and we are met at the threshold by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] with threats of war and blood, and are given to understand that he and his Democratic associates will "never, never, never" submit to such an outrage.

Sir, these threats, coming from the party notoriously the party of peace in time of war, and of war in time of peace, have no terrors for the people of this country. They will, through their Representatives, vindicate the genius of their Government and its ability to execute peacefully their desires. The rebels, through their armed resistance, have been crushed out by the valor of our soldiers—have, as they proposed to do, by the aid of their political friends in the North, transferred the conflict from the field to the ballot-box and the coordinate department of the Government. We meet to-day on this floor, and in the country, the same elements that our armies contended against in the field. The difference is not in the spirit of the contest, but in the fact that Andrew Johnson leads the rebels and their friends instead of Jeff. Davis. The issue is not uncertain. The friends of American liberty will triumph here as they did in the field. The nation has before it a future which history will record in spite of rebel hands. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] said the other day in a speech on this subject: "It is his

HO. OF REPS.

[the President's] right and that of every citizen to judge of the constitutionality of any act of Congress." And this he said in justification of the President's attempt to remove Mr. Stanton. The right of private judgment in regard to an act of Congress or any other subject no one will deny, but this does not carry with it the right of President or people to violate an express provision of law, however obnoxious it may be to them. By this doctrine, enunciated by the gentleman from New York, taken in connection with the application he made of it, every citizen in the land may justify himself in the violation of any law that might interfere with his unholy desires. It is the doctrine of anarchy and revolution. It is the doctrine that inspired the nullification ordinance of South Carolina in 1832, which was so summarily trodden in the dust by Andrew Jackson. It is the same which was resurrected again in 1861, and became the watchword of the rebellion. We have been told that this doctrine had been abandoned, that it had been burned out of southern soil by the fires of war. Mr. Chairman, this is but another evidence that the spirit of rebellion, overpowered and vanquished on the battle-field, is again reappearing in these representative Halls; and it is a striking admonition to the people of this country that men with the least taint of sympathy with the spirit of rebellion should not be trusted in responsible positions. It is said that the President only desired to test the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office act in the courts. This, at least, is a very poor excuse for a violation of law. Other methods were open to him. Indeed, the President has facilities for this that the other party does not possess, and the course he has chosen indicates that he did not desire that the case should be settled by the courts, but to avoid it. A writer on this subject, an able jurist, has presented the case very clearly, as follows:

"It has already been shown that a quo warranto could at any moment have been issued, if applied for by the Government, to try the right of Mr. Stanton to remain in the Department of War, and it is right to infer that this writ would have been applied for if the real purpose of the President had been to try the validity of the disputed law.

"But let us go one step further. Suppose the President had, by any of his efforts, succeeded in keeping Mr. Stanton out of the office, or in turning him out, as attempted, through General Thomas, what then would have been the condition of things?

"Simply this: no writ of quo warranto could have been issued, and the President would have been master of the situation, without any danger of a decision by the courts.

"The writ of quo warranto, as has been said, is the king's writ, and issues only at the instance of the sovereign to remedy some encroachments upon the privileges, franchises, or officers of the sovereign. It is not given to settle private and individual rights, and does not lie at the instance of one individual against another.

"This is fully settled by the following case which is familiar to lawyers, and to which I refer: Wallace vs. Anderson, 5 Wheat., 291. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court, that a writ of quo warranto could not be maintained except at the instance of the Government, and as this writ was issued by a private individual, without the authority of the Government, it could not be sustained, whatever might be the right of the prosecutor or the person claiming to exercise the office in question. The information must, therefore, be dismissed.

"It will thus be seen, at a glance, that had the President induced General Grant to hold on to the War Department, or had he placed General Thomas in the Department after ejecting Mr. Stanton, either through deception or by the use of the Army or Navy, both of which he attempted to use, there could have been no case made by quo warranto for trying the validity of the disputed law, unless such writ had been applied for on behalf of the Government; and there is nothing in this case to warrant the opinion that Mr. Stanbery would have made such application at the instance of Secretary Stanton.

"We are thus brought to conclude that the President did not proceed in the business for the purpose of having this law brought before the courts, but in order to keep it from the courts; and his present pretense being false, accumulates evidence that his motive was from the beginning criminal."

It is possible that now, when the President's so-much-talked-of desire to have the case tried in the courts promises to be gratified by giving him an opportunity to have it settled by the people's court—the highest known to the Constitution—he may adopt the course that has been open to him all the time, and by which he might have had his powers determined without a resort to revolutionary measures. I venture the opinion, however, that he will avoid anything of the kind.

But the friends of Mr. Johnson say he has committed no crime deserving of impeachment. So the same men say of Jeff. Davis and all the other traitors. They do not believe any rebel has committed any crime for which he should be punished. The South held that they had a right to secede and set up a government of their own, and they did so, and attempted to maintain it by force of arms. Mr. Johnson holds—or his friends on this floor hold for him—that he has the right to defy such laws as do not meet his approbation, and he has done so. He also held that he had the right, without consulting Congress, to reorganize governments with traitors at their head, and he did so, and the same men who sustained the former applaud the latter. In proof that I do not state the case too strongly I have but to refer to the remarkable speech made a few days since on this floor by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD.] He declared, in substance, that rather than submit to impeachment and removal by Congress the President would be justified in using the Army and Navy in such a manner as would "make an end of impeachment and impeachers." Coming, as it does, from a gentleman standing high in his party, this is a startling declaration, and if it came from a source having power to execute such a threat might well create alarm and consternation. As it is, the possibility that an attempt may be made should not be overlooked; and, being thus so explicitly forewarned, it is the part of wisdom to be forearmed.

But any effort of this kind would signally fail. The Army and Navy cannot be used for any such purpose. They are composed of law-abiding men, who cannot be induced to oppose the execution of the laws or to act in violation of their provisions. For months the President has been approaching one officer after another of the Army to persuade them to assume a position against law, and which General Grant has flatly refused to occupy, and he has but recently found one officer only who can be induced to do his bidding in this regard.

In view of threats that have been made on this floor, and, if we can credit popular rumor, at the other end of the avenue, it is a source of very great encouragement and congratulation that all the most successful soldiers of the country are ready to sustain the Constitution and the laws against presidential usurpation. Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, George H. Thomas, Sickles, Burnside, Chamberlin, Butler, Logan, Banks, Meade, and a host of others not less worthy in their sphere have proved themselves to be incorruptible. Many of them Democrats at the beginning of the war, they abandoned the party when it became the party of treason, and, mindful only of duty, contended successfully against treason in the field, and are now ready to fight the same enemies in their attempt to accomplish in the national Councils what they failed to do by the sword. With such men, aided by the rank and file of the Army, most of whom are now engaged in the pursuits of civil life, but ready to spring to arms whenever the liberty of the nation should again be imperiled, with glorious old Farragut ready to lash himself again to the mast-head, and his faithful officers and seamen, and with the millions of patriotic civilians who keep watch at the citadel of liberty, the country will stand any shock that the removal of a faithless President will cause.

But the removal of the President will produce no shock to any of the interests of the country. The threats of the friends of the President, heard on this floor and elsewhere, will end in smoke. Nobody is going to make war on Andrew Johnson's account. The gold gamblers managed to carry up the price two or three cents when the House first took action on the 22d of February, but were unable to keep it there except for a single day, when it fell back as if nothing had happened. What the business of the country needs is stability, unanimity in the councils of the nation, which cannot be had while Andrew Johnson is fighting with all the power of his high office the legislative branch of the Government. The prospect of his removal has already aroused the indignation of every rebel in the land. This we might reasonably expect. And it is not strange that those in the North who opposed us in all the most important measures to crush the rebellion should oppose us now in our attempt to remove the last hope on which they depend to establish and perpetuate rebel ascendancy in the South. On the other hand, the men who never faltered in the dark days of our history are all for impeachment. No event since the surrender of Lee has created such joy and inspired so much confidence in the hearts of the loyal millions of the country as the movement now being made to relieve them from the power of an Executive in whom they have lost all confidence. They will hail his removal from office with profound gratitude as the beginning of better days.

If it could be positively known to-day that the President would be impeached and removed from office within the next month the country would breathe freer and there would be more confidence in business circles than there has been since the beginning of the war.

In the name of the loyal people of the South struggling for free governments against presidential persecution and rebel hate; in the name of the business of the country now deranged, and in some instances paralyzed, by this obstructionist; in the name of nearly a half million brave men whose spirits went up to God from the thunder and smoke of a hundred battle-fields; in the name of the thousands of mourning widows and unprotected orphans of the men whose graves declare the price of liberty in this country; in the name of the maimed and broken-down heroes who crowd our streets, painfully reminding us of the danger of allowing bad men to continue in important official positions; in the name of that quiet and peace which the country so much needs, and of which the lawless acts of this man have so long deprived us; and in behalf of the loyal people I have the honor to represent, I demand the trial of the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and, if found guilty, his removal from the high position he has too long disgraced.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. A. J. GLOSSBRENNER, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

MR. GLOSSBRENNER. Mr. Chairman, if I could permit myself to disregard the grave consequences to the country that may, and in all human probability must, follow the consummation of what is manifestly the purpose of the majority of this House, I might contemplate with pleasure the unmistakable indications that the ultra Radicals are about to overcome all opposition in the councils of the Republican party.

If I could look with mere partisan eyes upon the events now passing before us in historic march I would be inclined to rejoice at this self-destruction—this political hari kari—of the party which has so long and successfully maintained internal dissension and estrangement throughout the land, and kept alive, by wicked appliances contrived with devilish ingenuity, a war, of which the American people hoped they had witnessed the termination when the Confederate forces under Generals Lee and Johnston were disarmed, surrendered, and disbanded.

So far, indeed, from attempting to prevent the effort to impeach the President on the flimsy pretext presented—disgraceful to its inventors, even if it were not a mere pretext—I would, as a partisan merely, aid in clearing the way, and in facilitating the progress of the now dominant Radicals to their doom.

What is this latest pretext for impeachment? The President will not consent, until it is ruled by the judiciary that he must submit to such insult and humiliation, to have thrust upon him, in intimate official relation, in close personal association, as confidential adviser, a man who has permitted himself to be guilty of what a distinguished Radical Senator has declared "a gentleman" or "a man of honor" to be incapable. This judgment of Senator SHERMAN is, by the way, accepted by all who possess a spark of manly instinct. The attempt to foist this man into the Cabinet of the President against the will of the latter will find speedy condemnation at the hands of the people, who are always just, and who instinctively love fair play. It does not require profound learning, or much consumption of oil in midnight lamps over books of law or ethics, to reach the common-sense conclusion that the President, who is held responsible for the acts of his Cabinet, should be permitted to select its members. In the merest fairness to him this should be a rule without an exception. His counselors should be friends, not enemies; they should be supporters, not opponents; they should be not only trustworthy, but trusted; certainly they ought not to be acknowledged spies in the interest of his personal and political enemies; nor should they be persons so devoid of all honorable instinct as to be willing to remain an hour in such a position after an intimation from the President that personal association with them is to him distasteful and offensive.

My distinguished friend and colleague from the Luzerne district, [Mr. WOODWARD,] with an ability so marked as to be worthy even of his exalted character as a profound and conscientious jurist, has with inexorable logic exposed and pitilessly demolished the small and shallow fallacies of those who assail the legality of the President's effort to unseat the Stanton incubus. My excellent friend from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] whose clear perceptions of right and whose legal ability and acumen the members of this House, on all sides, when partisan prejudice does not obscure judgment, all acknowledge, has shown that "the wise and philosophic purpose of the framers of the Constitution was to keep the several great departments of the Government as distinct and separate from each other as possible, to the end that neither should invade the functions of the other or usurp the powers of that other in order to strengthen itself, and erect a centralized despotism on the foundations of the Republic." The history of the formation of the Government amply sustains these views. Other gentlemen of the legal profession on this side of the Chamber, among the ablest of the House, have shown how utterly destitute of a decent semblance of legal support is this legislative assault—I was about to say conspiracy, but that might not be parliamentary, and I therefore term it assault—upon a constitutionally coördinate branch of the Government. With these arguments upon the legal aspect of this question—for, as exceptional cases, in the debate so far, they do indeed rise to the dignity of argument—I feel that the Conservatives may safely go before the people, our masters, and, gentlemen of the Radical party, your masters as well.

But, in addition to the impregnable positions taken by able members of the legal profession, we have the unerring, sober second thought of the people upon which to rely for a righteous judgment upon what you are doing here this day. Hope not to escape that judgment.

Clothe the pretended offense of the President in what garb of language you may; envelop it if you will in clouds of pompous and stilted lexicographical mystification, still will it not escape the discernment of the people. As little will the popular judgment fail to perceive the motive that prompts this prosecution in form, this persecution in fact.

Feeling that, in common with "all the people of the United States," in whose name the perpetration of this great political crime is audaciously and most unwarrantably to be urged, we must bear our share of the national shame which even the attempt without the consummation must bring; and, in common with all mankind, our portion of the incalculable injury to republican institutions that must be involved in this measure, if, in God's wrath against this nation, it should become more than an attempt, the little band of Democratic Representatives with which it is my pride to be numbered and associated on this floor have opposed this unrighteous movement step by step. Outnumbered, our rights as a minority trampled upon, every barrier established in the rules of the House by our predecessors for our protection swept away at the behest of party impatience or party convenience, we cannot prevent, and under the recently emasculated rules of the House we can no longer even postpone, this wrong. It is destined to prevail so far as this House is concerned.

The best interests of the country must undoubtedly suffer by an affirmative vote on the question before us. But within an hour this House will pass the articles of impeachment. Commerce, manufactures, all the interests of labor, mechanical and agricultural, will feel the baleful influence of this measure. Yet party malignity will not be restrained by any such considerations. The finances of the Government and the people will be ruinously embarrassed and deranged by this day's work. I can hardly conceive it possible that the majority do not perceive this to be inevitable. But not a moment will this consideration delay the passage of this indictment, nor will it affect a single vote on the opposite side of the House. The traditional and habitual trust of the American people in the security and stability of republican institutions may be impaired if not eradicated, and the hopes of all friends of civil liberty in all lands may be crushed and extinguished by the deed initiated in this House, and now only awaiting the formality of a recorded vote. Yet there will be no pause in the proceedings here. All appeals to reason, all sense of justice, all considerations of the national welfare, will be lost in the clamor for impeachment.

Why, sir, but a few days ago, the less unscrupulous members of the Republican party in this House, a majority of that party, indeed, declared formally, under oath and by vote, after months of search by a diligent, eager, able, and impeachment-seeking committee, who spared no pains to find some act, or suspicion of an act, of the President on which to hang a pretext for his impeachment, that no such act had been discovered. The President's words and actions had been subjected to examination as with a microscope, with a degree of minuteness that permitted absolutely nothing to escape rigid scrutiny—his private conversations and his private bank account not being exempt from impertinent and ill-mannered discussion—yet nothing was found involving him, even by unfriendly inference, in any act or deed that would warrant impeachment.

What has the President done since that verdict of acquittal, a verdict wrung by stubborn facts from the reluctant judgment of his enemies? Nothing more than to exercise a constitutional power that has existed and been exercised by every President, from the days of the first, greatest, wisest, and best, down to the present hour. These gentlemen of the Republican party at that time demanded triumphantly of the friends of impeachment, as Pontius Pilate did of the accusing high priests more than eighteen hundred years ago, "What hath this man done?" They could only imitate those ancient impeachers by clamorous reiteration of their demands, substituting the cry, "Impeach! impeach!" for that of their prototypes in Jerusalem, which was, "Crucify! crucify!" I make no irreverent reference to the meek and lowly Nazarene, against whom the latter cry was directed. I institute no comparison between Him and any human being, none whatever between the objects of those cries. I deal only with accusers and judges in both cases. In each there were intemperate and bigoted accusers and clamorous denunciations. In each there was a Judas. Pilate was evidently inclined to be conservative—at first; but he quailed before the clamor of the Jerusalem radicals, and although he "found no fault in this man," he did consent to his condemnation, initiating the punitive proceedings by scourging him. If that model judge were a member of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress he would probably have voted with the majority on Andrew Johnson's first and second trial before this House in favor of acquittal. But, unless he had become a better man and a more inflexible judge than history records him, the name of Pontius Pilate would be found recorded, before five o'clock this evening, in the affirmative upon the pending proposition.

Proceed, gentlemen. Go to the Senate and tell your story. You have not much of a story to tell; therefore make the most of it. Parade your ten articles—preceding the parade with a magnificent flourish, assuming that you speak for "all the people of the United States." This will be peculiarly appropriate while nine tenths of those same people stand ready to-day to impeach and convict the impeachers. Deliver your budget in small parcels, as prepared, thus:

Article 1. The President of the United States has attempted to remove Edwin M. Stanton from the office of Secretary of War.

Article 2. He has appointed "one Lorenzo Thomas" to act as Secretary of War ad interim.

The foregoing two articles would seem to ordinary intellects to embrace the whole matter, but your committee require you to further represent, in Article 3. That the President did appoint "one Lorenzo Thomas" Secretary of War ad interim.

Article 4. The President attempted to oust Stanton.

Article 5. The President, on the 21st of February, 1868, agreed with "one Lorenzo Thomas" to attempt to oust Stanton.

Article 6. The President did on the same day twice agree with "one Lorenzo Thomas" or once with each of "two Lorenzo Thomases" to attempt the same thing.

Article 7. The President did agree with "one Lorenzo Thomas" to prevent Stanton from holding the office of Secretary of War.

After proceeding thus far, the Senate will be pretty well prepared to learn, as they will by—

Article 8. That the President did agree with "one Lorenzo Thomas" to attempt to put the latter in possession of the War Department as Secretary of War ad interim.

And by—

Article 9. That the President did appoint "one Lorenzo Thomas" Secretary of War ad interim.

Tell the Senate further that the President has audaciously ventured to express an opinion as to the constitutionality of a certain provision in an act of Congress.

Be sure to label each parcel distinctly, as you deliver it, "high crime," or "high misdemeanor," or "high crime and misdemeanor," as the case may be, lest the Senate might not perceive the character or quality of the articles so delivered, and might fall carelessly into the Impeachment—Mr. Miller.

error of supposing that the numerous offenses alleged, or the one offense alleged numerously, were, after all, not very "high."

Tell the Senate, in conclusion, that in presenting these ten articles you do not by any means estop yourselves from the presentation of other accusations. Say to the Senate that you will look about and see if you can pick up anything else that the President may have done, or might, could, would, or should have done, said, or thought, of a character unpleasant to members of the legislative "Government."

Do this, and you will have complied with every requirement of "the committee"—you will have exhibited the perfection of discipline—and you will be fitted to take an humble position by the side of your leader, who boasts that he stands "outside of the Constitution."

Democrats and Conservatives can hardly bring themselves to look resentfully upon the proceedings in this House upon this question of impeachment. The whole thing is so bald and transparent a political, partisan movement that nobody can possibly mistake its character, and its effects upon the popular mind cannot but be such as to hasten and render more emphatic and terrible the fate of the moribund organization to which we are indebted for this last excellent argument against its own life. The people have already prepared a grave, wide and deep, for radicalism and its one idea of Africanization. If those for whom this grave is provided will insist upon digging it wider and deeper we should not object. Let them proceed. The people have foreshadowed their determination to put down and keep down the "cherished central thought" of this party, and have prepared to cast upon its place of sepulture mountains—

"To o'er top old Polon, or the skyish head
Of blue Olympus."

If to this comfortable and safe quantity of mundane monument those who are to enjoy repose under it will insist upon superadding—if they cry out with the frenzied Dane—

"Millions of acres on us, till our ground,
Singing his pite against the burning zone,
Make Ossa like a wart!"—

why so be it, and bon repos. To the dying, one is always inclined to be indulgent.

I am the less inclined to complain of the exhibition before us, Mr. Chairman, because I cannot be persuaded that the Senate of the United States, once the most august deliberative body in the world—that Senate where in better days intellectual kings sat enthroned in the admiration, respect, and reverence of the people—can even now, fallen as it is from its high estate and shorn of its brightest beams, seriously entertain a proposition to remove from office a President of the United States upon articles of impeachment such as these—articles that I may not characterize in fitting terms without transgressing the rules of parliamentary decorum.

I rejoice, Mr. Chairman, that when these famous ten articles are presented at the bar of the Senate there will be a larger audience than can be encompassed in the Senate Chamber. The nation will be listeners; "all the people of the United States" will hear what outrages are proposed in their name. They will hear; they will make themselves heard in return.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE F. MILLER, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

Mr. MILLER. The question now before the House is not whether Andrew Johnson, 40TH CONG. 2D SESS.—No. 17.

President of the United States, ought to be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, for that has been already decided by a more than two-thirds vote, of which the Senate has already been advised. The discussion has taken a wide range upon a question already determined. The matter now for us to pass upon is the articles of impeachment reported by the committee appointed for that purpose. They have for our action ten articles. The first three charges the President with the violation of the provisions of the act of Congress of 2d of March, 1867, entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices" in the attempt to remove Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and appointing in his stead Brevet Major General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, Secretary of War ad interim, while the Senate was in session.

The next five articles, to wit, numbers four, five, six, seven, and eight, charge the President in different forms with entering into a conspiracy with one Lorenzo Thomas, and with other persons to the House unknown, with intent by intimidation and threats to hinder and prevent Edwin M. Stanton, the Secretary of War, from holding said office, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of an act entitled "An act to define and punish certain conspiracies," approved July 31, 1861. The ninth article charges that the said Andrew Johnson, the President, unmindful of the high duties of his office, and of his oath of office, unlawfully attempted to control the disbursements of the moneys appropriated for the military service and for the Department of War; and the tenth and last article charges the President that, in disregard of the Constitution and laws of Congress duly enacted, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, did on the 22d day of February, 1868, bring before himself, then and there, William H. Emory, a major general by brevet in the Army of the United States, actually in command of the department of Washington and the military forces thereof, and did then and there as such Commander-in-Chief declare to and instruct said Emory that part of a law of the United States passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," especially the second section thereof, which provides, among other things, that "all orders and instructions relating to military operations issued by the President or Secretary of War shall be issued through the General of the Army, and in case of his inability, through the next in rank" was unconstitutional and was not binding on him as an officer in the Army of the United States.

These several articles, with some amendments which I propose to offer, I deem sufficient, if the charges therein contained can be substantiated, (of which I have no doubt;) but that, however, as I have already stated, is not the question now before us. We are preparing articles in the nature of an indictment preferred by a grand jury; and the question is whether all that is set forth in any of the different charges should be substantiated by evidence, or, the same being demurred to, would justify a conviction under the provisions of the Constitution. This is an important question, as we must expect to be met, on the part of the President, with some of the best legal talent in the land; and every technical objection, no doubt, will be taken, and we must not expect that the undertaking of an impeachment is so easy a task as some on this floor seem to imagine.

It must be remembered that the court before which this House will be called upon to substantiate the charges against the President is an august body, being the highest tribunal in the land, and presided over by an able jurist, (the Chief Justice.) All political considerations ought and must be discarded, for every man, however, derelict in duty, is entitled to a fair and impartial trial. I think the committee have been very careful in drawing up the articles, but I would suggest that in the different articles where the President is charged with violating his oath of office, that it be set forth that he was, on the death of Mr. Lincoln, the regularly elected President of the United States, duly sworn in to discharge the powers and duties of that office of President; for when a charge can be made clear and beyond cavil it had best be done, which may save considerable time in the trial.

The first charge which is contained in the first three articles, of violating the provisions of the act of 2d March, 1867, entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," if made out, is sufficient to convict the President of a "high misdemeanor." It is no excuse for him or his friends to say that the law is unconstitutional, for it is his sworn duty to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and as long as any law remains on the statute-book unreversed it is his sworn duty to obey it; and it is no palliation for him that he withheld his signature, for when it was returned with his veto and passed both Houses by a two-thirds vote it became a law, under the Constitution, with a like effect as if it had received the signature of the President.

But I do not wish to be understood, Mr. Speaker, as doubting the constitutionality of that law. Then, as to the conspiracy charged in articles four, five, six, seven, and eight, seem to be properly laid and with due caution in various forms to avoid cavil. I would, however, advise, as I have already stated, to set forth that Andrew Johnson, the Vice President, on the death of Mr. Lincoln was sworn by the Chief Justice to discharge the powers and duties of the office of President.

The ninth article, which charges the President, in violation of his oath of office and duties, with attempting to control the disbursements of moneys appropriated for the military, seems to be laid with caution; and if substantiated by proof and found by the Senate to be true will of itself be sufficient to remove Mr. Johnson from office.

Then the tenth and last articles, which charge an attempt to induce General Emory to violate the clear mandates of the statute, seem to be very properly laid; so that as a whole, Mr. Speaker, the committee deserve credit for the careful manner in which they have prepared the several articles; and I am glad that they have confined the charges within reasonable bounds, which will render it unnecessary to have the trial prolonged, and at the same time give the party accused ample time to present his defense. The two additional articles I intend to offer will, in my opinion, save cavil; and in presenting a case of such vast importance we ought to be cautious and allow no escape upon a mere technical objection, and especially when we can lay every charge in such a way as to meet all legal objection that might be made, it is our duty to do so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are about to vote upon these articles; and though much has been said by both parties on this floor as to the guilt and innocence of Mr. Johnson, the acting President of the United States, upon whom, under the Constitution, were devolved the powers and duties of President for the balance of the term for which Mr. Lincoln was elected, provided he so long lived or committed no offense for which he should be removed from office. The only question is as to the sufficiency of these articles, which, if approved by this House, are to be sent to the Senate, at whose bar it will devolve upon us to maintain the charges therein contained; and I trust the trial may be conducted (as I have no doubt it will) with due regard to its magnitude, so that the country and the world may see that this young Republic, whenever assailed, will vindicate its integrity, and that no officer thereof, however high, shall escape condign punishment if guilty. And in conclusion, let me say that I trust this great work may be entered upon with due deliberation and that justice may be done to both the United States and the accused.

SPEECH OF HON. W. S. HOLMAN,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 7, 1868.

The House, as in the Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the President's annual message—

Mr. HOLMAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The attention of the House has been called this morning to two of the great subjects of this period, the tariff and the payment of the public debt. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has argued that the public debt should be paid in coin, while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] urges that the prosperity of the country demands an increase of the tariff. These gentlemen present the views of the Republican party, of which they are distinguished members, in their respective sections of the Union. The tariff and the public debt are closely allied. The tariff and internal taxation being the only agencies by which the public exactions can be met, I differ with these gentlemen on both of these questions. If the payment of the entire national debt in coin and the increase of the tariff, which now almost reaches the point of prohibition, are measures calculated to promote the interests of the people of Maine and Pennsylvania, I am very certain, sir, they are measures at war with the interests of my constituents. I do not pretend, sir, to any peculiar learning on the great questions of finance and political economy which affect the destinies of nations—questions which have staggered the greatest intellects of every age; yet, sir, the main questions of finance connected with the public revenue and the public debt and the duty of the people of this Government with regard to their national obligations are clearly within the comprehension of every citizen. For the first time in history the people themselves, on whom the burdens of Government rest, decide the questions connected with a great national debt, and fortunately, sir, the whole people are informed of the nature of their obligation, and able to determine with justice the rights of the public creditors.

And here, sir, there occurs inevitably a divergence of opinion, for political parties in a free State are the inevitable result of difference of opinion on fundamental principles of Government. The questions which affect the relations of labor and capital are either directly or remotely the foundation of all political parties. In monarchies the interests of capital are always in the ascendant, for it is manifestly the policy of a strong Government to centralize its wealth; hence the universal oppression of labor. Hitherto in our own country the general distribution of wealth has prevented any direct antagonism between the interests of capital and the interests of labor, yet on the incidental questions which have sprung up in our country affecting these two great interests capital has ever obtained the advantage, for from its very nature it can readily concentrate its power, and never hesitates to demand the advantage, and is never wanting in a plausible pretext.

We encounter for the first time in our history a great national debt. The debts created by former wars were too inconsiderable to excite solicitude, but the debt now upon us, from its magnitude and the nature of the obligations, justly excites a serious apprehension that it will for many years greatly oppress every department of industry, and, more than all, tend to change the genius and spirit of the Government. With every consideration for the magnitude of the war, it is scarcely credible that a debt of such magnitude could be contracted in so brief a period. A few men, officers of the Government and capitalists, have determined the magnitude and regulated the form of this debt. While the war absorbed the attention of the whole people public vigilance was impossible, and the most remarkable feature, next to the magnitude of the debt, is the unexampled rapidity with which the wealth of the nation has been centralized and the comparatively small number of persons who have become the holders of the vast body of the public securities.

It was apprehended by the holders of these securities both in Europe and at home that a people who had been so long almost exempt from taxation would be restive under the heavy exactions of such a debt, a debt greater, the rate of interest considered, than was ever before born by any people; hence the effort of the bondholders in 1866 to secure the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution before the nature of the debt had been fully considered, that the people might be precluded from considering the nature of their obligations. But that ingenious device failed; and the forbearance with which the people are now considering the nature of the debt and what is justly due to the bondholders furnishes the highest guarantee that the public honor will be maintained. On what basis shall the debt be paid?

The drift of the great political parties of the country on this question cannot be misapprehended. The gentleman from Maine has spoken the general sentiment of the Republican party, the party which represents the great body of these public securities—a party which, from its very nature, from the character of its leaders, from its elements, and its theories of public policy, is, on a question like this, inevitably on the side of capital. The gentleman insists that the debt should be paid in coin, and with his usual ability and force of argument has presented the whole question, and insists that every consideration of public policy demands that the bonds shall be paid in coin.

The gentleman demands justice for the bondholder. For one I am in favor of even-handed justice to that class of our citizens; or, whether they be citizens or not, I am in favor of even-handed justice to the holders of our public securities. I do not think the nation can afford to violate its plighted faith. I think that every consideration of honor, of national preservation, and of regard for the future calls upon the nation to carefully preserve its honor from even the taint of suspicion.

But, on the other hand, I think nothing is clearer than that, in determining what is just to the holders of our public securities, the fact cannot be lost sight of that those upon whom rests the obligation of paying these public securities, and the annual interest accruing thereon, have the same right to demand even-handed justice at the hands of their Representatives.

The capitalist has no greater claim to justice than the masses of our people, upon whose labor the whole fabric of the public debt rests, who give to these bonds all the value they possess, and in whose keeping is the public faith. To the bondholder the public debt may be a public blessing, but to the laboring taxpayer and to his wife and children it is a grinding curse. The laboring men, in the main, filled the ranks of your gallant army. The capitalists furnished the money, and the laboring men are now called upon to pay the debt. The capitalists have made no sacrifice at all, and yet claim every exemption, no taxation, and gold for bonds purchased with currency depreciated from thirty to one hundred and eighty per cent. below the value of gold.

Mr. Speaker, common justice to the bondholder and to the people who are to pay the bonds demands that the debt should be paid off upon the basis upon which it was made, and it cannot justly be paid off upon any other basis. The Representative who favors the interest of bondholders at the expense of the labor which gives value to the bonds is chargeable with manifest injustice, for if either interest is to be preferred, capital or labor, does not the conscience of every man tell him, unless it be influenced by mercenary considerations, that labor should have the preference?

On the last day of March, 1868, our debt amounted to $2,519,829,622 84. The interest for this current year is $129,678,078 50, and of this amount of interest $119,961,958 50 is payable in gold. The appropriations for the expenses of the Government for this current year, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, besides the interest on the debt, is $182,183,736 92, making the entire expenditure for this current year, according to the estimates, $311,861,804 92. And to illustrate the magnitude of the expenditures for the present year, it will be remembered that the appropriations for the last year of Buchanan's administration were $66,703,592 46. It cannot be disguised that even if the Government was administered on principles of severe economy the burdens upon the country would be exceedingly oppressive, and it is certainly proper to reduce the demands upon the industry of our people to the lowest point consistent with justice. The nation can afford to be just, but nothing more. The principal of the public debt, except the ten-forty bonds, amounting to $212,784,400.00, is clearly payable in lawful money. The greenbacks now in circulation amount to the sum of $356,157,747.

If the people pay this debt of $2,519,828,622 on the basis on which it was contracted—dollar for dollar—if they pay in lawful money that part of the debt which is not specifically payable in coin, and pay in coin that portion expressly payable in coin, it is all that the bondholder can ask. When he asks more he asks that, for his benefit, injustice shall be done to the people on whose industry rests the value of his securities. The gentleman from Maine dwells on the consequences of issuing the vast amount of legal-tender notes necessary to extinguish the debt, and predicts universal ruin. I do not understand that any person proposes to issue enough legal tenders to pay off this entire debt at once. I understand that those who demand justice for the people take the simple ground that the basis on which the debt was contracted is the basis on which it should be paid. If, while this debt was being contracted between the year 1861 and 1865, we had outstanding currency amounting to some eight hundred and fifty million dollars, and on the basis of that amount of currency this debt was contracted, on that basis it ought to be paid. It is scarcely possible for any gentleman to argue that if it is necessary to raise $300,000,000 a year for the purpose of paying interest on the public debt and carrying on the Government, that that sum can be raised as well with a currency of $650,000 as it could be on a basis of currency corresponding with that which existed at the time the debt was contracted—$850,000,000. Indeed, it would probably be just to assume that the currency of the country during the time our debt was being contracted, every element of currency considered, actually exceeded $900,000,000.

The bonds were purchased with this currency dollar for dollar, while the difference between the currency and gold was from thirty to one hundred and eighty per cent. Is it an unreasonable proposition that it is the right and duty of this Government, while this heavy weight rests upon its industry, to keep in circulation, stimulating the various branches of labor, an amount of currency substantially equal to that on which the debt itself was made? Can the public creditor complain of this? Why, sir, the holders of our securities—the five-twenty bonds of the classes that were first issued purchasing with currency—hold them at a cost to them of about forty-three cents on the dollar on the basis of gold. I assume, therefore, not as the result of any investigation of my own, but on the authority of those who carefully investigate questions of finance, that if you reduce the currency until you can reach specie basis you in fact increase the value of the bond the difference between currency and gold at the time the bond was issued, the value of the bond in gold will after all substantially depend upon the amount of lawful money in circulation, if the debt is redeemable in currency. If you reduce the paper until you reach a point where gold and paper are worth exactly the same you have really added fifty-seven per cent. to the value of the security in the hands of the holder, so that you may as well pay the whole debt in gold as to reduce the currency to the gold standard. Nothing can be more manifestly unjust than this, for if the debt had been made on the basis of gold it would have scarcely exceeded $1,250,000,000, instead of $2,500,000,000; and it requires no knowledge of finance to perceive it. It is not necessary to master more than the simplest rules of political economy to see that if you contract a debt on an inflated currency of $850,000,000, and then reduce that currency down to $425,000,000 for the purpose of making currency and gold of the same value, you by that process inevitably increase the value of a bond payable in currency to the amount of difference between the value of gold and currency with $850,000,000 of it in circulation.

Finances—Mr. Holman.

It is against this that the Democratic party protests. And here the different positions of the advocates of the interests of capital and the advocates of the interests of labor are clearly developed. The Democratic party of the great West and, in the main, throughout the country—for we have voices from the Democracy of the States of Maine and Pennsylvania echoing back the voice of the West—are resolved on the payment of this debt upon the basis on which it was contracted, dollar for dollar, maintaining good faith to the bondholder and good faith to the laboring man.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he is anxious to have the paper currency of the country continue depreciated?

Mr. HOLMAN. My answer is no. The whole antecedents of the great party with which I have acted have favored a specie currency as favorable under ordinary circumstances to the interests of labor. For there can be nothing clearer than that a currency, the value of which is recognized by all nations, is the best representatives of value. Gold is a currency better adapted to the interest of the whole people, bringing capital down to a proper basis and securing to labor a just and certain equivalent.

But, sir, we are in an anomalous period of our history, and the question is not what is the best currency for the general business of the country, to regulate or represent the value of labor and capital, but what currency will justly meet the present exigency of the nation. We have contracted a great debt in a currency greatly under the value of gold. Shall we pay the debt in the same currency, or pay in a currency of much greater value? You increase the value of the legal-tender currency just as you diminish the amount in circulation. If we had no debt we should have no divided opinion. The question is not what is the best currency, but in what currency should this debt be paid? If you reduce the currency and reach a specie basis you inevitably increase the burdens of the people, because in fact you require them to pay a larger sum of money—a greater value—than they received for the bonds they are required to pay.

Mr. UPSON. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: if we raise the value of paper currency to par, do we thereby increase the value of gold?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not. The pertinency of the question is not very apparent. Either the gentleman or myself do not fully comprehend it.

Mr. UPSON. My point is this: if the paper dollar is worth a gold dollar I do not know why it would not pay the debt just as well as gold.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no question about that. Does not the gentleman know that if you contract a debt on the basis of a volume of currency amounting to $850,000,000 and you reduce the currency to $300,000,000 to reach a specie basis, you do in fact, waiving any fine-spun theory of political economy, substantially if not more than double, the value that must be paid to redeem the debt? The gentleman would reach the point where the gold and paper dollar would be of the same value, but to do this you must increase the value of the paper dollar by reducing the amount in circulation. If you can do it in any other way you will not increase the burden of payment, and yet you would increase the value of the security as you would pay in a more valuable currency. But this is mere speculation; you can only for the present increase the value of legal-tender notes by reducing the amount in circulation, and just to that extent you pay more than you agreed to pay by your bonds. If you increase the currency beyond what it was when the bonds were issued and pay the bonds in that currency the holder of the bond may complain. If you diminish the currency as you have done you simply enhance the currency value of the bond by increasing the value of the currency in which it is to be paid, and the people may justly complain of this.

The gentleman says it is the interest of the Government to come to a specie basis. The general proposition is correct. But I answer that the condition of our affairs renders it impossible, and unjust if it were possible; because in doing it you double the burden upon labor and increase the value of capital represented by these bonds.

Gentlemen talk about justice to the bondholders. It may be regarded as a settled law of this land that a debt incurred prior to the issue of legal tenders, or by its terms expressly payable in gold, is payable in lawful money, made lawful money and a legal tender by act of Congress. If the gentleman owes me a debt incurred on the 7th of March, 1861, and I demand payment, he pays me in lawful money of the country; so if the debt is expressly payable in gold. The courts have deliberately held it to be a lawful payment, although at the time the debt was contracted it was then payable in specie, then the only lawful money recognized by our laws. We issue bonds, sell them for the lawful money in circulation, the bondholder becomes a creditor of the Government, the bond payable in lawful money, and he demands payment of his debt in gold. Will any fair-minded man say that his debt is entitled to any greater consideration than any other debt? If it was just for the Government to pay the pensions of the soldiers of the Revolution, three of whom survived until near the close of the late war, and the pensions of the soldiers of all the subsequent wars up to the late civil war, when at the time their pensions accrued gold and silver were the only lawful money, in lawful money, greenbacks, is the bondholder entitled to greater consideration?

Mr. AXTELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him what are the greenbacks to be paid in?

Mr. HOLMAN. They are payable, sir, at the pleasure of the Government in whatever the Government of the United States declares to be lawful money. It must be regarded as the established law of the land by judicial decisions, that United States notes made lawful money by act of Congress are lawful money—not a promise to pay a debt hereafter or at present, but money—representative of value for all the uses of social, domestic, and political life. Congress may regulate the value of money, and the fact that United States notes are money rests upon not only the acts of Congress, but also on the almost uniform decisions of the courts of justice, and, more than that, on the public wealth and faith of the nation. When in the future we shall reach a specie basis coin will be lawful money as it is now, and it will then be to the interest of the whole people that the currency that shall regulate values shall be the currency which is lawful money in the judgment of all nations. But, sir, the legal-tender notes, "United States notes," are money, legal representatives of value in the proper sense of the word, and have just as much value as an artificial representative of values as pieces of gold and silver on which the Government has stamped a similar declaration of value. I say this with reference to legal representatives of value, the artificial convenience of commerce and of political society. We have acted on this idea without embarrassment for seven years; and all this is true while gold has an intrinsic value which paper does not possess.

Mr. BLAINE. Each legal-tender note says upon its face that the United States promises to pay a dollar. What is that dollar that they promise to pay?

Mr. HOLMAN. The dollar which they promise to pay is what they themselves declare to be a dollar.

Mr. BLAINE. What do they declare to be a dollar?

Mr. HOLMAN. They declare that United States notes shall be received in payment of all dues, except certain duties on imports, and shall be lawful money.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman does not touch the question. I hold in my hand a note on which "the United States promises to pay ten dollars." It does not promise to pay that note. That is the evidence of the promise. Now, what is it that they promise to pay?

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the gentleman a little technical? Is not that looking at the form of the instrument instead of the substance of the instrument? When Congress declared that paper which the gentleman holds in his hand to be lawful money, did they not give it the effect of lawful money as a means of representing values for the extinguishment of debt just as much as if they had declared a piece of gold to be of that value as lawful money?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Maine mention the difference?

Mr. BLAINE. I will mention the difference. The gentleman will see that the United States have, by various laws, established that a certain number of pennyweights of gold shall constitute a lawful dollar, and when this war broke out the United States issued some paper promises to pay, which were redeemable in those dollars. They found they were not able to redeem them, and they then issued indefinite promises, not being able then to assign a date when they would give gold, but it was none the less an honorable obligation on the part of the United States to pay a dollar at some time; and the gentleman entirely confuses logic and history and fact when he says the United States declares that that piece of paper is a dollar. On its face it is a promise to pay a dollar. It nowhere says that it is a dollar. It is merely a promise to pay a dollar; and so long as it is not redeemed—and here is the gentleman's point—the United States says that that promise of its own shall circulate between its citizens as though it were paid; but it is not a dollar; it nowhere declares itself to be a dollar; it is nothing else than a promise to pay a dollar, and so long as it is not paid it is suspended paper, just as much as the gentleman's paper would be if he did not pay it when it fell due.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is money? A convenient agent of commerce, a method of exchange, a representative of value, a regulation of political society. I owe the gentleman ten dollars and I promise to pay him that much money. I tender him such a note as he holds in his hand. The law has declared it to be lawful money—lawful ten dollars, which he is bound to receive in extinguishment of his debt. The Congress, with the sanction of the courts of justice, have declared the paper which my friend holds in his hand to be ten dollars and receivable in extinguishment of a promise to pay that much money by the citizen or by the Government. To draw a distinction between this money and any other kind of money is a mere play upon words. Congress has declared that these United States notes shall "be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States," except duties on imports and interest on bonds and notes payable in coin; these notes are money by the same authority that gold coin is made money, their commercial value as money is fixed by law. There is nothing in the objection that this money is not money; it is money after all. The people themselves fully appreciate this money. They are satisfied with the lawful money they have made. They insist that it is sufficient for the ordinary transactions of business between citizen and citizen. And if a debt payable by a citizen to a citizen is under the law of the land redeemable in this lawful money, declared to be lawful by a law of the land for the payment "of all debts public and private," will you tell me why a similar debt should be paid in gold, when the nation—the whole people are the debtor?

But I do not propose to stand upon that ground. I think, as a matter of public policy, it is better that this nation should pay off this debt upon the exact basis upon which it was made, in gold where the agreement was to pay in gold, and in lawful money where the agreement was to pay in lawful money, or where the particular money was not expressed, and the justice of paying in lawful money where the debt is not expressly payable in coin, is clearly manifest; indeed, the agreement to pay in coin a debt contracted in a currency of less value is clearly unjust to the people. But it is better to live up to our contract, hard and unconscionable as it was, than that the slightest suspicion should rest upon the integrity or honor of the nation. Until we can pay the principal of the debt in lawful money let the interest be paid in coin.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to a question.

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman says that the paper greenback dollar is a dollar because it is made lawful money by the Government of the United States. I want to know whether he means us to understand him to say that the paper dollar and the gold dollar are precisely equal in value because the law of the United States also makes the gold dollar lawful money?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly. I suppose there is actually but little intrinsic value in gold or silver in comparison with the value attached to it as a circulating medium by the common consent of civilized nations. I suppose nothing is more clearly established in this Government, now, though certainly it was not dreamed of eight years ago, than that the Government can impress upon whatever it thinks proper a given value as an agent of commerce; and that for all practical purposes in all dealings of the Government with its citizens, and between citizen and citizen in the extinguishment of debt and the ordinary business relations of life, that which is declared to be money by the supreme law of the land becomes in fact the standard of value, just as much as gold and silver are made the representatives of value by law.

I know there is a greater intrinsic value in a piece of gold than in the bit of paper I hold in my hand. It is valuable for many purposes of civilized life. It is valuable because of its comparative scarcity and durability; it furnishes a convenient medium for the commerce of the world. Iron is also one of the most valuable of metals, actually of infinite more value than gold. The Spartan law-giver thought an iron currency better than a gold or silver currency. Iron and paper are the great agents of civilization; they are of actual and inestimable value, while the value of gold is purely artificial. Yet it is valuable as a common representative of value among all nations. The artificial interests of commerce have made it money just as our laws stamp this monetary value upon a piece of paper. The value of the gold dollar and the value of the paper dollar equally depend on the law of the land as an agent of commerce. In the ordinary channels of business in the common, every-day affairs of this nation, this paper dollar becomes in fact as it is in law a legal standard of value.

But all this develops the fact that the Republican party, which now controls this nation, and has done so for eight years, the policy of which rendered this money indispensable, has always, in its ingenious theories, its modes of thought and methods of reasoning, favored that policy which would promote the interest of capital, making the rich richer and the poor poorer. You put out this money; you contract an enormous debt on the basis of this money; you pay the pension of the widow and orphan child of the dead soldier in this money. It was good enough to pay for the blood of the soldier; it is good enough for the people; but the bondholder must have a more valuable money; it is not good enough for the wealthy capitalist. You never lose sight of the peculiar interests of capital; and the theory upon which the Republican party seek to control the destinies of this Republic is in fact the supremacy of capital; and that party now seeks, as it has from the beginning, to make that interest paramount to the interest of labor. That labor, which upholds the whole fabric, Government and debt, must dig the soil and toil in the workshop, but its privations and sufferings excite no compassion. The overgrown power of this party, conscious of its strength and deluding to its purposes even the honest patriotism of the people, bends its energies to the interest of capital alone. In the same line of policy, following the same mode of reasoning, that party established the national-banking system.

And, sir, while three months ago there was reason to indulge the hope that the common demand of the people would speedily result in the removal of that feature of financial policy, to-day the power of this national-bank system is clearly seen. I believe that this Congress will go on, not simply through its present session, but the next, and this measure of oppression, this great financial and political power, will remain unshorn of its strength. Under this system an organization, with a mere handful of capitalists, obtain the benefit of $300,000,000 of money; the interest on this vast sum and the benefit of the political power which it commands. Yet the condition of the country and of our public affairs was such that without any embarrassment, and in perfect harmony with our financial system, the people might have had the benefit of this enormous amount of circulation in the form of legal-tender notes. One of the elements of the profits of this banking system is the interest on $300,000,000 of currency furnished to the banks by the Government, which, at six per cent., only secures them the annual sum of $18,000,000. At the lowest rate of interest, $18,000,000 a year as a bonus from the Government!—a sum equal to one fourth part of the entire appropriations made to carry on this Government in the last year of a Democratic administration. And yet, gentlemen say that this party is not in the interest of capital. The enormous profit resulting from this vast volume of currency should inure to the benefit of the whole people. What right has a few bondholders to this enormous profit at the expense of the people? The system should be abolished and $300,000,000 of the money of the people substituted for the currency of the banks, and thus paying off $300,000,000 of your gold-bearing bonds, saving $18,000,000 per annum in gold. When the people shall have an opportunity to speak, when the issue shall be fairly presented, the wrong and injustice involved in this entire system of policy will be remedied; the people will demand the abolition of the national banks, and the substitution of the lawful money of the country for the circulation of the banks, so that the people themselves may have the benefit of the enormous profit resulting from the system of paper money. To doubt this, sir, would be to underrate the intelligence of the people and their appreciation of their own rights.

But the party that has built up this policy will stand by their offspring. They will rely on their enormous financial power and their political influence upon the affairs of the country. That great statesman, Andrew Jackson, trembled for the political rights of the people of this nation when it was proposed to organize a national banking system with $60,000,000 of capital. But now labor is obliged to resist a system in which $600,000,000 of capital are concentrated in a common interest for a common end, the interest of capital. These banks are vigilant in evading taxation. In the State which I in part represent the poorest citizen who is subject to a tax pays a larger amount of tax to the town or city in which he lives than the overshadowing national bank organized in the same community. In Indiana these banks are totally exempt from municipal taxes. Taking the country throughout, the taxation borne by the national banks is nothing compared with the benefits of the capital which they enjoy. They pay but the pitiful sum of one per cent. per annum as a tax on their $300,000,000 of circulation and nothing on their $300,000,000 of bonds; and they loan out to the laboring men and smaller capitalists of the country at twelve and fifteen per cent. per annum the money furnished them by the Government, on which they pay but one per cent. This is but a specimen of the unconscionable profits realized under this system since its first organization.

As a result of all this, these national banks, after declaring annual dividends of from ten to twenty per cent., have actually in three years added more than sixty-five million dollars to their capital. See how carefully the Republican party has nurtured these objects of their munificence. Three hundred millions in bonds, on which they receive their six per cent. interest in gold, wholly exempt from taxation; $300,000,000 in national bank currency, which is printed and furnished to them by the Government for one per cent. per annum; and the shares, at least in Indiana, wholly exempt by a Republican Legislature from all municipal taxation. No wonder they have accumulated in three years $65,000,000 of a surplus fund, every dollar of which is wrung from overtaxed labor.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Logan] some days since proposed that a tax of two per cent. for national purposes should be imposed on the national bonds. Under the acts of Congress and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the States have no power to tax the securities of the Government. But the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is one clearly admissible. Nothing can be clearer than that the very proposition which denies the power of State and municipal bodies to impose a tax on such securities implies necessarily that a tax may properly be imposed on such securities by act of Congress; and it seems to be the wiser policy that the tax should be imposed by the General Government. It is better, because then the tax would inure to the benefit of the whole people and would be properly applied to the immediate extinguishment of the debt, or rather, to the extent of the tax, would be in effect a reduction of the interest.

But, Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the purposes of the gentleman, I apprehend his proposition receives little favor at the hands of his political friends in this House. I apprehend this measure will not even be pressed upon the serious consideration of Congress by the men who control legislation in such a form as will be at all likely to secure its enactment into a law. I hope I am mistaken, sir; but, with the strong sympathy of Congress with these overgrown capitalists, I see but little hope for a measure in the interests of the people.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman state it as his judgment that the Democratic side of this House will vote for that proposition or anything like it? Will the gentleman himself vote to tax United States bonds two per cent. and take the amount of the tax off the coupons?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. And take it off the coupons?

Mr. HOLMAN. It has to be taken off the coupons.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman know that the forty-five members on his side of the House will vote with anything like unanimity for that?

Mr. HOLMAN. This has not, so far as I am aware, been the subject of any consultation among the Opposition members of the House. As for myself, I introduced a proposition in the early part of the session that a tax should be imposed by the General Government upon these bonds—the purpose to tax them being by strong inference expressed in the laws authorizing their issue—substantially equal to that imposed on other property for State and local purposes in the various States. I assume that, for the present, at least, the tax imposed for State municipal purposes throughout the northern and western States of the Union—I do not know how it may be in the South—is now equal to about two per cent. on the general value of property. There is not even a plausible argument against imposing upon these bonds a corresponding tax, and thus substantially equalizing taxation.

The argument against allowing State taxation was apparently a sound argument. It was made here years ago; I have heard it time and again on this floor. It was that if a State was permitted to tax the Federal securities it might, in an unfriendly spirit, render them worthless by excessive and unequal taxation. That argument, however, does not apply to a tax imposed by the Federal Government.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand the gentleman as speaking for the Democratic side of the House—of course he must be speaking for that side when he arraigns the other side—and I understand him to say he is opposed to local taxation of the national bonds.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly; if he will answer my question first he may catechise me as much as he pleases. Do I understand him to be opposed to State or local taxation?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman did not so understand me, and he has got to be franker and fairer if he expects me to yield to him. I have not said a word from which he can fairly draw the inference he does.

Mr. BLAINE. You said you had heard the argument fifty times that States might tax these bonds out of existence, and you said that was a good argument.

Mr. HOLMAN. I say it was a good argument. The gentlemen will remember years ago when both of us were here, a proposition was brought forward to allow the States to tax these bonds to the same extent and in the same manner as other similar property. I say that that principle is right. I have always contended for it. But the gentleman's State, perhaps, being favorably located for many appliances connected with the war, has become more extensively a bondholding State than my own.

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; the State of Maine suffered ten dollars per capita where yours did one.

Mr. HOLMAN. The facts are shown by the bank deposits, and appear from the last annual message of Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts. The eastern States were enabled to accumulate vast sums in the shape of Government securities. These securities are held mainly in the East. I submit that inasmuch as the national debt rests upon the labor of the whole people it is just and proper that the tax should be imposed upon the national securities in such manner as that its benefits shall inure to the whole people. This you accomplish by a national tax. If you tax the six per cent. bonds two per cent., reducing the interest in effect to four per cent. in gold, you would still pay a greater interest than England pays on any of her securities. It is the only practical mode, too, of reaching the whole of the bonds, less subject to exception, fairer in the estimation of all fair-minded men, than the project either of the Senate or the House, refunding bills upon a basis of a five per cent. security.

I answer the question of the gentleman from Maine. I thought, at the period this debt was being made, the States should be allowed to impose a tax upon the bonds to the same extent, and no more, that they should tax other similar property in their limits, thus guarding against the bonds being improperly taxed. I submitted such a proposition repeatedly to the House; but now the only way you can reach the bonds, whether held by American or foreign capitalists, is for Congress to impose a tax to be taken from the coupons. It must be manifest that this is a fair and legitimate mode of taxation, and we do not require any new funding scheme, to result in the expenditure of millions in making the exchange, and opening up new expedients for the capitalists. If you tax the bonds of course you reduce their value to the extent of the tax; so you do all other taxable property, and of course you would reduce the interest to the extent of the tax. You would reduce the value of the bonds and the interest on the bonds in the same manner and to the same extent that all other property is reduced in value by taxation; to that extent you would reduce the interest. Can the bondholder justly complain of this? It only imposes on him the tax which every other citizen is compelled to pay.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to understand what the gentleman means. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that a tax of two per cent. is the tax he refers to? Does the gentleman say he is ready, and his party are ready, to tax United States bonds two per cent.?

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot say what other members of the House will do. I am quite confident the Democratic party are in favor of the taxation of the bonds to the extent of other property.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, yourself?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have said that I avor the taxation of United States bonds to the same extent, substantially, as the tax imposed in the various States of the Union upon similar property for State purposes.

Mr. BLAINE. And then you would exempt them from local taxation?

Mr. HOLMAN. They are not subject to local taxation now. Does the gentleman say under the laws now in force, with the decision of the Supreme Court unversed, there is any mode by which, for State or municipal purposes, these bonds can be taxed?

Mr. BLAINE. Now?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; now.

Mr. BLAINE. They are exempted by special contract.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the absence of that exemption?

Mr. BLAINE. They cannot. In the absence of that I have no idea they could be taxed by local authority.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then they cannot be taxed by local authority. It is clear that the legitimate and fair mode of taxation, one that no capitalist, foreign or American, can with justice object to, is to impose a tax directly by the national Government. In this way every bond will be taxed, whether held by American or foreign capitalists, and that, too, without expense, for the tax is simply deducted from the coupon. The right is unquestionable. The language of the act of Congress is—

"And all bonds, Treasury notes, and other obligations of the United States shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority."

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understand the gentleman to say that when bonds have been issued at a certain rate of interest, and running a certain number of years, Congress may come in afterward and at its mere discretion, without involving a breach of faith, resolve that those bonds shall be taxed. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] you say, proposes two per cent. Now, some other gentleman may propose three per cent. The next Congress may desire four per cent. Now, is it fair, after you have issued bonds and your creditors have paid their money for them, the mere discretion of Congress shall be the rate and measure of the tax on those bonds, and therefore the rate and measure of the interest the creditors shall receive?

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman say it is wrong that Congress should impose this tax?

Mr. BLAINE. I most unqualifiedly do say so.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman say that Congress has not the power to do it?

Mr. BLAINE. I say, sir, Congress has no more power, in honor, to violate a contract than you have.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has Congress agreed not to tax them?

Mr. BLAINE. When Congress issued a six per cent. bond they agreed it should be a six per cent. bond. They did not say it should be a four per cent. bond or a three per cent. bond. No State ever taxed a bond it issued. The gentleman cannot show where a State which issued a six per cent. bond has itself taxed that bond by withholding a portion of the interest. No instance can be shown in history where a nation has ever taxed a bond that it has itself issued. If the gentleman knows of any such instance I will be glad if he will tell us where it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not yield for a speech. I say to the gentleman—and I hope he will note the fact—I represent a State which has never violated its faith, and that State has issued five per cent. and two and a half per cent. bonds, and taxed them as she taxed other property. No capitalists who held those bonds ever dreamed they were exempted from the usual burdens of the citizen. Yes, sir; I tell the gentleman they have been taxed.

Mr. BLAINE. Were they taxed at the State treasury?

Mr. HOLMAN. They were taxed like all other property of the State. Does the gentleman make any difference as to the mode of taxation?

I do not propose, I say to the gentleman—I am not proposing to reduce the interest upon these bonds by a mere arbitrary act of Government. I only propose that the Government should exercise the ordinary power of taxation, a power which Congress has not and could not surrender. The bonds can well bear a reasonable taxation. The Government ought not to have fixed on so high an interest as six per cent. I insisted at the time that the interest was too high payable in gold.

HO. OF REPS.

Finances—Mr. Holman.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Mr. BLAINE. It is a contract.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not proposing by act of Congress to reduce the interest, but I do say those bonds, like other species of property in the United States, or the value of which exists by virtue of the laws of the United States, are the legitimate subject of taxation. And I say, further, that the capitalist who assumes that he alone shall be exempt from the ordinary burdens of taxation which rest upon the poorest laboring man in the land is the last of all mortals whose opinions or wishes are entitled to be considered by any legislative body. Shall he whose wealth is protected by Government heap on the shoulders of labor all the burdens of Government? Shall we permit the most offensive form of aristocracy to obtain a foothold in this Republic? Why, sir, it is monstrous. Inequality of taxation is the purpose and the great evil of monarchy. It grinds the face of labor. It gives the lordly, domineering spirit to the favored class which in Europe has rendered labor hopeless for centuries. It is this, sir, that breaks the manly spirit of a people. Disguise it as you may, and it is still the fatal enemy of a republic. Here, upon our own soil, in a Republic, gentlemen in the interest of capital stand up and press the argument of a pretended contract by which capitalists are to escape all taxation, while the poorest soldier in the land, wounded perhaps in the cause of his country, who, if he furnished no money, was at least content to shed his blood in its defense, is by your legislation loaded down with taxation. It is monstrous that labor should bear burdens from which wealth is exempt. It is unendurable that a citizen with a comfortable income shall pay less tax for the education of his own children than the laboring citizen of his neighborhood. Yet such is the policy which gentlemen defend; for a citizen holding your six per cent. gold-bearing securities to the amount of $16,600 (greatly above the average wealth of our people) is absolutely exempt from taxation, State or national. I believe that gentlemen on this side of the House generally favor the taxation of these securities. And I know this, sir, that the Democratic masses of this country, demand just and equal taxation and that the wealth of the country whether in the form of bonds or any other form, shall bear its just proportion of the burdens of Government.

I hope the gentleman from Maine is not overlooking all this, that when Congress adjourns, and we go before our people on appeal from the acts of Congress, the people themselves will arraign this Congress on solemn impeachment for favoring the interest of capital to the utter prostration of the interest of industry. I know that the gentleman from Illinois and other gentlemen have brought forward propositions to relieve the labor and business of the country from the present oppression. If the Republican party approved these measures why are they not adopted? The legislation of the country is absolutely in the hands of that party; a party with unexampled power. If this party is willing to promote the interest of the producing and laboring classes by proper measures of legislation why are not these measures adopted? What apology will be given to the people? What subterfuges will be resorted to? In order to escape from public indignation will gentlemen pretend that temporary obstacles were in the way of reform? What obstacles are in the way? If they are acting in good faith in these measures they will press them forward to consummation. I have no doubt, sir, without having consulted with gentlemen on this side of the House, that every gentleman here will give his support to that fundamental principle of Democratic faith, equal taxation, that labor shall not be oppressed for the benefit of capital. They will protect with even-handed justice the rights of every citizen, the rights of capital, and the rights of labor. But, if there must be discrimination, it shall be for the interests of industry and the rights of labor. But these measures of reform are in your own hands, not ours. Our number is too inconsiderable to render our support or opposition of any moment to the great party which has for the present the destinies of this nation in its keeping.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire merely to ask the gentleman a question. I hope he does not intend to do any gentleman injustice by intimating that a measure has been introduced into Congress merely for political effect?

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not intimate anything of the kind, so far as the gentleman himself is concerned.

Mr. LOGAN. Your remark was that it had been introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, but you had no idea it would be pressed?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not questioned the sincerity of the gentleman's motives.

Mr. LOGAN. No; you said you had no idea it would be pressed, meaning that it was introduced merely as a political dodge. Now, I say to the gentleman that I introduced that proposition in good faith. I am in favor of it. If I had not been I would not have introduced it. Part of the machinery of the proposed law is to collect the tax from the coupons, for the reason that I thought that would be a less expensive mode than assessing the bonds and collecting the tax as is done with reference to other property. That was the reason for it. It makes no difference whether you collect the tax from the coupons or assess the bonds and collect it like other revenue.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Allow me to suggest that it is the only mode in which it could be collected from the foreign bondholders.

Mr. LOGAN. I was going to say that that was a part of the reason that I gave in speeches last summer, that you could not collect the tax from foreign bondholders unless you collected it from the coupons when presented for payment.

Now, I say that I do intend to press that measure. I care not what may be said. I have introduced it because I believe the bonds should be taxed the same as any other property by the national Government, but not by State organizations. I intend, at the proper time, to press the bill in the House, that the House may vote on it, and the gentleman from Indiana and his friends will have an opportunity then of voting for or against it.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to prolong this discussion, but I would like to ask a question either of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] or the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] for they seem united on the proposition that the Government of the United States should tax its bonds two per cent., and that the tax should be taken out of the coupons and made sure of at the Treasury, which, of course, reduces the bonds to four per cent. securities. It would take actually two per cent. on the full, entire value of the investment. Now, the question I want answered by either of these gentlemen is this: whether, taking the United States throughout, the property of this country owned by individuals, estimated at its full cash value, pays anything like two per cent.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. It does more in Ohio. Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Oh, no.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, that, making a calculation of the taxation, municipal and national, in all the States, and aggregating it, the average is a little over two and one eighth percent. instead of two per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg to say that I think the gentleman is grossly mistaken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I really cannot yield further.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me make one statement. Take the city of New York as an example. The city of New York pays taxes on its personal property and its real estate on a basis of $700,000,000, and there is no doubt that there are $1,200,000,000 of personal property held in that city, to say nothing at all of the value of real estate.

Mr. BARNES. I will say to the gentleman that the rate of taxation in New York is over four per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. On what?

Mr. BARNES. On the personal property and the assessed value of real estate.

Mr. BLAINE. On a one fifth valuation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] that the rate of taxation he has referred to would be considered very light in Wisconsin, for there our average taxation upon the actual property valuation is over three per cent.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Has not Congress already done the very thing which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] says would be a breach of faith, if applied to bonds, in imposing an income tax upon the salaries which the Government had agreed to pay, thus reducing the amount it had agreed to pay?

Mr. BLAINE. There is no contract at all about salaries; they can all be taken away if Congress chooses.

Mr. HOLMAN. The soldier went into the Army for a fixed salary or compensation, and yet Congress exacted a portion of it from him in the shape of a tax. And I have never in this House heard the right of the Government to impose that tax at all questioned.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We upon this side of the House protested in our feeble way, and it was but a feeble way, against the tax which my friend has referred to. It is the fact, however, that upon the part of the majority side of this House no bona fide effort has ever been made to relieve him from that burden.

Mr. BLAINE. Relieve whom?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The soldier.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that any protest from this side of the House has been of but little avail. I answer the question of the gentleman from Maine, that the average tax in Indiana, State and local, exceeds two per cent. And I wholly deny the proposition of the gentleman that by any contract we are estopped from taxing these bonds. On the contrary, there is a strong implication in the laws under which these bonds were issued open to the whole world that the Government of the United States, not negatively, but affirmatively, reserved to itself the right to tax them. I deny that Congress can surrender that right. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LYNCH obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have been interrupted so much I trust the gentleman will yield me a few minutes of his time.

Mr. LYNCH. How much does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think fifteen minutes or less.

Mr. LYNCH. I will yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thank the gentleman for this courtesy. As I was saying, the Government of the United States impliedly reserved to itself the right to tax these bonds. It said in the law authorizing the issue of the bonds that those bonds should not be subject to State or municipal taxation. In saying that the Government by strong implication said that they should be subject to national taxation. There being the two taxing powers, State and national, and only the one excluded, it is too late now, with the implied reservation, for gentlemen to insist in the interest of the bondholders that the bonds shall not be subject to the same burdens as the property of other citizens. It is most unreasonable that holders of securities which you propose to pay in gold, dollar for dollar, the interest on which you are paying in gold—bonds purchased, too, with a currency greatly inflated—should have the presumption to ask for such exemption, and, more unreasonable still, that the leaders of a great party, representatives of the people, should concede their right to such exemption, and insist that they shall be entirely exempt from the burdens which press heavily upon every other class of citizens. Gentlemen forget the ancient maxim of liberty, "The safety of the people is the supreme law."

If anything could be done which would weaken the faith of the laboring portion of the people in the value of our institutions it would be this oppressive discrimination against them.

The gentleman from Illinois may press his measure for taxation, but I have no hope of its success; the Republican party is too completely under the control of the bankers and capitalists to yield to such a reform. Among other grave grounds of complaint which the people will have against this party will be that the measure which was demanded by the people with unexampled unanimity—the homestead policy—has been virtually defeated by granting away those very lands which the people expected to secure for themselves and their children to those overgrown corporations whose special agents are now thronging our lobbies. It should excite the apprehensions of the people that their interests are in peril, that the lobbies of Congress are crowded by agents in behalf of every interest of centralized wealth, tariff and banks and bonds and corporations; every interest except the interests of industry and the men of toil. This lobby influence has grown up with the Republican party into gigantic proportions and greatly controls your legislation.

It is the dangerous feature of this Government. For capital easily combines its energies; it comes here with united force; it stands at every door of the Capitol; you see it everywhere demanding protection for its own peculiar interests, while no voice is raised here in behalf of the toiling millions upon whose labor rests the whole fabric of this Government and gives to every interest its only value.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment for a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] seems to complain that if bonds be taxed two per cent. they will yield but four per cent. net interest to the bondholder. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] whether there is any interest in his State, taking it generally, which yields to the owner that rate of interest—whether Government bonds at four per cent. would not pay better than any interest in his State?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there is no interest connected with labor or industry that yields so great a return.

Mr. DAWES. How is it as to lands?

Mr. HOLMAN. Lands do not yield more than three per cent. on their estimated value. I know that in New England, where, under the protective policy, large profits are realized, realized at the expense of the labor of the western country, four, five, or six per cent. may appear a low interest, but with us it is a high interest, so far as productive industry is concerned. I do not speak of the rates of interest on money or invested capital.

But, sir, I find a key-note to the present condition of affairs in a paper published in the exclusive interest of capital. This paper furnishes some explanation of the remarkable spectacle before the country—the impeachment of the national Executive. The paper from which I propose to read a paragraph is the Iron Age, a paper devoted to the interests of the capitalist and manufacturer alone, with no word for the interests of industry, except so far as it is made subservient to accumulating and building up the fortunes of those who are already the favorites of fortune.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The paper is well named.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; it is called the Iron Age, and it is as cold and remorseless as iron. The laborer may toil and suffer, but this "iron age" has no sympathy with his struggles. I propose to read a passage foreshadowing the time when the resolute citizen who is standing up against the assailants of constitutional government shall be set aside and the Senate, not the people, shall elect a President (if such shall be our evil fortune) of the United States. Then capital may hold high carnival. When Mr. WADE becomes President, says this paper—

"No tariff act can be passed by Congress"—

I call the attention of western men particularly to this utterance—

"No tariff act can be passed by Congress too protective to receive the assent of a President who is almost a prohibitionist in his wise zeal for the development of his country's industry."

"Almost a prohibitionist!" Wisely did the people of Ohio repudiate this man, who would grind down the labor of his own people for the benefit of the capitalists of other sections of the Union, and to build up their already excessive wealth.

Again:

"No railroad-aid legislation will be too liberal to frighten an Executive who knows that the growth of a country's foreign as well as domestic trade is in exact proportion to the extension of its railway system."

Congress need not be afraid. They cannot be too liberal to railroad corporations for this generous gentleman. They may grant whatever subsidies they please, amounting it may be to millions of dollars, not to be earned by themselves, but by the toiling and tax-oppressed masses. They may grant to the railroad brokers of your great cities millions of acres of the public lands, denying to the laboring man every hope or prospect of a homestead. Oh, no; Congress cannot frighten this courageous Executive. He will be too willing to approve these schemes of plunder. Congress need not be afraid to grant these subsidies to corporations. This liberal gentleman will more than approve them. A new era is to be inaugurated; a new man is to be at the head of public affairs; a man bound hand and soul to the interests of capital. In six years you have given one hundred and twenty-five million acres of the people's land to corporations. But you need not be afraid to give more.

Sir, I wish that these two utterances could be heard and taken to heart at every fire-side in the whole northwest. I wish that every constituent of the gentleman could hear them. Let the people understand that the party in power is making a tremendous effort to thrust from the presidential office a man constitutionally elected by the voice of the people, and to place there a representative of capital eager to tax the producing interests of the northwest to swell the wealth of New England, and rob the poor man and his children after him of every hope of a homestead on God's green earth by giving the public lands to railroad corporations. Yes, sir, the rapacious grabbers at the public lands, the wealthy manufacturers, the railroad kings, and the holders of bonds may well rejoice! But there is a day of reckoning; the destinies of this nation are still in the hands of its people.

Resisting the manifest designs of the leaders of the Republican party, those opposed to their policy and who demand reform in the administration of public affairs, will appeal to the people in behalf of these great measures.

1. The payment of the public debt on the basis on which it was contracted, in the lawful money of the country, except where by express stipulation we have agreed to pay in coin.

2. The taxation of the bonds by the Federal Government to amount substantially equal to the tax imposed on other property for State and local purposes in the several States, the tax be deducted from the coupon.

3. The abolition of the national banks and the substitution of $300,000,000 of United States notes for the $300,000,000 of national bank paper.

4. Reform in national expenditure and no taxation of the people to give lands or moneys to railroad corporations.

5. A tariff for revenue and not to protect the manufacturers at the expense of the producing interests; and, more than all,

6. The speedy restoration of the Union.

Sir, at no period of history have a people encountered a power of centralized wealth equal to that which is now arrayed against the people of this nation. If they would save the Republic and hand down to their children the blessings of a Government securing the equal rights of the whole people, they must reform the administration of their public affairs, and remember that "the price of liberty is eternal vigilance."

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. R. McCORMICK,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, for the first time in the history of the country this House has met to consider the question of impeaching the President of the United States. A step so full of consequences to the whole country should only be taken after it is apparent that the acts of the President are so willfully perverse, so clearly in violation of law, and so deeply injurious to the country that a longer toleration of them is incompatible with the public safety. I confess I enter upon the discussion of this subject with feelings of deep anxiety, believing as I do that if this measure is adopted it will prove a calamity to the whole people and to all their interests. Viewing the condition of affairs from the standpoint which I have occupied during this unhappy controversy between the Executive and Congress, I can see nothing in the conduct of the President which should forfeit our confidence or justify his impeachment. It is true the President has from time to time recommended a system of public policy wholly differing from that pursued by Congress; it is true he has again and again, by the exercise of the veto power, attempted to control the action of this House; but does any one or all of these acts furnish ground upon which his removal from office may be justified?

These are the questions to be met and answered, and their importance demands the most careful deliberations of the hour. Three years have almost passed away since the close of the rebellion, and yet Congress has failed to restore the Union which has been preserved at such an immense sacrifice of life and treasure.

As one means of reconstructing the Union upon the congressional plan a Freedman's Bureau has been established by which millions of money have been expended; and after an experiment of two years we are told the condition of the black man in the southern States is worse than at the close of the war. As another means to the same end a standing army has been kept in every southern State to aid in enforcing the reconstruction laws passed from time to time by Congress; and now we are met by the humiliating confession on the part of Congress that the reconstruction acts heretofore passed by this body and vetoed by the President have utterly failed in their object, and that the millions expended by their provisions are worse than losses to the country.

Impeachment—Mr. McCormick.

To amend these abortive efforts at reconstruction this House a few weeks since presented the country with the reconstruction measure now pending in the Senate, which finds no parallel in the history of modern legislation, and which is rather the offspring of blind fanaticism and partly folly than the result of wise legislation. The first section of this act strikes from existence every vestige of civil government in ten States, obliterating State lines from the Potomac to the Rio Grande; and the vast territory thus stricken from the Union is erected into one military district, over which General Grant is placed and clothed with the untrammelled power of an autocrat.

Thus the Fortieth Congress, while acknowledging the requirements of the Constitution to secure to each State a republican form of government, has attempted to subjugate ten States to one military despotism and one third of the people of this Republic to the domination of a single man who stands above and beyond the civil law and from whose decision there shall be no appeal.

Nor is this all. The judiciary of our country, the most sacred department of the Government, is by the provisions of this act throttled in the temple of justice and denied the right to pass upon the validity of this act or extend protection to its victims. The President of the United States, because of his opposition to this system of legislation; because of his defense of the Constitution, and because of his maintenance of the prerogative of the Executive, is now held to answer for high crimes and misdemeanors by a Congress which declines to submit its own acts to a decision of the Federal judiciary. The President has stated it to be his conviction that the policy recommended by himself would have wrought a speedy restoration of the Union, would have avoided large expenditures of money involved by the congressional plan of reconstruction, and would have prevented the present unhappy condition of affairs.

It is true the President cannot demonstrate the fact that his plan of reconstruction would have been a success, because it has not been put into execution; and for the same reason Congress cannot assert it would have been a failure. That the congressional plan is a failure cannot be denied. The President declares that in his judgment the reconstruction acts passed by Congress are in violation of the Constitution. This being his conviction, he could do nothing less than by the use of the veto power attempt to prevent them becoming laws; and it may here be stated that so far as the judiciary have made decisions involving the constitutionality of principles embraced in these laws they have been in favor of the views expressed by the Executive. After a long and thorough investigation of the conduct of the President made by a committee of this House, a majority of whom are politically opposed to him, they failed to find cause of accusation against him. This result not proving satisfactory to a certain class of men in the House they succeeded in having the whole matter referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, who after another investigation arrived at the same result. But after the removal of the Secretary of War by the President a third investigation has resulted in the introduction of the resolution now under consideration. It is therefore reasonable to infer that the only ground of accusation against the President is because of the removal of Secretary Stanton, which by the committee is held to have been in violation of an act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices and a justifiable cause for impeachment.

It may be proper here to state that the act in question was devised by this Congress for the avowed purpose of controlling the President in his prerogative of removals from office, and when sent to the President for his approval he submitted it to his Cabinet ministers, each of whom pronounced it unconstitutional; and that Mr. Stanton, who now by virtue of its authority proposes to thrust himself upon the President as a member of his Cabinet, was unqualified and prominent in its condemnation as invalid, and expressed his willingness to aid the President in preparing his veto message against it. During the recess of the Senate circumstances arose which, in the opinion of the President, were sufficient cause for the removal of the Secretary of War, to do which the President believed he had the constitutional right without consulting the Senate. Nevertheless, when the Senate met he submitted to that body the reasons for his action, whereupon the Senate, by virtue of the law in controversy, claimed the power to reinstate Mr. Stanton, which it did in violation of established usage of the spirit of the Constitution and of the plainest dictates of common courtesy. Mr. Stanton, thus reinstated in the War Office, without consulting the President, and with the arrogance of usurpation itself, assumed to discharge the duties of Secretary of War independent of the President. For this insubordination Mr. Johnson again removed him, notifying the Senate of the fact, and asking the confirmation of another person, (Hon. Thomas Ewing,) whom he appointed as Secretary of War, stating it was his wish to test the constitutionality of this law by which he is deprived of the privilege of removing an objectionable officer of his Cabinet, when, under the Constitution, he is held responsible for his acts. I am unable to see in what the recent action of the President was a violation of law. His first removal of Mr. Stanton is held by no one to have been a violation of law, because the Senate was not in session at the time. It may be said, the Senate having reinstated Mr. Stanton, a second removal was a violation of law. This argument would have some plausibility if the second removal had been for the first cause; but this is not the case. The second removal was for the all-sufficient cause of insubordination.

And I aver this act of the President was in violation of no law. The act of March 2, 1867, which it is charged has been violated, provides as follows:

"Sec. 1. That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any office and shall be duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of the War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

By the provisions of the law just quoted Cabinet ministers hold their offices during the term of the President "by whom they were appointed, and one month thereafter."

Secretary Stanton having been appointed by Mr. Lincoln, and Mr. Lincoln's term of office having ended with his life, the continuance of Mr. Stanton in the Cabinet of Mr. Johnson could only be at the option of the latter.

In construing a law it is always proper to bear in mind the intention of those who made the law. That it was not the intention of Congress, in passing this law, to deprive the President of the power to choose his own Cabinet, may be proven from speeches made in Congress at the time the law was under consideration. Senator SHERMAN, in combating this very idea that the law prevented the President from removing members of his Cabinet except by and with the consent of the Senate, used the following language:

"That the Senate had no such purpose is shown by its vote twice to make this exception. That this provision does not apply to the present case is shown by the fact that its language is so framed as not to apply to the present President. The Senator shows that himself, and argues truly that it would not prevent the present President from removing the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of State. And if I supposed that either of these gentlemen was so wanting in manhood, in honor, as to hold his place after the politest intimation by the President of the United States that his services were no longer needed, I certainly, as a Senator, would consent to his removal at any time, and so would we all."

It is therefore evident the removal of Mr. Stanton does not come within the meaning of the act of March 2, 1867.

I now propose to show that this or any other law depriving the President of executive power is a violation of the Constitution, which provides "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." In defining the powers of the President the Constitution provides:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

It is therefore evident the appointing power is not exclusively with the President, for the reason that the wisdom of both the President and Senate is deemed to be necessary in judging of the capacity of those to be appointed to important offices, and to prevent an abuse of the appointing power, which might arise if confided wholly to the Executive. But so soon as the appointments are made the legislative department of the Government, as it were, loses sight of the appointee, and the whole duty of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed by those appointed to office devolves upon the Executive.

It therefore follows that to the Executive legitimately belongs the power of removal from office, a power in the hand of the Executive essential to good government, which, if exercised by and with the advice and consent of the Senate alone, would of necessity render the execution of the laws faulty and inefficient, as the President, in that state of the case, could only suggest the removal of incompetent or unfaithful officers, and that only during the session of the Senate. The Constitution confers the power and makes it the duty of the Senate to aid the Executive in appointing to office, but for the reasons just noticed it devolves the whole power of removal upon the Executive, because he is held responsible alone for the execution of the law and for the conduct of those whom he has nominated to office, and any attempt to deprive the Executive of this prerogative is in violation of the Constitution and subversive of good government. We can, therefore, arrive at but one conclusion in reference to the act of March 2, 1867, which is that it is an encroachment upon the prerogative of the President and in violation of the Constitution.

Sir, the proceedings of this day will find a place in the records of history, and men, in time to come, will point back to this Congress as a legitimate child of revolution, who, impatient of restraint and intolerant of those who differed with its views of public policy, did not hesitate to exclude from its deliberations the representatives of ten States, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which each of its members had sworn to support, and which provides:

"No State shall be deprived of its representation in Congress except by its own consent."

And which further provides:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members elected every second year by the people of the several States."

And which, in addition to these, provides:

"The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment."

In violation of each and all of these requirements of the Constitution, and after having excluded from Congress the representatives of ten millions of their countrymen, they then, in the House of Representatives and in the name of all the people of the United States, impeached Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors, preferring the same at the bar of a Senate in which the representatives of ten States have been denied admittance, and which Senate assumes all the powers and prerogatives of the Senate of the United States, in violation of the Constitution, which provides:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote."

In violation of the Constitution of the United States, which provides "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," this partial assemblage of Senators, after having hushed the voice of ten States in their council, proceed to try and vote upon the guilt or innocence of the President of the United States, assuming to themselves the power to degrade him from his high office, and by their verdict elevate their own Presiding Officer to the power and dignity of his position. I repeat the proceedings of this day will be pointed to by the future historian as another example of the unhappy effect which revolutions induce upon the human mind, and it may be for him to point to us as another evidence of man's incapacity to govern himself and the events of this hour as another step in the decline and fall of a great Republic. But I have a better hope for the country than this. I still have confidence that with the people there is safety, and that when the judgment of this House and of the Senate shall be reviewed by the people of this great Republic, they will administer to their Representatives a rebuke which will effectually put to silence that which much is heard.

SPEECH OF HON. C. T. HULBURD,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. HULBURD. Mr. Speaker, I desire the indulgence of the House the few moments allotted me to state with utmost brevity some reasons impelling me to vote as I shall on this occasion. I the more desire this opportunity in that hitherto I have steadily, though quietly, resisted the conclusion now forced upon us and the action consequent thereupon.

When the impeachment of the President was first formally brought before the House by the Judiciary Committee I voted against a continuance of the prosecution, or a further consideration of the subject at that time. This was done, not that I did not then believe the President quite likely more than once had overstepped the law; not but that I thought in the unprecedented turmoil of the times more than once he had trespassed very considerably upon the spirit, if not the very letter of the Constitution. I confess, however, I was slow to believe that, deliberately, persistently, he purposed such violations. I did not, therefore, feel like imputing criminality for what might but have been an error of judgment or an unconsidered inadvertence; I did not feel like hastily putting on trial—and a most damaging trial I knew it must be, however it technically eventuated—the Chief Magistrate of this nation. Others may make light of such a spectacle; others, as was said by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] may feel that "it is not a solemn occasion," to arraign as a criminal before all the people of the United States the constitutional head of this great representative Government; the only existing Government whose free institutions have made it the envy and the jealousy of the peoples and the potentates of the universal world. I am not ashamed to confess I contemplate such a spectacle and the results with sorrow and solemnity, and great humiliation of soul. Yet to-day, penetrated with the conviction that it must needs be, I bow in acquiescence, and take my humble place in the procession of this day's momentous proceedings.

I do not propose to catalogue the President's minor malfeasances, short-comings, or oversteppings. I freely admit that the rôle which circumstances have compelled him to enact has been unprecedented, most diversified, and most difficult. But he will not be tried for mere derelictions, party-wise or political; but for "high crimes and misdemeanors" positively committed against the laws and Constitution of his country.

He will not be arraigned for his unparalleled and profligate exercise of the pardoning power in behalf of deserters, rebels, and counterfeits; he will not be arraigned for removing loyal, upright, and faithful officials, and appointing in their stead and retaining in office incompetent, flagitious, and corrupt men, obsequiously zealous only to do his bidding; he will not be arraigned for surrendering millions of public property to unshriven and unrepenting traitors, without compensation, right, or reason, or cause, save his own autocratic will. Passing over all such petty peccadilloes in his executive career, I might, perhaps, instance as deserving impeachment his usurpation and continued exercise of political—perhaps I ought rather to say legislative—functions clearly outside of the executive prerogative. I refer particularly to his management of the rebel States from and after the collapse of the rebellion. Whether this chiefest feature of his "policy" will be made one of the counts of his impending indictment I know not. The people have already passed upon it in accord with the saying of the wise man of old, "in the multitude of counselors there is safety," more than in the heart of one ruler, though that ruler should proclaim himself a modern Moses.

It is true there is nowhere found in the Constitution a "thus saith," directing how States in such an exigency should be treated, for the reason the framers of the Constitution never seriously contemplated the probability of such an emergency. But there had been more than one judicial deliverance by the Supreme Court of the United States setting forth clearly that the recognition and supervision of organic, political power for, of, and in the States, belonged to and inherited solely in the Federal Legislature, the Congress of the United States. The citation of one example will suffice, and that shall be the famous Rhode Island case, reported in 7 Howard, and the words shall be those of Chief Justice Taney:

"Moreover, the Constitution of the United States, as far as it has provided for an emergency of this kind and authorized the General Government to interfere in the domestic concerns of a State, has treated the subject as political in its nature, and placed the power in the hands of that department. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government,' &c. Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State.' And its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal."

Further on in this opinion the Chief Justice takes occasion to say:

"Unquestionably a military government, established as the permanent government of the State, would not be a republican government, and it would be the duty of Congress to overthrow it."

The Constitution says, in the first section of its first article:

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States," &c.

The fourth section of the fifth article declares:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," &c.

A section of the first article, in enumerating some of the powers to be exercised by Congress, contains this authorization:

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States," &c.

I think it appears from these clauses of the Constitution, and from Chief Justice Taney's exposition, that Congress had, beyond question, supreme jurisdiction over the insurrectionary States on the collapse of the rebellion; that disorganized and anarchized by the rebellion and its chaotic collapse ever thereafter, and until properly reconstructed and restored and in full Federal accord, the sole right of determining when, and how far forth, each rebel State had such "form of government" as guarantied by the Constitution, "rests with Congress" alone; that the right of setting aside or "overthrowing" any other "form of government" by the Constitution inhered in Congress alone. If, then, a necessity seemed to exist justifying the President in setting up, in the first instance, State governments in the rebel States, that necessity, of course, ceased to exist on the coming together of Congress, when and to whom the whole subject of the political condition and government of those States of right should have been referred.

No doubt, at first, Mr. Johnson entertained such views and purpose. Such, too, were the declared views of some of his Cabinet. Had the President, on the surrender of Lee, convened Congress with all convenient dispatch and devolved upon it the management of the insurgent States, however matters were treated, his responsibility would have ceased. Had he even, on the assembling of Congress at the next regular session in December, turned over to it the whole subject of reorganization and reconstruction, and thenceforth forbore all further personal and official intervention therein and thereabouts save as required by law, doubtless he would have been held blameless. He chose to take a different course. He inaugurated his policy of reconstruction—a policy directly, if not designedly, tending to the re-instating and re-establishing as the controlling, governing element in all the South unpurged, unrepenting, remorseless, red-handed rebels. I pause not to speculate on his motives; I have no time to set forth the bitter, bloody fruits which have sprung from the loins of this untoward, misbegotten "policy." Suffice it to say robbery, rapine, riot, unpunished murder, in no local or stunted streams, have flowed in every section of southern soil unguarded by "the boys in blue" so be, a loyal freedman or a "Union white," had property to tempt or an unprotected life to lose. The close connection of the Memphis and New Orleans riots with the purposes, if not the expectations, of the President shocked the sense of the nation. No wonder he sought to escape the odium of this complicity. The subterfuges, transparent as mean, availed him nothing. Exposed and rebuked, and even warned, he did not desist or slacken in the prosecution of his "policy." Nay, for aught known to the country or to this House, he still rigidly, callously, defiantly adheres thereto. In furtherance of it he has, beyond all question, exerted to the utmost available extent the influence and the power of the Executive to oppose and to defeat any other method or plan of reconstruction than that embodied in "his policy."

To this end he has used, nay, prostituted, the executive patronage; and, as far forth as he could, that of the Departments. To this end he has repeatedly changed, removed, and appointed military commanders to obtain those sufficiently subservient to do his bidding, despite right, law, Congress, Constitution, and even humanity to the contrary notwithstanding. In view of the law and of the Constitution and of all these his doings, how strangely sounds his pretense and that of his abettors, that he and they are the sole custodians of order, law, the Constitution, restoration, readmission to Congress of the southern States, &c., when it is so well known here and over all the South that he and his have done their utmost to thwart and delay this much-wished consummation.

In this connection listen to what the Mobile Register says of General Wager Swayne, that true soldier and noble son of an honored father, commissioner of Freedmen's Bureau in Alabama. Such a man was in the way:

"Swayne was an adroit and unscrupulous politician, and Swayne had no gerrymandered and pipelaid as to make the ratification of the constitution a sure thing. Swayne was, therefore, an obstacle to fair play and justice, and when we wrote to Mr. Johnson that an order to remand General Swayne to his regiment would be worth twenty thousand votes against the constitution we wrote an opinion on a fact that events have justified."

But for such interposition and intervention in behalf of "policy" to-day there would be no question as to the present status of Alabama and of her speedy representation on this floor. Who, then, is responsible for her non-representation? Surely not Congress; not the malignant Radicals? No body or other person is but the Executive himself. Shall such obstructive proceedings, in defiance of law, of Congress, of the Constitution, and of the sense of the country be permitted to be enacted, unchecked, unrebuked, and unpunished? I trust not. The country hopes not; expects not.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Phelps] rung the changes very freely and trippingly upon the sanctities and obligations of the President's oath of office, but forgot to define the difference between executing and evading the law, of the distinction between which Mr. Johnson seems to have very confused ideas. In all his southern "policy" he seems to have sought rather how to evade than how to execute the law. It is true he opposed his veto to the reconstruction acts; but, passed over the veto, are they not as authoritative and obligatory, as much entitled to be respected and executed by civilian, soldier, judge, and President, as any act in the statute-book of the Republic, until the constitutional review-tribunal has declared them unconstitutional? For this disregard of the obligations of his oath, for this his neglect and virtual refusal to execute the law, because not in the line of his pet "policy," I never doubted but that he might rightfully be arraigned and impeached. When the impeachment was first brought before this House the remainder of his term seemed to me so short, the disturbing and paralyzing influence of impeachment so imminent, far-reaching, and enduring—hoping, too, almost against hope, that he would forego and yield his autocratic views to the deliberations and decisions of that department of the Government with whom the Supreme Court had declared the Constitution had lodged the right and the power to say, and to direct by law him to do—on a former occasion I voted yet further to bear and to forbear, and, with others, set myself to watch and pray and hope for a more benign future. Hardly had we left these seats after the July session ere he made a further stride, a yet bolder strike, in suspending Mr. Stanton from office. This bold blow at the fearless and the incorruptible Secretary, to whom, more than any other living man, the country is indebted for being brought triumphantly through and out of the great war of the rebellion, so startled and angered the people that had Congress been then in session, or convened immediately thereafter, impeachment would at once have taken place. The general expectation that the Senate could and would restore the Secretary and thus vindicate the majesty of the law ultimately so allayed public exasperation that another flagrant presidential obliquity, or rather outrage, was added to the many others unnoticed, at least unchallenged, before the appropriate constitutional tribunal.

The Senate reinstated Mr. Stanton. The President, instead of deferring to the almost unanimous expression of the body constituted by the Constitution his advisers, at once set to work to nullify as far forth as he could its action in this particular, and to evade all laws pertaining thereto, by himself ignoring the Secretary and requiring his subordinates to do the same. Was this decent respect to the Senate? Perhaps a grave impropriety is not impeachable. But how about such evasion, nay, violation, of law by him who was sworn to the faithful execution of the same?

Again, no action was had, no notice was taken of this continuous outrageous executive procedure. This long-enduring forbearance, this slowness to smite, instead of abating seemed to embolden to the commission of other and more flagrant audacities.

The next step was in another direction; it was no less than a mean attempt to inveigle into violation of law an honest and unsophisticated soldier. Foiled in this endeavor, then followed a dastard effort with venomous pen to write him down; to which was superadded the aid of a not overscrupulous, I may say most obsequious, Cabinet. In its great forbearance and unwillingness to proceed to extremities again Congress allowed to pass unrebuked offense and offender.

The cup, however, was surely and not slowly filling. The Stanton-Thomas imbroglio almost immediately followed. This is of too recent occurrence; the particulars are too well known to the House to need from me a moment's consideration. In this matter an ex post facto plea has been put forth in behalf of the President, that his only object in moving as he did was to secure a speedy and harmless test in the courts of the constitutionality of the troublesome tenure-of-office act. This is a most shallow pretext, or a not very profound precautionary after-thought.

Let us look at the legal usage and practice in such cases made and provided, and the proper legal course which should have been taken by the President to secure his avowed purpose will at once appear. He could have made a pro forma removal and a pro forma appointment, and directed his pro forma appointee to proceed by a quo warranto writ against Mr. Stanton, to inquire by what warrant (right) he continued to exercise the functions of Secretary of War. Every lawyer knows the nature of this writ, that it is the prescribed Government means of bringing into court for examination a person alleged to be wrongfully exercising a privilege or a franchise, or holding an office by supposition emanating, at some time, from the sovereign power. This would have been a proper and decisive proceeding to test before the courts the constitutionality of the act. At the instance of the Attorney General, in behalf of the Government, this writ might have been issued at any time, to inquire by what right Mr. Stanton assumed to continue to exercise the functions of Secretary. Failing to make good and sufficient that right the Secretary's displacement must immediately, as a matter of course, have followed.

Does any one ask, "Why did not Secretary

Stanton 'give place,' and himself resort to this writ against General Thomas to regain possession of the War Department?" Simply because he could not sue it out or cause it to be sued out in his behalf. By common law it was the king's writ, and could only be issued to remedy some encroachment or remove some alleged usurpation upon the crown's prerogatives. It was never issued in England, from whence we derive it, nor has it ever been in this country as a private process to redress or vindicate individual rights. That this writ is the exclusive royalty of sovereignty in this country was clearly put by Chief Justice Marshall in Wallace vs. Anderson, 5th Wheaton, 291:

"That a writ of quo warranto could not be maintained except at the instance of the Government, and as this writ was issued by a private individual, without the authority of the Government, it could not be sustained, whatever might be the right of the prosecutor or of the person claiming to exercise the office in question."

Had Grant surrendered, as Johnson wished, instead of vacating to Stanton; or had Stanton been caught napping and Thomas been de facto installed, as Johnson wished and hoped, no quo warranto writ could have been obtained against the ad interim Thomas by Stanton or anybody else, and thus the President would have accomplished his purpose, obtained possession of the War Department without danger of an adverse decision by the courts. In fact he would thus have made himself master of that most important situation without further let or hindrance, save this House alone.

To my mind this does not look like a desire on the part of the President to get the case before the courts, but rather like an exhaustive effort to keep it from the courts. It is true, Mr. Stanton might not have stood "upon the order of his going;" he might have allowed "one Lorenzo Thomas" to come in and then proceeded to procure a mandamus to be issued to oust him and regain a possession he had voluntarily surrendered. Nobody better knew than Mr. Stanton that possession is half the case. Nobody better knew than he did that the country neither expected nor would stand any such foolery. Mr. Stanton did not yield, neither did he exemplify the olden saying, "the Secretary stood alone." Immediately on serving Mr. Stanton with notice to quit, the same day the President, by special message, communicated to the Senate his action, and that he had made a Secretary ad interim. For once the Senate acted promptly—that same day declaring, after long debate, that he had transcended his power, that he possessed no such right as he had assumed to exercise. Equally prompt next day was the action of the House. And now ere we have done with this case, with no undue haste, with no asperity, in the calmness of rectitude and of reason, do I trust it will be made to appear that,

"Though the mills of the gods grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small; Though he stands and waits with patience, with exactness grinds he all."

If the "all" is duly meted and milled between the upper and nether millstones of Senate and House, then it is my belief a condemnation will ensue in the Senate Chamber and go forth into the forum of mankind commensurate with the high office Mr. Johnson has so desecrated. Perhaps no other official finale was to be expected from the man the manner of whose induction into office so humiliated the whole heart of the nation.

Mr. Johnson claims that he essayed to remove Mr. Stanton in virtue of divers provisions in sundry old enactments creating, defining, and regulating the Department of War. The bearing of these exhumed statutes has already been too elaborately discussed to require a moment's time from me. He also claims in extenuation, if that removal was in seeming contravention of the tenure-of-office act, he and every member of his Cabinet believed the act unconstitutional, as though such belief, even if honestly entertained, justified a direct violation of its provisions. Right here it may be well to pause for a backward look to "those days" when there were "giants in the land."

"On the 16th of February, 1835, when the United States Senate had under its consideration a bill to repeal the act of 1820, commonly called the four years' law, passed in restraint of the power of the executive, Mr. Webster, among other things, said: 'Since the President could not appoint without the consent of the Senate, so he ought not to remove without the concurrence of the Senate.' He contended that a mere nomination of a new candidate did not vacate the office; that if the Senate rejected the nomination, the incumbent officer should continue in his place. If the Constitution had given to the President the power of appointment without the aid of the Senate then he might also exercise the power of removal.

"There had been another proposition thrown out in the course of debate, that was, whether the Executive power was subject to constraint or not by law. He believed it might be, for if it was absolute or beyond the control of law then nothing could be done respecting it, but all knew that offices could be created or abolished by Congress, at its pleasure. Even the time of the continuance of an office might be fixed. The power exercised by Congress in passing the four years' law, was a proof of it. That law not only limited the term of holding office, but actually took away commissions which had been signed by the President and sanctioned by the Senate."

"He considered the proposition before the Senate, rather as a bill to regulate the tenure of office," &c.—Congressional Globe, Twenty-Third Congress, second session, vol. 2, pages 250-1."

Has a clearer, stronger light dawned upon us since those days? when limitation, abridgment of executive power, even tenure-of-office acts were enacted and not deemed contrary to law or unconstitutional by the great "expounder and defender of the Constitution." Well might it now be asked, when, where, was the modern discovery made of a clause of the Constitution or a statutory provision conferring upon President Johnson and his Cabinet revisory powers, judicial functions, or any appellate jurisdiction whatever over the legislation of Congress? If this revisory power exists and can be exercised respecting one statute, it exists and can be exercised in respect to any and every statute that has not been "passed" by the Supreme Court. If that sequence is logical and forcible—and I see nothing to the contrary—the President may choose to regard and treat any statute unconstitutional which lies athwart the pathway of his policy or any of his purposes. Are his defenders, is the Democratic party which just now occupies that relation, prepared to take that ground and accept the consequences? If they are, I cannot believe they can carry with them the country to that most dangerous position. Take, as an example, the act making appropriations for the support of the Army, passed March 2, 1867. It established the headquarters of the General of the Army of the United States in this city; it directs that "all orders and instructions relating to military operations issued by the President or Secretary of War shall be issued through the General," &c. It prohibits the General being removed, suspended, or relieved from command, or assigned to duty elsewhere, &c., "without the previous approval of the Senate;" declares "any orders or instructions relating to military operations issued contrary to these requirements," &c., "shall be null and void;" declares the issuance of any such orders, transmission of the same, obedience thereto, shall make the offender "liable to imprisonment for not less than two nor more than twenty years," &c. We can better apprehend now than we could four days ago the dangers that lurk in such executive assumption. Perhaps we shall soon know elsewhere, and perhaps we shall never know, what those thoughtful clauses have saved us from; the extent and the intent of the approaches made to officers commanding military forces in this city and elsewhere. Thanks to their patriotism and to their intelligence, as far as yet made known, all, save the Adjutant General of the Army, proved true and faithful, and better posted as to the law and duty, than seemingly was the "Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States."

The President's official oath requires him faithfully to "execute the office of President." The Constitution requires him to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed"—not to construe, not to pass upon the constitutionality, but to obey them himself, and to cause others to obey them! How has he performed that duty? How is he now performing that duty in the South and here in the capital of the nation? He seems to have forgotten and to forget that Mr. Johnson, as President, is himself as much the creature of the Constitution, that both he and his high office are now as amenable to law, statutory metes and bounds, as when he himself was "an humble plebeian," or discharging the lowly duties of an "alderman."

His misapprehension may have arisen in this wise: it is generally conceded that the powers of the Executive in war far transcend those that may be exercised in times of peace. The terrible war of the rebellion for the first time revealed "the hiding" of these powers in the Constitution. They were brought out and put to utmost requisition by Mr. Lincoln. In succeeding Mr. Lincoln Mr. Johnson seemed to think he succeeded to the rightful exercise of all the power wielded by Mr. Lincoln to suppress the rebellion. Ignoring the vast difference of situation, without a public necessity, in time of profound peace, he has, in despite and in defiance of plain law, assumed to exercise uncalled for, unwarranted, absolute powers, to promote his own personal purposes.

In that he did this knowingly, willfully, persistently, does he not deserve impeachment? Judging by the past, can there be any security for the future while he wields the executive power? He suspended Mr. Stanton; the Senate declared his reasons insufficient; in other words, that the Secretary was out "contrary to law." He next issued an order for his absolute removal. Again the Senate considered the case and declared the President had, in thus doing, acted "contrary to law." Notwithstanding that formal and well-considered deliverance of his constitutional advisers, he has since, as President, issued two formal orders "to Adjutant General Thomas" to take possession of the War Department as Secretary ad interim. To this hour, as far as known, does he persist in endeavoring to compass the removal and actual ejection of Secretary Stanton and the installment instead of General Thomas, notwithstanding the solemn, formal declaration of twenty-nine out of thirty-six Senators that such proceeding of his is in violation of law.

Did I not thus well say he knowingly, deliberately, persistently disregarded, broke the law, and deserved impeachment? And I now further say we have no reason to believe that he will desist or do different while permitted to be President of the Republic. Instead of forbearing and hoping from him better things, is it not a natural, inevitable presumption that his official regimen will be, as it heretofore has been, continually from bad to worse?

The tenure-of-office act of March, 1867, originated in this settled conviction, and that what security against his encroachments and usurpations law could give must be invoked pro bono publico. It did not originate so much in restraint of Mr. Johnson's exercise of the usual prerogatives of the Executive as in his refusal to respect, in removals and appointments, the constitutional "advice and consent of the Senate." But for another purpose I turn to that act now. The sixth section sets forth:

"That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed and are hereby declared to be high misdemeanors," &c.

Was or is the Secretary of War included in the provisions of that act? The first section, among other things, after enumerating the Secretaries of Departments officially eo nomine, declares they—

"Shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. Johnson was never elected President; he is but serving out Mr. Lincoln's second "term;" that second "term" expires March, 1869. Mr. Stanton, duly commissioned, was serving as Secretary of War in the very midst of that second "term" when he was so summarily removed, or attempted to be, last Friday, without the advice and consent of the Senate, and another was directed by the President's express letter, if not commission, to take his place.

If English words, marshaled into the formality of a statute, do not lose their usual force and significance, if facts are not falsehoods, then has Andrew Johnson, acting President of the United States, beyond all cavil and all doubt, in disregard of his oath, violated, broken, both the spirit and the letter of the first and sixth sections of the "act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867. Shall he, for that transgression, be arraigned and impeached? He did it deliberately; he did it after the Senate had solemnly declared his "reasons" for the removal of that officer were insufficient. It has not been pretended, it will not be, that since his resumption of "the functions of his office" Secretary Stanton has given any fresh occasion or reason for this last outbreak. The act of the President last Friday was then, as I said, deliberate, and, in view of the previous suspension and restoration of Mr. Stanton, with no new or additional provocation, insolent and defiant to the Senate and to the sense of the country; not, perhaps, in itself of the gravest importance, yet, viewed in connection with the previous unsustained suspension, and as one of a series of illegal acts, in my judgment, it is sufficient to admonish us that the hour has fully come when we must resort to that great supreme remedy provided in the Constitution—impeachment; impeachment for the past, impeachment for the present, impeachment that we may have speedy reconstruction, restoration, peace, quietness, and assurance throughout all the borders of our land. Is it not palpably evident that with this man in his high office we cannot have present tranquillity and prosperity or any reliable assurance for the future? My vote must be, therefore, in favor of putting him on trial; and believing, as I do, that he is guilty, greatly guilty, I cannot, much as I pity him, find it in my heart to repeat, in his behalf, the old formula, "May God grant him a safe deliverance."

SPEECH OF HON. G. W. JULIAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

MR. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the articles of impeachment reported by the committee, but to submit a general observation or two by way of explanation of their spirit and purpose. Should these articles be adopted by the House, the President must be tried upon the specific charges which they recite; and the proof of them being almost wholly matter of record, the trial can be speedily concluded, and the removal of the President as certainly secured as it could be done on a full review of all his past misdeeds. The people will not fail to see this; and under the impelling desire for the restoration of order and peace throughout the country will fully justify our action in confining the material grounds of the inquiry within the narrowest limits.

But it must not be understood that in bringing this great national criminal to trial on the particular charges specified, he is to stand acquitted of the transcendently greater crimes which have been laid at his door. History will make no such record. On the contrary, his conviction as charged must carry with it his moral conviction of the whole series of usurpations and wrongs of which he has stood impeached by the country within the past two years. Does any one believe that if he had faithfully performed the duties of his high office up to the 21st of February last, the thought of impeachment would have occurred for the attempted removal of the Secretary of War, or for any of the particular acts now charged against him? Sir, it is only when these acts are interpreted in the light of his past course of lawlessness that his real character and guilt are made to appear. It is the infernal back ground of his other villainies that gives to them their enormity, and makes them the timely occasion for laying the nation's hand upon him and hurling him from his place. Not alone the relatively trifling offenses now charged, but the deeply-rooted conviction of his previous guilt has at last brought Congress and the people to their feet in demanding his removal. They regarded him as a monstrous criminal, who was in a fair way to escape justice, but who, by his own act, has at last brought himself within the sure grasp of the law; and with gladness and thanksgiving they have come to the rescue of the country. Our Democratic friends are very sorry we did not make our charges as comprehensive as we believed his guilt, and try him upon the whole ground of his public delinquency. Sir, our charges are broad enough for the end in view, and in effect he will be tried upon the whole question of his official action. It is as impossible to separate it from this proceeding as it is for a man to run away from his own shadow, or to dissolve the relation between cause and effect. Andrew Johnson will be tried for usurping the legislative powers of the Government, for appointing traitors to civil offices, for trampling the laws of Congress under his feet, for the monstrous abuse of the pardoning power, for the massacre at New Orleans, for the corrupt transfer of southern railroads to rebels, for his indecent abuse and defiance of Congress, for his drunkenness before the representatives of the people and of foreign Powers, for the murder and rapine that have been inspired by his influence, sweeping over the South like a tempest, and for delaying, in ten thousand forms, the return of peace, order, and security to these States. These are the counts in the indictment on which he has been arraigned by the people of the United States and adjudged guilty; and his conviction by the Senate on the charges now made will only seal the judgment of his country, and fix, beyond all question, his high rank among the greatest malefactors of the world.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. HUMPHREY,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 29, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allowed me under the tyrannical rule of the majority of this House, I can but glance at the topics which present themselves for consideration, now that a partisan caucus has determined to complete the usurpation of the Government by the impeachment and removal of the President.

I will show that if the President has violated any law it is not the tenure-of-office law, and he has been twice acquitted by this House and the judgment of the country of the violation of any other law of the United States. By the terms of the tenure-of-office act it is provided—

"That the Secretaries of State, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they were appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

This act in no way forbids the removal of Edwin M. Stanton, who was appointed Secretary of War by President Lincoln during his first term of office, was not reappointed by Mr. Lincoln in his second term, and has never been appointed by President Johnson. An appointment contemplated by this act to executive office can be made only in one of two ways. When the Senate is not in session an appointment can be made by the President, who issues a commission to the officer. When the Senate is in session the nomination must be sent to the Senate, and if it is confirmed then the President issues the commission. Edwin M. Stanton has been appointed in neither of these ways during the administration of President Johnson, and the term of the Presidency during which he was appointed expired at twelve o'clock m. on the 4th of March, 1865, the time at which Mr. Lincoln took again the oath of office for a new Presidency. Since this time, and prior to the appointment of General Thomas, he had been acting Secretary of War by sufferance of the President merely.

When called upon to vacate the clerkship he had disgraced he denied the power of the Executive to displace him, disobeyed the order to hand the War Department over to his successor ad interim, entrenched himself in the War Office under military guard, and from thence openly defies the executive and judicial departments of the Government. Having procured the arrest of General Lorenzo Thomas by criminal process on the charge of high misdemeanor, in that "on the 21st day of February, 1868, he did unlawfully accept the appointment of the office of Secretary of War ad interim, and did then and there unlawfully hold and exercise the office," and when summoned to appear in court and show his commission as Secretary of War, Edwin M. Stanton, with the connivance of the judge upon the bench, fails to show by what warrant he holds the office, and General Thomas is discharged. He has no commission; he holds the position by force.

It is said by those who extenuate this usurpation that the President has acknowledged Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War. This is true, and yet the fact that he was suffered to remain in charge of the Department was no appointment of the man. It is urged, also, that by the previous suspension of Mr. Stanton under the tenure-of-office act, the President has admitted that the act is applicable to him. Not so. Because the President, for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of this statute, acted under it, he is not stopped from availing himself of the power he possesses to remove the Secretary absolutely. According to the theory of the usurpationists, if he had not acted under this statute in the suspension, he would have had the power of removal. This is absurd. He had the right to choose which of the powers granted him he would exercise in the first instance. He had the power both to suspend and to remove, and the exercise of either power cannot estop him from resort to the other. In law General Thomas is Secretary of War while Stanton maintains himself in office by military force and appeals to Congress to sustain him in rebellion.

A parallel case would be that of a postmaster who, after having been removed, should refuse to deliver his papers and keys to his legally-commissioned successor and barricade himself in his office. The War Department is one branch of the executive department of the Government—a part of the Presidency itself—and Congress has no more power to legislate the President out of the control of this portion of the Presidency than it has by legislation to deprive him of the Presidency altogether. It is proposed, however, in the first place, to deprive the President of one seventh of his office—the War Department—and then, by his impeachment, to seize upon the remaining six sevenths, for the avowed reason that he has endeavored in a legal manner to rid himself of an obnoxious and insubordinate clerk. With the same propriety might Congress, when General Grant was engaged in crushing the rebellion, have endeavored to force General Butler upon him as a confidential aid or a division commander.

The President is formally charged by this House with having committed high crimes and misdemeanors. What are his crimes? As I have said, he has sought lawfully to remove a subordinate who defies his authority and who teaches rebellion to the Army and the people; to change one member of his official family, one of his advisers, who has no legal powers except those derived from the Executive. The President has no motive in this except to better enable himself to carry out the policy which he deems essential to the restoration of peace and Union; a policy which he inherited from President Lincoln; a policy which was inaugurated by the Republican party in 1864 as the one best adapted to secure the results of the war; a policy which was opposed only by the extremists of that year on the ground that it contained the element of "charity for all, malice toward none," who also resisted the renomination of Abraham Lincoln because he was too tender-hearted, too conservative. Look for one moment at the record of Andrew Johnson! A member of the Senate when the southern conspirators were developing their treason in Washington, he severed his connection with his colleagues and stood up boldly in his place to denounce both the treason and the traitors. While Andrew Johnson, the patriot, was thus engaged the Representative at large from Illinois, Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN, one of his impeachers, was telling his constituents "that the Republican party was a sectional party, designed by the Radicals and rebels of the North to abolish slavery, to establish negro suffrage, to inaugurate a war which would result in the overthrow of the Constitution and the erection of a despotism on its ruins." While the Radicals then denounced are now laboring to convert his prophecy into history Johnson is resolutely now, as then, observing his oath to preserve and defend the Constitution. As the secession movement progressed Andrew Johnson never faltered in his loyalty to the Union. He was driven by the rebels from his own State; he periled his life in the conflict; in short, he so commended himself by his whole career during the rebellion to the favor of the party that then professed to be anxious to restore the Union that, to the exclusion of other able men, he was nominated for the second office in the gift of the people, against the protest of the extremists who now jostle each other in the front rank of his revilers and accusers.

The majority of the delegates to the Baltimore convention of 1864 had not been educated up to the idea that the rebellion was a success, and they voted down the disunionists, who demanded the Vice Presidency for a New England Radical, and who subsequently nominated John C. Frémont for the Presidency. Lincoln and Johnson were elected, and when, shortly after their inauguration, the bullet of a cowardly assassin had deprived the country of its chosen President, and Mr. Johnson had succeeded to the executive office, the Radicals were delighted that a man of sterner stuff was to deal with the questions of the day. They hastened to tempt him with the bribe of absolute power, to be exercised as they should direct and in the interest of faction. They tendered him a standing army of five hundred thousand men in time of profound peace, as the nucleus of a consolidated Government, and he rejected the proffer. They tendered him the unlimited patronage and the unlimited millions of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, which made him despot of ten States and master of the remainder, and he spurned the proposition. Andrew Johnson had registered an oath in heaven to be faithful to the constitutional rights and liberties of the American people.

And what is the record of Edwin M. Stanton, the chief conspirator against Andrew Johnson and the Republic? While Senator Johnson was denouncing secession as a treasonable crime history proves that Stanton was a blatant rebel in the streets of Washington. When the venerable Cass retired from the hesitating Cabinet of Buchanan Stanton remained, the friend of rebels and rebel sympathizers. At the time that Andrew Johnson was breasting the storm of secession in the Senate Chamber Stanton was grasping by the hand the rebel Senators as they abandoned their seats and left the Senate Chamber forever, and advising them to stand firm by the rebellion they had already inaugurated. He never took the iron-clad oath of office, and cannot take it without perjury. He dare not take it to-day. When, feigning conversion to Radicalism, he crawled into the Cabinet of President Lincoln, he signaled himself as the marplot of the Army. He ruined generals who incurred his displeasure. He proved the most insubordinate and disobedient of officers, the most treacherous and tyrannical of men.

When the war closed by the surrender of all the rebel forces to Generals Grant and Sherman the people expected, as they had a right to expect, a restored Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the States unimpaired. This had been promised them by the solemn declaration of Congress. It was the wish that every patriotic heart breathed first. While fathers and mothers all over the land were mourning their lost sons and lamenting the empty chairs around their hearth-stones they could not but rejoice that national integrity and constitutional liberty were assured, that republican institutions were vindicated against foes from within and without, and that henceforth the American flag would symbolize a State for every star. In the fall of 1865 every Republican State convention indorsed the policy of President Lincoln, adopted by President Johnson, and exemplified in the appointment of provisional governors for the southern States. "Peace has been conquered; we stand on the threshold of reunion," was the universal thought.

But this was not to be. On the first day of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress THADDEUS STEVENS, pursuant to caucus decision, introduced a resolution in this House which gave vitality to the startling proposition that the rebellion had triumphed, that the States were not in the Union, and that Congress had the power to reconstruct and recreate them in its own likeness. A reconstruction committee was appointed, and this was the first step toward the consummation of this policy of disunion now about to triumph in complete usurpation. Under the auspices of reconstruction committees the restoration of the Union has been prevented; the vacant chairs in Congress, so touchingly alluded to by Secretary Seward, have not been filled; the millions expended in the war for the Union have been supplemented by other millions wasted in perpetuating disunion; laborers worthy of their hire are without work and without bread; manufactures are crippled, and every business and commercial interest is suffering, while debt and taxation increase. Three reconstruction laws, each more futile and unconstitutional than its predecessor, have been passed, and the fourth is now pending. The sole purpose of these measures has been, by successive steps, to arrive at the complete usurpation of the Government by a faction, so that all its power may be exercised in the interests of the faction.

The ten southern States having been seized upon and placed under military despotism, the usurpationists have only two more obstacles in the way of unlimited power, and these are the executive and judicial departments of the Government. The plan of removing these obstructions is already developed. The President is to be deposed by a partisan vote, and the Supreme Court is to be made powerless to declare any legislation of Congress on political subjects unconstitutional and void. A bill to authorize a minority of the justices of the Supreme Court to control its decisions only awaits the crack of the party's whip to become a law. With the consummation of this conspiracy (destined, I trust, to be overthrown) would perish the Republic. A government of force would succeed to one of constitutions and laws. Negro suffrage would be declared in every State and enforced by bayonets if necessary. Elections, if they are permitted, would be liable to military interference. All this and more may be in the near future. Senator WADE, rebuked and repudiated by the people of Ohio, is already in training for the White House. With his accession would come the change of every Cabinet officer, except Stanton, the personification of force and Seward, the personification of duplicity and left-handed diplomacy, who publicly declared Stanton "divine," and more recently branded Grant as guilty of falsehood. Within thirty days every officer of the Government suspected of the slightest reverence for the Constitution would give place to a thorough-paced Radical. The Army and Navy would be promptly weeded of every officer who, from any veneration he might have for ancient usages, would hesitate to act "outside of the Constitution" and military and naval regulations. Protesting clergymen would be silenced, as was the Rev. Mr. Benedict, of my district, by abduction and imprisonment. Dissenting orators would be persuaded to waive old-fashioned declamation about the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and Washington's Farewell Address by shoulder-strapped officials armed with Seward's little bells and backed by a corporal's guard. The press would be no longer free, and editors who dared to denounce the crime against liberty would be consigned to a bastille and their offices seized, as were those of the New York World and Journal of Commerce during a recent reign of terror, which it is a part of the plan to renew.

If all these appliances should fail to overawe the citizens and decide the presidential election in favor of the usurpers, does any sane man suppose that the electoral votes of the States of New Jersey, Maryland, and Kentucky would be counted, since the majority in Congress has not hesitated to exclude Senators and Representatives from these States? Does any one suppose that the vote of the Empire State, with her one hundred thousand majority for the Union, would be counted if it were not more than overbalanced by that of the States reconstructed and handed over to despotism and the ignorant blacks, whose ballots are as unerring as the bayonets that direct them? When these openly-avowed purposes of the usurpationists are accomplished the revolution will be complete, and a nation of white men will have parted with their birthrights forever, unless they are regained as the fathers of the Republic won their independence.

To tamely submit to the consummation of this Radical conspiracy would be cowardly. National pride, the instincts of the white race, adherence to the principles of republican government, the interests of capital and labor, alike demand that this treasonable plot be checked. The bondholder, the manufacturer, the artisan, the masses of workingmen all over our community, are deeply interested in the pending issue. The remedy lies in an appeal to these classes, without distinction to party, to unite in protest, in organization, in action, against the usurpationists.

When southern rebels in arms were menacing Washington, the cry rang through the land, "There are only two parties now, Union men and rebels." So, too, to-day, there is no middle ground between the Unionists and the usurpationists, so far as the freemen of the northern States are concerned. Ten States have passed under the yoke of despotism, and the only remaining question is, "Shall the despotism be made complete?" It is not possible that military governments can exist south of the Potomac, and free institutions flourish north of this river. One destiny awaits the whole country. We must either struggle into freedom or degenerate into serfdom. The beds that we make for the people of the South are those upon which we must seek our only repose. It is idle to say that the faction which is indorsed in the seizure and exercise of unlawful power will voluntarily surrender it to the people. The love of absolute authority increases with its possession, and those who have perpetrated crimes against liberty never sentence themselves to the dungeon and the scaffold. George Washington, who took the sword to establish the right of the people to self-government, and the principle that taxation without representation was full justification for revolution, heroically surrendered it when victory was won; but men like Stanton and his co-workers, once in full possession of the sword, will never return it to the plowshare. We must now reestablish the Republic or lapse into monarchy. Not a day nor an hour is to be lost. Gradually but certainly, since the close of the war, the consolidationists have been centralizing their forces and perfecting their schemes, and at this very moment the very existence of a democratic Government hangs trembling in the scale of chance.

In the name of larger liberty the American people are asked to consent to the embrace of a monster whose hidden mechanism is managed by the unprincipled Stanton, aided and abetted by the controlling men of the Radical party. I charge, upon the floor of this House, that for four years the steady efforts of Mr. Stanton have been directed to throw the influence of the War Department, which he has so corruptly controlled, and to shape the legislation of Congress—the acts of which, down to the tenure-of-office bill, have been largely inspired and often written by him—to establish an armed despotism in this country under which he shall hold permanent power. And I charge that this plot is reaching its culmination now in the recent action of this body in impeaching a President of the United States whom every honest man knows has done no wrong. If Mr. Stanton and his associates suppose that the people of the United States can be betrayed and subjugated to such a tyranny without an appeal to that God of battles who protects the right I fear they will find that they have underrated the intelligence and patriotism of the American people.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. LAWRENCE GETZ,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

MR. GETZ. Mr. Speaker, I cannot attempt in the few minutes to which the arbitrary rule, or rather suspension of all rules, confines each member during this debate to speak what I know to be the sentiments of my constituents upon the gravest measure that has ever been presented to the consideration of the American Congress, and that we shall to-day be compelled to see hurried through the House in a hot haste which betrays the conscious fear among its supporters that it cannot bear the calm and deliberate investigation which its importance demands. For the first time in the history of our Government the impeaching power is invoked to depose a President of the United States for alleged "high crimes and misdemeanors;" not such as were in the contemplation of the framers of the organic law under which these proceedings have been instituted, but offenses purely political; if, indeed, it be an offense in the President, obedient to his oath "to support, protect, and defend the Constitution," to interpose its salutary checks and limitations for preventing the consummation of the partisan designs of those who, by the bold admission of their accepted leader in these proceedings, are "acting outside of the Constitution."

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Getz.

The articles or charges upon which the House is asked to impeach the President are ten in number, covering five closely-printed pages; and, with due respect to the learned gentlemen of the committee from whom they have emanated, they appear to me one of the most remarkable performances of the difficult feat of playing a thousand tunes upon a harp of a single string that has ever been achieved. If this extraordinary paper shall not fill a conspicuous page in the legal or judicial annals of the United States it will, at least, merit preservation among the curiosities of American literature as a brilliant example of the facility with which those who are skilled in the use of words can expand "a single tuft of thought into a great prairie of language."

Nine of these articles may be resolved into one—a conspiracy by the President with Adjutant General Thomas to remove Edwin M. Stanton from the office of Secretary of War, in violation of the provisions of the so-called "tenure-of-office" law.

The tenth article is unsupported by the fragment of testimony which has been laid upon our desks as the warrant for its introduction. On the contrary, it proves, if anything, directly the reverse of what the article charges, namely, an attempt to induce General Emory to place the military forces under his command in the department of Washington, in obedience to the direct and exclusive orders of the President. What is the nature of this law which the President is accused of having violated? Partisan in conception, partisan in its birth, and partisan in its every feature, its manifest and only object was to limit and curtail, so far as an act of Congress could do, the constitutional power of the President to make appointments to and removals from office, a power which has been exercised from the days of the first President down to the present time without dispute or denial by any competent authority, and with no restriction save "the advice and consent of the Senate."

Waiving the question of the constitutionality of this partisan law—which its advocates dare not submit to the test of a judicial tribunal, and which, if we may believe testimony that has not yet been controverted, Mr. Stanton himself pronounced unconstitutional a year ago—in what respect has the President violated any of its provisions? He must have violated the first section or none. What is that section? It has been repeatedly quoted, and reads thus:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."—Statutes-at-Large, Thirty-Ninth Congress, second session, chap. CLIV.

Here, then, by the proviso, all the Cabinet officers, the Secretary of War included, are expressly excepted from the operation of this law. By what process of special pleading can it be made to appear that Edwin M. Stanton—Mr. Lincoln's appointee, not President Johnson's—has, or ever had since the latter's accession to the Presidency, any other title to the office he now holds by the aid of a body-guard of soldiers save by the permission or sufferance of his superior? For the first time in the history of this Government (and let us hope it may be the last) the disgraceful spectacle is presented of a Cabinet officer, one whose relations to the President should, and must be, of necessity, to a great extent personal and confidential, insolently refusing a civil request to resign, after it had become apparent that the President could no longer, with proper regard to his own self-respect and the dignity of his station, hold official intercourse with him; and, contrary to all precedent and in base violation of the recognized rules of good-breeding and honor, insisting upon remaining as an intruder in the place he can no longer competently fill as an officer, since he has forfeited every claim to recognition as such by the superior whose authority he has defied. Such conduct has been condemned in language more forcible than any that I could utter, and certainly more authoritative, by two leading Republican Senators. I quote their very words, from the Congressional Globe, volume sixty-three, part three, page 1515. The report of the committee of conference on the tenure-of-office bill being under consideration, Senator HOWARD said, in reference to the proviso I have above quoted:

"I have no doubt that any Cabinet minister who has a particle of self-respect—and we can hardly suppose that any man would occupy so responsible an office without having that feeling—would decline to remain in the Cabinet after the President had signified to him that his presence was no longer needed."

"For I presume that whenever the President sees proper to rid himself of an offensive or disagreeable Cabinet minister he will only have to signify that desire, and the minister will retire and a new appointment be made."

Senator SHERMAN, on the same occasion, spoke even more emphatically:

"I take it that no case can arise, or is likely to arise, where a Cabinet minister will attempt to hold on to his office after his chief desires his removal. I can scarcely conceive of such a case. I think that no gentleman, no man with any sense of honor, would hold a position as a Cabinet officer after his chief desired his removal, and therefore the slightest intimation on the part of the President would always secure the resignation of a Cabinet officer."

With this sweeping condemnation of the conduct of Mr. Stanton before us, pronounced in advance, and therefore dispassionate and impartial, by his own political friends, I may well leave him to the justly provoked odium and contempt of the American people. But not only do Republican Senators bear testimony against him. The two officers of highest rank in the Army—General Grant, the idol of the Republican party and their fore-determined candidate for the Presidency, and Lieutenant General Sherman, his inferior in rank only—unite their voices in condemning him. I make this assertion advisedly upon the authority of the following autograph letter now in the hands of the President:

WASHINGTON, Saturday, January 13.

I neglected this morning to say that I had agreed to go down to Annapolis to spend Sunday with Admiral Porter. General Grant has also to leave for Richmond on Monday at six a. m. At a conversation with the General after our interview, wherein I offered to go with him on Monday morning to Mr. Stanton, and to say that it was our joint opinion he should resign, it was found impossible by reason of his going to Richmond and my going to Annapolis. The General proposed this course. He will call upon you to-morrow and offer to go to Mr. Stanton, to say, for the good of the service and of the country, he ought to resign. This on Sunday. On Monday I will again call on you, and, if you think it necessary, I will do the same—call on Mr. Stanton and tell him to resign. If he will not, then it will be time to contrive ulterior measures. In the mean time it so happens that no necessity exists for precipitating matters.

Yours, truly,

W. T. SHERMAN,
Lieutenant General.

Here, Mr. Speaker, we have in effect the President justified and Mr. Stanton denounced out of the mouths of the latter's own party friends. Senator HOWARD says that no Cabinet officer who has "a particle of self-respect" would act as he has done. Senator SHERMAN, more particularly, says "No gentleman, no man with any sense of honor, would hold a position as a Cabinet officer after his chief desired his removal." Generals Grant and Sherman volunteer to say to this shameless intruder, "For the good of the service and of the country he ought to resign." And yet, sir, he holds on; and Congress is called upon to justify and maintain this flagrant act of insubordination—this usurpation by an inferior officer of the authority he can constitutionally exercise only at the will of his superior, the Commander-in-Chief—by the summary removal of the executive head of the nation! Can partisan malignity go further? Could a sacred provision of the Constitution, inserted for the wisest and best of purposes, be prostituted to baser ends? The object of this disreputable proceeding is too transparent to be concealed from the notice of an intelligent people. It is the last desperate struggle of an unscrupulous party to continue and perpetuate their controlling power in the Government. They must elect the next President by fair means or foul. Andrew Johnson stands as "the lion in their way." Depose him, and thrust in his place the repudiated Senator from Ohio, who will do their bidding to the very letter, and they regain control of the executive branch of the Government. Nominate Grant, the General of the Army, who already practically outranks his Commander-in-Chief, and they have control of the Army—an engine whose potent influence the people have seen and felt in previous elections. The judicial power is virtually ignored; and the legislative power they now hold unrestricted. By such agencies they "lay the flattering unction to their souls" that they may hazard the forms of an election for President with no apprehensions about the result.

That the impeachment of the President is instigated solely with a partisan intent, and demanded for partisan purposes, I think I might prove if permitted to ask the chairman of the committee that has reported these articles two questions. I should expect no answers, but they will suggest themselves. The questions are these:

First. Is it the intention of Congress, after the political assassination of Andrew Johnson shall have been accomplished and the President pro tempore of the Senate has taken his place, to repeal the tenure-of-office law?

Whether the reply would be yes or no, is not material. If affirmative, we have but to fall back upon the Constitution and "the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof;" which, in my opinion, agreeing for once with Mr. Stanton, the law in question was not.

Second. Should Mr. WADE succeed to the Presidency by means of this impeaching process, and should he, in the exercise of a reasonable desire to make his Cabinet a unit, request one or all of the present Cabinet officers who hold over under Mr. Lincoln's appointment to resign, and should one or all of them, with Stantonian insolence, refuse, if then Mr. WADE should undertake to remove them, one or all, and designate officers to discharge their duties ad interim until he should have time to select proper persons to nominate to the Senate for permanent appointment, would the majority of this House upon the instant impeach him of high crimes and misdemeanors?

40TH CONG...2D SESS.

Impeachment—Mr. Cobb.

HO. OF REPS.

Surely not, Mr. Speaker. Then, sir, the high crimes and misdemeanors for which Mr. Johnson is to be impeached are confessedly partisan and political, and not such offenses as any court of justice could or would take cognizance of. Much less, then, should that august tribunal, the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, entertain them.

I cannot, sir, more forcibly denounce this unparalleled exhibition of the vindictive frenzy of unbridled party spirit, whose watchwords are "rule or ruin," than in the eloquent words of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa,] spoken on the 19th day of July last, when the first proposition to impeach the President was pending. Alas, sir, that he and others of the majority of this House have been "turned aside from the conscientious discharge of duty" by the "political pressure" they then so manfully resisted.

"When the House of Representatives charged the Committee on the Judiciary with the investigation of this case, I did not understand that it was for the purpose of having it disposed of as a partisan question. I understood that, so far as the reference of the subject imposed an obligation upon me as a member of the committee, it was to investigate fearlessly and faithfully the subject, not merely as a member of the Republican party, but as a member of the Law Committee of the House of Representatives. I have pursued the investigation with that view and in that spirit, and I affirm here to-day that no amount of political pressure shall turn me aside from a conscientious discharge of the duty thus imposed. I will be controlled by the law and the facts, and by nothing else. I have no sympathy with the course of political conduct which has been pursued by the President of the United States. He is not entitled to my sympathy or respect in this regard; but, sir, he is entitled to have the charges made against him determined according to law, and to have the case decided as the facts and the law warrant and demand. The lowest criminal may demand this, and the President is entitled to the benefit of this rule.

"The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRYKER] has said that there are secret influences at work in this matter. Sir, it is very easy for any man to cast suspicion upon others when it becomes necessary to do so in order to carry by force of party organization anything which he may desire to invest with success. I do not know to what influences the gentleman referred. The gentleman says that secret influences will not only control the action of members of this House, but will control the judgment of members of the Senate sitting as a high court of impeachment under the solemnity of their oaths as judges. Sir, is every man to be denounced because he cannot look upon questions just as some other man view them? Is every man to be hounded down because he will not surrender the right of private judgment and follow men regardless of law and the directions of conscience? Have we come to that, sir?"

In view of what the House is now doing, and what the Senate will be commanded to do, under the "political pressure" which has at length become irresistible, the people, with fearful solicitude for their country's future, may well exclaim: "Have we come to that?"

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. AMASA COBB,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

MR. COBB. Mr. Chairman, if this debate be confined to the form of the articles of impeachment against the President, which this House has ordered to be prepared, and of which the loyal people of the country have declared him worthy, its scope would be narrow, indeed, and the fifteen minutes to which I am entitled would be more than sufficient to enable me to express my views on that subject. But as the general subject of impeachment has been considered in order, I have sought the floor to give my views on this grave question, for it is a grave and important one. A legal proceeding against any citizen which may deprive him of his political rights, should always be approached by lawyers, courts, and jurors with a due sense of official responsibility, and it adds somewhat to that sense of responsibility when the accused has stood high in the estimation of the community.

While it is the duty of courts and juries to protect the rights of the meanest and lowest of mankind when placed upon trial accused of crime, it is equally their duty to administer the law without fear, affection, or hope of reward, when the accused chances to be the possessor of vast influence by reason of official position, wealth, or talent.

This House has been admonished in tones of solemn warning against laying its hand upon the sacred head of the President. While listening to some of the gentlemen on the other side of the House one could almost imagine himself carried back to the days of the Stuarts and listening to a bull of excommunication against the regicides read by the Pope's nuncio. But let it be borne in mind that this impeachment of the President is no impious uprising of ungrateful subjects, forgetful of the favors of a kind sovereign and restive under the measures of chartered privileges, seeking to lay their impious hands upon the sacred head ruling by divine right. Oh, no; this is a case of the sovereign people calling to account an unfaithful steward, one whom, in an unguarded and unfortunate hour, they had taken from obscurity and generously placed in a service of great honor and emolument.

Although most of our legal terms are borrowed from the mother country, yet in their meaning and application they are often necessarily reversed in consequence of the radically different nature and character of our institutions. Under monarchical institutions the people and their rights are matters of secondary considerations. The ruler, the sovereign, and his privileged class of office-holders are "the State." Hence to impeach one of these was considered a high-handed proceeding. It has been sometimes held in England that impeachment would only lie for an indictable offense—or at least it is so claimed, and I admit it for the purpose of this illustration. And certain it is that there many of the rules governing trials in criminal courts have been held to be applicable to trials of impeachment.

But in this country and under the genius of our free institutions all of this is reversed. It is a wise maxim of the common law that "every man shall be deemed to be innocent until his guilt is proven beyond a reasonable doubt;" and, again, that "it were better for ninety and nine guilty men to escape than for one innocent man to suffer;" but I have met with no such maxim as that every man shall be deemed entitled to hold a lucrative office until the contrary is proven, nor that it were better for ninety and nine rogues to remain in office than for one honest man to lose an office. No, sir; in this country offices were made for the people and by the people. When they make a grave mistake and elect an unworthy man to office the mistake is their own, and the misfortune must be borne until a lawful opportunity occurs for remedying it. This opportunity generally occurs at the recurring periodical election, but sometimes the recipient of public favor is so unworthy and so forgetful of the people whose servant he is that he recklessly places the remedy into their hands for earlier use.

By the terms of the Constitution the House of Representatives—you, Mr. Chairman, and I with our fellow-members—are made the sole judges of the time and occasion when the people of the United States shall call to the bar of the high court of impeachment any one of their public servants, be he President of the United States or be he justice of the peace for the District of Columbia, to answer for high crimes and misdemeanors in office. To fail in the discharge of this duty would be as great a dereliction on our part as to fail in the discharge of any other duty clearly enjoined upon us by the express terms of the Constitution.

Is he a high officer whom it is sought to impeach? The people, whose servants we are, are higher than he. We seek to deprive no man of his office. We seek to restore to the people their office which, in the keeping of this man, has been sadly abused.

Then, Mr. Chairman, let us enter upon the discharge of our duty unawed by the solemn warning of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS] who has not failed on any occasion to raise his voice of warning against any measure for the suppression of the rebellion, be it organized and entrenched in Richmond or at the other end of the avenue.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURR] warns the House and the country that this matter of impeaching the President is an effort on the part of this House to place a man in the presidential chair who was never voted for by the people. Sir, the impeached President was not elected to that office by the people of the United States, and it seemed to me little short of cruelty on the part of the gentleman to call special attention to the manner in which Andrew Johnson became President. The most distant allusion to the bloody hand which, sending Abraham Lincoln to a martyr's grave, elevated Andrew Johnson to the presidential chair, sends a thrill of anguish to every loyal heart; and if it is now a theme of pleasant reflection to him who profited most by it, I believe that the time will come when he would give the recollection of all his many honors and offices to have it effaced from his memory forever.

In some one of his numerous public addresses I believe that the President, ascribing his elevation to office to the workings of the Constitution, claims for his tenure of office something higher and more sacred than though he had been elected in the usual way. I think that I can assure the gentleman from Illinois that whatever view the people of the United States may take of the impeachable conduct of the President, the manner of his elevation to office was not such as to give him an unusual hold upon their affections, or to render his removal the cause of an indignant uprising or revolution; and let it not be forgotten that the same Constitution, by the working of which Andrew Johnson became President, has made it the duty of this House, elected by the people of the United States, in a certain contingency to make a President, and again to initiate proceedings for the unmaking of that President who, unmindful of his high duties, shall be guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

Has Andrew Johnson committed acts in office which, in view of the Constitution, render him worthy of impeachment and removal from office? In endeavoring to answer this question in the affirmative, as I think it must be answered, I will only speak of those acts of his which are grouped together in the articles presented by the committee as the culmination of that career of usurpation, of crime, and of misprision of treason upon which he entered in May, 1865, and which from that day to this has saddened the heart of every loyal man and woman in the country, and made the veterans of the Army doubt whether after all we did not surrender to the rebels at Appomattox Court-House and at Salisbury, and whether it was not our President, and not Jefferson Davis, who, becoming entangled in crinoline and things, had surrendered to his captors.

The attempted removal of the Secretary of War and the attempt to seduce a gallant officer of the Army from his duty, are, in my opinion, ample cause for the impeachment of the President. Upon these overt acts the articles of impeachment are framed, and to these, under the rules, perhaps this debate should be confined; but for the purpose of illustration I desire to call the attention of the committee to a few antecedent facts which in my mind afford the only true key to the motive for this extraordinary conduct. In the brief time allowed me, I can, of course, only enumerate a part of the many acts of the President, which I have always considered impeachable, and cannot elaborate my views upon any of them. The Constitution of the United States provides that "he," the President, "may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses or either of them." I believe that it is a well-settled principle of law that the word "may," when used in a statute prescribing the duties of a judicial or civil officer, implies a duty and not a mere discretion to do the particular act upon the happening of the contingency specified.

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Paine.

Mr. Chairman, can there be any doubt that the middle of April, 1865, was an extraordinary occasion in the meaning of the clause of the Constitution of the United States above quoted? The armies of the rebellion, which had for four long years occupied the greater portion of eleven of the States of the Union, which had many times carried the bayonet and the torch into the very heart of the North, which had more than once beleaguered this the capital of the nation, in that month struck their flags and laid them at the feet of our gallant generals. Our own gallant Army which, under God, had overthrown its enemy after four years of gallant fighting, unremitting toil, and patient suffering, was ready to be disbanded and return its million of men to the pursuits of civil life. And in the midst of the nation's rejoicings and praise to that God who giveth the victory Abraham Lincoln, the President of the United States, the head of the nation, twice elected, honored and beloved of all loyal men, was basely murdered by an assassin. Was not this an extraordinary occasion? In my opinion, if ever a plain duty rested upon mortal ruler, Andrew Johnson was that ruler; and to call Congress together as the first act of his official life as President was that duty. It was not performed. And why? Because that Congress was elected, in part by the soldiers who at such a sacrifice had overthrown the rebels and believed that to the loyal people of this country belonged the right and that upon them rested the duty of settling, in the interest of loyalty, of universal liberty, and universal suffrage, the condition of that country which they had rescued from the despotism of the rebellion.

Andrew Johnson never believed that he had the right to set up State governments in any of the rebel States; neither did any member of his Cabinet; but he believed that if he could accomplish it by usurpation of power, that such was the desire of the people for peace after the long war of ideas and of force that they would tamely submit. Hence, when Congress assembled in December, 1865, he pointed them to ten sovereign States which he had set up in less than half that many months. He pointed to reconstruction as an accomplished fact, and asked—nay, demanded—of the Congress that it should open wide its portals and admit Senators and Representatives from such States, most of them prominent rebels; all of them elected by rebel votes, the loyal men, the soldiers of the Republic, being excluded from the polls.

This, I believe, was a usurpation of power in the interest of reaction, of counter revolution, and of tyranny over a portion of the loyal people of the United States for which the President ought long since to have been removed from office.

Mr. Chairman, my time will not admit of more than an allusion to the shameful scenes of February 22, 1866, when the President, addressing a crowd composed in great part of returned rebel soldiers in gray uniforms, sought to arouse their passions against the representatives of the people, singling out and coupling with terms of ribaldry two members of either House, who, by virtue of their long and faithful services in the cause of freedom had become prominent leaders of public opinion. And I certainly cannot follow the President in his western tour, commonly known as "swinging round the circle," more than to allude to his denunciation of Congress as an illegal and unconstitutional body. Indeed, it is needless to enumerate the particular acts of the President further to show that his whole course, from the commencement of his Administration, has been in the interest of the defeated rebellion. Being firmly convinced that his object has been to shield all that was left of rebellion from the just consequences of its great crime, to save the property, the influence, the pride, and the prejudice of the rebels, I have scarcely been surprised at anything he has done—certainly not at his complicity in the New Orleans massacre, the removal of the gallant Sheridan, or his attempt to remove the Secretary of War.

The President of the United States is possessed of great patronage. If he is a good and wise man this enables him to accomplish much good; but if he is a low, tricky, dishonest man it becomes in his hands an engine of corruption and great abuse. How this patronage has been used by the present Executive let the disorganized condition of all branches of the public service answer.

Mr. Chairman, there is one accusation against the President which I have not heard made on this floor, but which, in my opinion, is not the least one which he will have to answer to at the bar of public opinion. The manner in which he has made the appointments in the regular Army to fill the original vacancies caused by the increase of the Army. Upon the disbanding of the volunteer forces there were many hundred young men who had served with great gallantry and efficiency, and had become so habituated to Army life, and having served their country during those years of their lives when young men usually learn a trade or study a profession, they were desirous to obtain commissions in the regular service and devote their lives to the military service of their country. Who shall describe the feelings of these expectant waiting boys in blue when it became evident to them that the President, from whom their commissions must come, had gone over to the enemy; that their recommendations, signed by such of their old commanders as BOUTLER, LOGAN, SCHENCK, Sheridan, and PAINE were worse than waste paper at the presidential counter, and that the royal road to the President's slate lay through the influence of certain heroes who had been distinguished for resisting the draft and voting "No" on all measures for supporting the Army or defending the country in any manner.

Mr. Chairman, I can scarcely allude to the well-known and dogged opposition of the President to the reconstruction of the rebel States according to laws of the United States. But I will assume that holding these laws to be unconstitutional he has obstructed them in every manner. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I think that his name will go down to posterity as "the great obstructor." He has thrown himself across the track of the progress of the country in its sure and certain march to universal freedom, universal education, and universal suffrage. He has thrown himself in the way and is an obstruction to justice to the soldiers who saved the Republic.

Of the Cabinet of President Lincoln in office when Andrew Johnson succeeded him one only has remained at his post and true to his trust. Some of them resigned as soon as the apostasy of the President became apparent, and some of them seem to justify the treachery of their chief, even if they are not originally responsible for it. But Edwin M. Stanton has not only refused to support the policy of the President, but has refused to abandon his post and allow the vast armament of the nation to pass under the control of another, who would allow it to be used in the interest of the reviving rebellion. For this refusal the President has sought to dispossess him by the appointment of his successor without the advice and consent of the Senate, the same being in session, and thus violating the Constitution, as well as the law known as the tenure-of-office act.

Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, I consider this act as only one link in the chain of illegal acts by which the President has sought to obstruct the execution of the laws and thwart the will of the loyal people of the United States as expressed by their Representatives in due form of law. On the 7th of December last I was of the opinion that the President was guilty of impeachable offenses, and so cast my vote for his impeachment. I then differed with the majority on this floor. I may have been wrong in my conclusions, but I have not regretted my vote on that occasion. But, of course, the subsequent acts of the President, which have united the Republican members of this House in favor of his impeachment, would have removed all doubts, had any existed, as to the correctness of that vote.

Mr. Chairman, let us remove this bad man from the presidential chair. Let us see to it that his successor appoints honest men to collect the revenues of the country. I need not ask the present occupant of the chair [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois] to go with me in reducing the expenses of the Government to the lowest possible limit, as that is his own well-known policy. Then let us reduce taxation to a point barely sufficient to pay such expenses and collect that on articles of luxury only. Let us provide for paying off the national debt in lawful money, excepting only that portion of it which was expressly agreed to be paid in coin; and then, sir, we can return to our constituents feeling that we have done our part of what Andrew Johnson promised to do, but broke his promise—"to make loyalty respectable and treason odious."

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. H. E. PAINE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 29, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Chairman, what official designation is to be given to Andrew Johnson in these articles of impeachment? Shall we indict him as President of the United States, or as Vice President of the United States, or as Vice-President discharging the powers and duties of the office of President? The honorable chairman of the committee who reports these articles, [Mr. BOUTWELL] submits this question to the consideration of this House, whose duty it is to decide it. The question is a grave one on account of its possible connection with another question soon to be decided at the other end of the Capitol. That other question will be who is to preside over the Senate during the trial of Andrew Johnson? Does the Constitution impose that duty upon the Chief Justice or upon the President of the Senate? If the Chief Justice is to preside then it is probably proper to impeach Andrew Johnson as Vice President discharging the powers and duties of the office of President, and at the same time it is certainly proper to impeach him as simply President. But if the President of the Senate is to preside at his trial we ought not to indict him as President. I will state, sir, the reasons which satisfy me that the Chief Justice is, by the Constitution, authorized and required to preside at this trial.

I will not deny that the case is beset with many difficulties. It happens that the provisions of the Constitution which bear upon this question, that is to say, the provisions relating to the office of Vice President and to the subject of impeachment, are more defective and imperfect than any other parts of the Constitution. In the Constitution it is declared that the President and Vice President shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. But to this day we are not agreed even on this side of the House, to say nothing of the country at large, whether such high crimes and misdemeanors must have been first created by statute or established by the common law. In the Constitution can be found no allusion to the subject of suspension from office pending the trial of an impeachment, and to-day thoughtful minds disagree on the question whether the power of suspension exists at all, and whether, if it exists, it is vested in the Senate alone.

HO. OF REPS.

But the provisions of the Constitution for the impeachment of the Vice President would, in case of their practical application, appear so monstrous as to require prompt amendment; for if Abraham Lincoln were still living and Andrew Johnson Vice President, and we should find it necessary to impeach the Vice President, he would actually have the constitutional right to preside over the Senate during his own trial. The Constitution provides that the Vice President shall be President of the Senate. It is only when he is absent, or is exercising the duties of President of the United States, that a pro tempore President of the Senate is authorized by the Constitution; and it is only when the President is on trial that the Chief Justice is authorized to preside. If, then, Mr. Lincoln were still alive, and this impeachment were to proceed against Andrew Johnson as Vice President, nothing could prevent him from presiding at his own trial, if he should see fit so to do, except a prompt assertion and exercise, either by Congress or by the Senate, of the power of suspension. I have no doubt, sir, that such a reductio ad absurdum would satisfy even my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL,] who so stoutly denies the existence of this power of suspension. More than that, sir; I venture to predict that if the Chief Justice shall resign or die pending the impeachment now commenced, so that we shall find ourselves face to face with the necessity of either terminating the proceedings at once, or permitting Andrew Johnson to nominate a Chief Justice to complete his own trial or suspending him from office, we shall all be ready to reconsider the constitutional question respecting the power of suspension.

The uncertainty of many of the provisions relating to the office of Vice President is hardly less striking. It is provided that—

"In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President."

Does this mean that the office itself or the powers and duties of the office shall devolve upon the Vice President in the cases indicated? In that part of the clause which declares that in case of the President's "inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office" the same shall devolve on the Vice President the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] finds what, in his judgment, warrants the construction that the words "the same" refer not to the office itself, but to its powers and duties; whereas, on the other hand, in that part of the clause which declares that "in case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death (or) resignation, the same shall devolve on the Vice President," I find that which compels me to believe that the words "the same" refer to the office itself.

But there are other difficulties in this clause. Who is to determine when this inability of the President exists, when it begins, when it ends? What would be the constitutional position of the President if, during his temporary inability, the Vice President should act as President? Which of the two would be President? Or should we have two Presidents? Suppose the inability, for example, to result from insanity or bodily disease. Who is to decide when the disease of mind or body reaches such a stage as to amount to "inability to discharge the powers and duties" of the office? Shall an insane President decide when to surrender his power? Shall an ambitious Vice President decide when to assume the powers of a President sick in body or in mind, and when to restore them to a convalescent President; when to wrest his office from a President alleged to be insane, and when to restore it? Or shall these questions be decided by the courts, the Senate, Congress, the Army, or the people?

Suppose, again, that the assassin's bullet had robbed Abraham Lincoln, not of his life, but only of his reason, and after Andrew Johnson had exercised the powers of the presidential office for a year Mr. Lincoln had recovered and resumed the office, what would have been Mr. Johnson's official position under the Constitution during that year? And what would have been Mr. Lincoln's official position? Which would have been President? Or should we have had two Presidents at the same time?

The considerations which satisfy me that, notwithstanding these difficulties by which the case is beset, the Chief Justice and not the President of the Senate is to preside during the trial of Mr. Johnson, are these: the reason of the rule requiring the Chief Justice to preside over the Senate during the trial of the President is that the Vice President, who is the President of the Senate, succeeds to the office of President of the United States upon conviction and removal of the accused. This reason exists in full force in the present case. If Mr. Johnson shall be removed the President of the Senate will succeed to his office. Besides it is clear to my own mind that under the first section of the second article of the Constitution the office itself fully and completely devolves upon the Vice President upon the death of the President. At the same time I think it is the essential character of the powers and duties constitutionally discharged which is to determine the question, and not the official title of the man by whom they are discharged. So far as this question is concerned it is, therefore, in my judgment, after all quite immaterial whether we say that the office of the President or the powers and duties of that office devolved on Mr. Johnson upon the death of Mr. Lincoln. So far as this question is concerned, he who exercises the powers and performs the duties of President is for the time being President. And while I admit that the phrase "Vice President discharging the powers and duties of the office of President," or the phrase "Vice President acting as President," would indicate the mode of accession to, as well as the nature of, the office held, at the same time I think that the word "President" accurately and sufficiently designates the office.

This, in my judgment, is all that is required in the case. I cannot see why the articles should show how Andrew Johnson acquired his office any more in this case than if he had been elected to it by the people. If the committee had in their report described Mr. Johnson as "Vice President acting as President," or as "Vice President discharging the powers and duties of President," I think they would have made no serious mistake. And yet I very much prefer the form which they have adopted. If Abraham Lincoln were now President, after a period of inability during which Mr. Johnson had acted as President, and Mr. Johnson were now Vice President, and we were about to impeach the Vice President for crimes and misdemeanors which he had committed as President, we might be embarrassed by the question whether the Chief Justice or the President of the Senate should preside at his trial. And if we were now about to impeach Mr. Johnson for offenses committed during Mr. Lincoln's life, and while Mr. Johnson was simply Vice President, we might experience similar embarrassment. But no such difficulty attends the case before us. We arraign Mr. Johnson for high crimes and misdemeanors committed since President Lincoln's death, while Mr. Johnson was discharging the same powers and duties which he now discharges.

Again, sir, both the Senate and the House of Representatives have repeatedly, by solemn acts and joint resolutions, recognized the full official character of Andrew Johnson as President of these United States. Time will not permit me to refer to more than one or two of these cases. In the act to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio for certain moneys expended, which act was passed by this Congress and approved by Mr. Johnson on the 29th of March, 1867, we used the following words:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That immediately after the passage of this act the President shall appoint three commissioners by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," &c.

And in the preamble of a joint resolution approved by Andrew Johnson March 29, 1867, we used these words:

"Whereas on the 3d day of April, 1866, by the authority and direction of the President of the United States, agricultural colleges, covering nearly two hundred and seventy thousand acres, was issued and delivered to the State of North Carolina," &c.

Mr. Johnson himself has, on scores, if not on hundreds, of occasions, within the last year, asserted his position as President of the United States. In his last annual message, in which he denounces Congress for attempting to strip him of some of the prerogatives of the presidential office, he again and again reiterates this assertion. In the very order for the removal of Mr. Stanton upon which the first of these articles of impeachment is founded, and which bears the date of February 21, 1868, Mr. Johnson says to Mr. Stanton:

"Sir: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me, as President, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, you are hereby removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon receipt of this communication."

This question, then, seems to be closed, so far as the accused is concerned, and so far, also, as that tribunal is concerned in which is vested absolute and exclusive power to decide it—I mean the Senate of the United States.

I pass now, sir, to the consideration of the second of the articles of impeachment presented by the committee. I shall, probably, have no time to discuss any others.

By the second section of the second article of the Constitution officers of the United States are, so far as their mode of appointment is concerned, divided into two distinct classes. The first class embraces those officers who can, under the Constitution, only be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The second class embraces those who are styled inferior officers, whose appointment may be vested by law in the President, or in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments, at the discretion of Congress. Congress may authorize the President or the courts of law or the heads of Departments to appoint inferior officers without the advice and consent of the Senate, but cannot authorize them so to appoint any officers except inferior officers. In the absence of legislation vesting the appointment of inferior officers in the President, courts of law, or heads of Departments, the Constitution requires them to be appointed, like officers of the other class, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Constitution contains no provision for or allusion to the removal of officers of either class as a distinct and isolated act. How, then, may an officer be constitutionally removed whose appointment must be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate? And how can an officer be removed whose appointment may be vested by law in the President, or courts of law, or heads of Departments? It seems to me that, upon principle, the answers to these questions are very plain. Officers of the first class, that is, officers who, under the Constitution, can only be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may, in the first place, be removed by the appointment of their successors, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This mode, and this mode only, is expressly prescribed in the Constitution. They may, perhaps, in the second place, be removed by an order of removal made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, without an appointment of a successor. This second mode is not expressly provided by the Constitution, and is only authorized, if authorized at all, by implication from the power to appoint. I am willing to concede, for the purpose of this argument, that a removal may be so made.

In the case of one of the second class of officers, those inferior officers whose appointment may be vested by law in the President alone, or the courts of law, or the heads of Departments, the mode of his removal will, in the first place, depend upon the question whether his appointment or removal has or has not been vested by law in the President, the courts of law, or the heads of Departments. If it has not been so vested he can only be removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, either by the appointment of his successor, under the express power of the Constitution, or by mere removal under a power possibly to be implied therefrom. But if his appointment or removal has been vested in the President alone then the President alone may remove him, either by the appointment of a successor, as expressly provided, or, possibly, by a mere order of removal under an implied power. The result is that inferior officers may be removed by the President alone if their appointment or removal has been vested in the President alone. If it has not been so vested they can only be removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and as to all other officers it is quite immaterial what acts Congress may pass; they cannot be constitutionally appointed or removed save by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The President, in his last annual message, earnestly insists that unless the Constitution gives him by implication the power of removal, he is held to an official responsibility for the acts of his subordinates, of which he cannot possibly acquit himself. But, sir, the Constitution actually authorizes Congress to vest absolutely in the courts of law or heads of Departments the appointment of every inferior officer in the executive branch of the Government, without exception, and without any possibility of interference by the President; and if you admit what his defenders claim, that the Cabinet officers are, under the Constitution, inferior officers, then Congress may at any time by law, deprive the President of the power of appointing or even nominating a single one of the many thousand executive officers required in the Government. But if you deny, what his defenders assert, that the members of the Cabinet are inferior officers, then the Constitution authorizes Congress by law to deprive him of the power to nominate or appoint any except Cabinet officers. The power of appointment, therefore, has no intimate relation to the President's responsibility for the official conduct of his subordinates. How absurd, then, to make this responsibility the basis of an implied power of removal!

Now, if the Secretary of War is not an inferior officer within the meaning of this provision of the Constitution, he can neither be appointed nor removed except by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In that case an examination of the statutes will be quite superfluous. It is only necessary to look into the Constitution itself. Is the Secretary of War an inferior officer within the sense of the constitutional provision referred to? Does not the very phraseology of the clause which relates to the appointment of these inferior officers exclude the idea that the head of the Department of War is one of them? These are the words of the clause:

"But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Is it reasonable to suppose that one of these very inferior officers has been selected as an authorized depository of this power of appointment of inferior officers? Is not the idea excluded by the very collocation of the words "inferior officers" and "heads of Departments" in this clause? But, sir, the consequences of such a construction as will make the head of the War Department an inferior officer under this clause are most absurd. If he is an inferior officer, Congress is expressly authorized by this clause, at its discretion, to vest his appointment absolutely in either the President, or the courts of law, or the heads of Departments. That is to say, Congress may authorize the Supreme Court, or any other court of law of the United States, to appoint and remove the Secretary of War without the interference of the President, or the approval of the Senate. More than that, sir, Congress may authorize the Secretary of War to appoint the Secretary of War without the interference of the President, or the advice or consent of the Senate, and thus by a single act enable every Secretary to designate his successor and so establish a perpetual succession, which neither the President nor the Senate nor the people can interrupt. Sir, you cannot avoid these most absurd consequences of the construction proposed unless you take the ground that the Secretary of War is not one of the heads of Departments referred to in the Constitution. But that the term "heads of Departments" does apply to the Secretary of War and other Cabinet officers is placed beyond a doubt by that passage in the same section wherein it is provided that the President—

"May require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments."

If I am right, sir, in my opinion, that the Secretary of War is not an inferior officer within the meaning of the second section of the second article of the Constitution, then the Constitution does not permit, nor can any statute empower the President to appoint a Secretary of War except under the last clause of the section, to fill a vacancy which may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting a commission which shall expire at the end of the next session. This, of course, disposes of one branch of the case now before us. If I am also right in my opinion that under the Constitution officers who can be appointed only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate can only be removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, then it is unnecessary to examine the bearing or meaning of statutory provisions on this subject.

I therefore take the position that the Constitution itself, any statutory legislation to the contrary notwithstanding, forbids the appointment or removal of the Secretary of War without the advice and consent of the Senate while the Senate is in session. And the President of the United States, having violated this provision of the Constitution for the corrupt and wicked purpose of placing the military power of the Government in the hands of its enemies, is subject to impeachment.

But, sir, for the sake of argument I will grant that the Secretary of War is an inferior officer, whose appointment and removal may be constitutionally vested by law in the President alone, without the advice and consent of the Senate; and I will also, for the sake of argument, admit all the other premises upon which the defenders of the President rest their legal argument, that by the act of 1789 the President alone was authorized to remove the Secretary of War, and that by the act of 1795 the President was empowered to fill, for a period of six months, by ad interim appointment, a vacancy in the office of Secretary of War, whether it was or was not, in the language of the statute, a vacancy, whereby the Secretary of War could not perform the duties of his office. I will admit, too, that the Adjutant General of the Army was eligible to such an ad interim appointment, and, finally, that by the proviso of the first section of the civil-office tenure act of 1867 the Secretary of War was empowered to hold his office for and during the term of office actually held by the President who appointed him, and one month thereafter, and not during the term for which such President was elected. These are all the premises claimed by the President's defenders. Admit them, and still their conclusion does not follow. Most of them can be admitted only for the sake of argument. I have already shown what absurdities are involved in the doctrine that the Secretary of War is, within the meaning of the second article of the Constitution, an inferior officer. It is not to be forgotten that if any power of removal is conferred upon the President by the act of 1789 it is not expressly conferred, but only by implication from the clause which provides that the chief clerk—

"Whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office, by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy, shall, during such vacancy, have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers appertaining to the said Department."

Whether this clause of itself confers a power of removal, or merely defines the powers of the chief clerk, in case of vacancy by removal or otherwise, leaving the power of removal to be determined by other statutes, is a question of construction. It should also be remembered that the act of 1795 only authorizes an ad interim appointment to fill a "vacancy whereby the Secretary of War cannot perform the duties of his office." And if under the civil-office tenure act of 1867 Mr. Stanton's term ended, and his office became vacant one month after Mr. Lincoln's death, or when the law took effect, the same was true of the terms of Secretaries Seward, Welles, and McCulloch, neither of whom was ever reappointed, and this day the President retains them in violation of the law.

Assuming these premises, however, let us ascertain the official position which Mr. Stanton actually maintained under the Constitution and laws on the day before the civil-office tenure act took effect—that is to say, on March 1, 1867. Mr. Stanton had been appointed by President Lincoln, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, during his first term. Under that appointment his official character remained absolutely perfect up to the close of Mr. Lincoln's first term. If Mr. Lincoln had the power to remove him without the approval of the Senate he had not exercised that power. Nor had he removed him or attempted to remove him with the approval of the Senate. Inasmuch as the office of Secretary of War, like that of chief clerk of the War Department, was, by the act of 1789, made of indefinite duration, with no provision for its termination, except by new appointment or removal, Mr. Stanton continued to be the constitutional and lawful Secretary of War from the commencement of Mr. Lincoln's second term until his death. And, for precisely the same reason, he continued to be the constitutional and lawful Secretary of War from the date of Mr. Johnson's accession to the Presidency until March 1, 1867. If the law or the Constitution had expressly, or by implication, limited the duration of the office of the Secretary to the term of the President by whom he was nominated, then of course a new appointment would have been necessary at the commencement of Mr.

HO. OF REPS.

Lincoln's second term. And if the law or Constitution had expressly or by implication limited the duration of the office of the Secretary to the lifetime of the President by whom he was nominated, then a new appointment would have been necessary at the accession of Mr. Johnson to make Mr. Stanton, to all intents and purposes, the lawful incumbent of the office. But no such provisions existed up to March 1, 1867. Under the law, as it stood from the organization of the Government up to March 1, 1867, the first Secretary of War of President Washington might have retained his office through the successive administrations until March 1, 1867, if he had lived so long, without any new appointment, unless displaced by removal or by the appointment of a successor.

If President Johnson had the power, under the act of 1789, to remove Mr. Stanton from the War Office between the date of Mr. Lincoln's death and March 1, 1867, yet, as a matter of fact, he did not exercise that power. On the contrary, he declined to accept Mr. Stanton's resignation, tendered soon after the death of Mr. Lincoln. Nor had President Johnson up to that time removed or attempted to remove the Secretary by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. On the 1st day of March, 1867, therefore, Mr. Stanton held the office of Secretary of War by a title as good as that by which any Secretary has ever held the office since the organization of the Government, or ever can hold it in the future—by a title absolutely perfect and unquestionable. Grant that up to that day the act of 1789 did permit Mr. Johnson to remove Mr. Stanton without the approval of the Senate, yet on the 2d day of March, 1867, whatever power of removal had been previously conferred by statute was withdrawn by statute, whatever had been conferred by the act of 1789 was withdrawn by the civil-office tenure act, the provisions of which clearly take away whatever power may have been by statute previously granted for the removal of any civil officer without the advice and consent of the Senate. After the passage of the civil-office tenure act of 1867 the President had no independent power of removal by virtue of any statute, whether the act of 1789 or any other. If he claimed any such power after the passage of the act of 1867 he must have based his claim upon constitutional, not statutory grounds; for whatever the statute had given the statute had taken away. If the Constitution had given or could give any power of removal which the statute could not take away, the statute certainly had not given, could not give, any power which the statute could not also take away. Unless, then, the Constitution proprio vigore invests the President with the absolute power of removing civil officers of the United States he could not have so removed Mr. Stanton after March 2, 1867, if he had himself nominated him to the office which he held. I think this proposition is too clear for doubt or dispute.

Now, how is the case affected by the circumstance that Mr. Stanton was not nominated by Mr. Johnson, but was nominated by Mr. Lincoln? To this circumstance, of course, is applied the proviso of the first section of the civil-office tenure act, wherein it is declared that the Secretary of War shall hold his office during the term of the President by whom he was appointed and for one month thereafter. It is claimed, in the first place, that the expression "term of the President" in this proviso means the term which he actually holds and not the term for which he is elected—that in the case before us it means the term which President Lincoln actually held and not the term for which he was elected; and, in the next place, that after the expiration of the month so limited the President had the right to remove Mr. Stanton at any time. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the term meant in the act is the term actually held by the President, what legal and constitutional powers and rights had President Johnson in the premises, after the civil-office tenure act became a law? It may possibly be a question when the month practically ended; whether it ended by retroactive operation of the law, on the 15th day of May, 1865, one month after Mr. Lincoln died, or on the day when the law took effect, or at the expiration of one month after the law went into operation. To this question let the defenders of the President choose their own answer. They may assume that this proviso applied to Mr. Stanton and may fix the end of the term therein designated at either one of those three dates. How now stands the case? The most that can possibly be claimed, indeed all that can possibly be claimed, from this proviso is that upon the day fixed a vacancy occurred in the office of the Secretary of War, which could be filled according to law.

The case will be strongest for the President if the end of the term be fixed at the expiration of one month from and after the passage of the act, that is, on April 2, 1867. Up to that time the President never, in fact, attempted to remove or suspend Mr. Stanton, either with or without the consent of the Senate; up to that time he was clothed with the complete official character of Secretary of War. Now, if the proviso of the act of 1867 applied to his official term on the 2d day of April, 1867, its effect was not to enable the President to remove the incumbent at his pleasure on or after that day, but to create a vacancy at that time by the mere operation of the law itself. But for the vacancy so created Mr. Stanton would have been entitled under the clause which precedes the proviso to hold his office until his successor should have been lawfully appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, just as Postmaster General Randall and Secretary Browning, who had been nominated by Mr. Johnson, were entitled to hold theirs. If Mr. Stanton's office did not fall within the class covered by the proviso, so as to become vacant at the end of the month, then it did fall within the class covered by the first clause of the section, and all statutory power to remove the incumbent was withdrawn by the act. If the first clause, which authorized civil officers appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to hold their offices until their successors should be appointed in the same way, was rendered inoperative in Mr. Stanton's case, by the proviso limiting his term to April 2, 1867, then the only result was that a vacancy in the office occurred on that day. The law did not authorize Mr. Johnson to remove Mr. Stanton, but did itself remove him and create a vacancy in the office.

Let it be admitted, then, that on that day a vacancy arose, and that nothing in the act of 1867 exempted this particular case from the operation of the act of 1795, authorizing the President to fill vacancies by ad interim appointments, or from the operation of the act of 1789, authorizing the chief clerk, during a vacancy, to have the charge and custody of the records, books, and papers of the Department. What disposition was it competent for the President to make of the War Office on that day? And how did he, in fact, dispose of it? Four courses were open to him. He could either put the chief clerk in charge under the act of 1789; he could make an ad interim appointment under the act of 1795; he could make a full appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, supposing the Senate to be in session; or, finally, if the Senate was not in session, he could make a temporary appointment, to terminate, unless approved by the Senate, at the end of the next session of Congress. What course did the President adopt? He did not put the chief clerk in charge of the office. He did not nominate to the Senate, nor did he appoint an officer to hold until the end of the next session of Congress. There was only one other lawful course open to his choice. That was to make an ad interim appointment. Did he make such an appointment? Certainly he did not. But, inasmuch as an ad interim appointment, under the act of 1795, required no particular ceremony for its consummation, I have no doubt that the mere permissive retention of Mr. Stanton by the President might have been a substantial compliance with the act.

And conceding all the premises claimed by the President's defenders, you can place his retention of Mr. Stanton upon no other legal ground than that of an informal ad interim appointment. Precisely the same thing is true of the cases of Secretaries Seward, Welles, and McCulloch. But the act of 1795 expressly and peremptorily provided that no single vacancy should be filled by ad interim appointments for more than six months; therefore it became the duty of the President to nominate to the Senate, on the 2d of October, 1867, or as soon thereafter as the Senate should be in session. If, then, Mr. Stanton's retention is assumed to have been virtually an ad interim appointment under the act of 1795, and the subsequent substitution of General Grant for the suspended Secretary is also assumed to have been virtually an ad interim appointment, under the same act, yet the six months had expired before the present session commenced, and since the first day of this session it has not been lawful for the President, under any conceivable construction of any statute, to make an ad interim appointment. Giving to each of these statutes any phase of construction claimed by the President's champions there has been no day since the first day of this session when he could lawfully make any appointment except a full appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Their defense on this ground, be it remembered, would gain no strength from an admission of the unconstitutionality of that feature of the civil-office tenure act which prevents the removal of officers without the advice and consent of the Senate, for I am now reasoning upon the admitted ground that a vacancy actually existed in the War Department by virtue of the law itself. Admitting all their premises, then, their conclusion does not follow.

The attempted appointment of the Adjutant General was absolutely without warrant of law, even though the proviso of the act of 1867 applies, as the President's friends insist it does apply, to Mr. Stanton. And if it does apply to him, then it also applies to Secretaries Seward, Welles, and McCulloch; and their offices have been vacant and their acts void at least since April 2, 1867. On the other hand, if it does not apply to him, the power of removal, without the advice and consent of the Senate granted by the act of 1789, is withdrawn from the President, so far as his office is concerned, by the act of 1867.

Of course it cannot be said that it was for the President to decide, under the act of 1867, whether a vacancy did or did not occur in Mr. Stanton's office, or when it occurred. The law itself did or did not create a vacancy. If it did not, then all pretext of authority to make an ad interim appointment disappears. If it did, then the vacancy occurred at the time fixed by the law, which was either on the 15th day of May, 1865, or on the 2d day of March, 1867, or on the 2d day of April, 1867. Giving the President his choice in these dates, he was by the express provision of the act of 1795 forbidden to fill any one vacancy by appointment ad interim for a longer term than six months. And whether you do or do not regard the retention of Mr. Stanton up to the date of his suspension, and the subsequent appointment of General Grant, as virtually ad interim appointments under the act of 1795, yet the period of six months fixed by that act began to run at the very latest on the 2d day of April, 1867, and ended on the second day of October, 1867. After the first day of the present session, therefore, it was too late for an ad interim appointment under any possible construction of the law or Constitution. It results from this reasoning that the appointment of General Thomas was a violation of the Constitution. It will not help the case on this point to say or show that the President has, under the Constitution, a right to remove the Secretary of War at his pleasure without the advice or consent of the Senate. Grant all that; the right to appoint is quite another thing. The Constitution does not vest that power in the President. If it be construed to authorize Congress so to vest that power, and if, at the same time, it be assumed that the act of 1795 did so vest it as to ad interim appointments, still the period to be covered by such appointment was limited to six months, and that period had expired long before the appointment of General Thomas.

For precisely the same reason it is of no avail to show that the feature of the act of 1867, which requires the advice and consent of the Senate in cases of removal, is unconstitutional. And for the same reason, also, is it of no avail to show that the act of 1789 expressly authorized the removal of the Secretary of War.

Admitting, then, all of the premises claimed by the President's defenders; admitting that the President has, under the Constitution, absolute power of removal, that the act of 1789 expressly authorized him to remove the Secretary of War, and that the civil-office tenure act, of its own force, created a vacancy in that office; and permitting the President to select, at his pleasure, either one of the three possible dates of the occurrence of such vacancy; admitting, also, that, by the act of 1795, the President was authorized to supply such vacancy for six months, by ad interim appointment; admitting all this, we still find the President without justification for the appointment of Lorenzo Thomas as ad interim Secretary of War.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN F. DRIGGS,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, in rising to discuss the subject before the House, I am impressed with the knowledge that it is useless to attempt to say much without going over, to some extent at least, the same ground occupied by those who have preceded me. For the first time since the organization of the Government we are considering charges against the Chief Magistrate of the nation, who is now arraigned before the Senate, the whole people of the United States and of the world, for high crimes and misdemeanors, and having prepared these grave charges against Andrew Johnson before such an august tribunal, it is incumbent upon those instigating the same to make good their promise to sustain these accusations.

Sir, a man's neighbors, those who are familiar with the character of a man, whether he be a private or public citizen, scarce ever make mistakes in estimating his moral worth and standing. If he is a good citizen and neighbor, a sober man, industrious, honest, and truthful; if he obeys the laws, both of God and man; it will be known and acknowledged, and no one will commit errors in forming a judgment of his character. On the other hand, if he be idle, vicious, dishonest, untruthful, quarrelsome, self-willed, intemperate, a known violator of the laws of God and of his country, disguise these qualities as he may, his character will be known and a proper estimate given of such a man everywhere. No matter, sir, if he shall be clothed in the robes of piety and shielded by the garb of religion; no matter though he may offer long prayers in the sanctuary and make oft-repeated professions of pure motives and good intentions, he cannot long deceive the world as to his real character.

Mr. Chairman, the history of crime and of its perpetrators shows that some of the most notorious criminals and felons in all times past, and especially political offenders, have been more conspicuous and celebrated for their skill and cunning in covering over their motives and the evidence of their guilt than for the very crimes themselves. The history of Greece, of Rome, Carthage, France, and even that of this country, proves this fact. When the Trojan horse disgorged its armed soldiers within the secure and impregnable walls of Troy, and by treachery and professions of friendship this monster gained a position in the citadel of that confiding city, Troy fell. Other nations have had similar experiences.

Mr. Chairman, I have shown that political crimes are conceived and carried into execution almost always under extreme professions of patriotism, love for the people, and veneration for law, the very letter and spirit of which are cunningly violated and rendered inoperative by every act that can be devised, till, by slow degrees, veneration for law is gone and with it the liberties of the people. What is the history of the great political offender who now stands charged with high crimes and misdemeanors and with attempting to corrupt the officers of the Army, to destroy the citadel of this great and free republic? Why, sir, it is the same as that of many others who have gone before him.

But, more fortunate for the safety of our liberties, in his maddened zeal to accomplish his evil designs, he has at last openly and without disguise violated and set at defiance the laws and law-making power of the land. More fortunate for our liberties, because had he continued, as in times past, to artfully embarrass and prevent the execution of law by continuing to submit to the treasonable advice and more able judgment of his friends, he might have brought ruin to the cause of liberty and justice, and possibly have escaped the punishment due to his crimes. But, not content with the progress made, he attempted a little too soon to declare himself superior to and above the law. And more fortunate still, our fathers who organized this Government and gave us the Constitution as a guide gave us also a power in the land higher than the one-man power accidentally and unfortunately, and, God be praised, temporarily, held by Andrew Johnson. That power, sir, was given to the people's representatives, the Congress of the United States. It is their mission to defend the liberties of the people, and that high and holy duty they will perform without regard to the threats of rebels or their allies.

Sir, it is not given to man to read the thoughts of the human heart. He may only judge of men's motives and wicked designs by their acts. Judging by this rule, and taking as my guide the whole course of Andrew Johnson since the murder of Abraham Lincoln, I cannot doubt that Andrew Johnson was as guilty of moral and political treason before he had thrown himself openly in the face of law by the attempted removal of Mr. Stanton as he is to-day by the commission of that act. Sir, I believe he is guilty, and that he ought to and will be removed not only for the violation of the tenure-of-office law, but, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, in attempting to corrupt inferior officers, and thus violating military law. Not only this; but for violating the plain letter of the Constitution which he had sworn to protect.

Sir, Andrew Johnson is to this nation what the Trojan horse was to Troy—he is all fair without while within is concealed instruments of death to the liberties of the people.

I earnestly trust that the great fraud has been discovered in time to save this nation from the wicked designs of its enemies, and to this end

I hope he may have a fair trial and a speedy exit from the high station he fills, that his example may deter others for all time from a similar fate, and that peace, confidence, and prosperity may again be restored to our distracted country.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. GARRETT DAVIS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 11 and 20, 1868.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 439) additional and supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to the acts supplementary thereto—

Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am very deeply impressed with the importance of the pending bill and the measures to which it is supplemental; and a consciousness of my inability to examine and dissect them as they should be is a source of real grief. I am, however, sustained by this reflection: that in opposing congressional reconstruction I am wholly free from party prejudice or party predilection. In attempting an humble part in the exposition of measures of such transcendent interest I am happy to be free of such unworthy influences.

Without intending to be egotistical I announce that I am an old Whig. I learned my politics in the school of the great statesman, Mr. Clay, and I still adhere to his teachings, to his interpretation of the Constitution, which he deduced from the instrument itself, illustrated by the Federalist, and which is made all luminous by the subsequent writings of Mr. Madison, recently published. When I was proximating manhood the trouble incident to the admission of Missouri as a State into the Union sprung up, and was composed by the celebrated compromise which has ever since borne that name. The paternity of that measure has been generally attributed to Mr. Clay. Its author was Senator Thomas, of Illinois; but it was the matchless powers of Mr. Clay that procured its adoption.

MISCELLANEOUS REMARKS.

I believe that Congress had no power to impose its conditions, but had I been an actor in that important transaction, the same stress that controlled the great and patriotic spirit of my leader would doubtless have borne me along. That compromise averted a threatened dissolution of the Union at that early day of our national existence, allayed the strife of sections and discordant institutions, and gave to the whole country peace and repose for the third of a century. The repeal of that compromise, if not a crime, was a great political blunder, and has been the fruitful mother of all the great political ills that have since afflicted the people of the United States. Though but a private citizen, I was open in my opposition to its repeal or disturbance; and not only to the Kansas-Nebraska bill, but also to the Lecompton constitution. No power can legitimately make the constitution and the government of a State but its own people, and I could not doubt that that constitution was not made by the people of Kansas, but by a small fraction who attempted to foist it upon the great mass of her protesting people. I also opposed the secession of the southern States, both on principle and policy. I believed it to be not only without any authority of the Constitution, but simply revolution attempted to be disguised by another name, and I never doubted that it would produce a great civil war and all its concomitants; but of the terrible extent, character, and consequences I had not approximated a foreshadow. The people of the southern States had had long and great cause of complaint of many of the free States and their people, but none against the Government of the United States; their grievances at the hands of the former were far from being sufficient to justify a movement for peaceable separation, and they did not form a plausible pretext for attempting it by the sword. Therefore when the authority of the United States was thrown off by the southern States and their people became armed insurrectionists, I advocated their suppression by military force; and when our Government passed beyond the pale of its constitutional power, which was merely the suppression of the insurrection, and struck for the subjugation and conquest of the southern States and people, I opposed and condemned this unauthorized assumption of power, and the rights of the conqueror claimed under it.

I have succinctly stated my position in relation to these interesting questions, and as to each I believe I was right, and I still adhere to that position. I have done this to support my declaration that in condemning the reconstruction measures of Congress I was free from party prejudice or party predilection, and was actuated solely by devotion to our country and its Constitution.

Mr. President, in the career of the United States there have been four principal epochs:

1. Their revolt against the mother country, and the establishment of their independence.
2. The formation and adoption of their Constitution, after a few years of experience in peace had demonstrated the utter and hopeless insufficiency of the Articles of Confederation to give them external security, and internal union, peace, order, and prosperity.
3. The recent great and most extraordinary revolt of the people of eleven of the United States, and its still more extraordinary suppression, in its suddenness and completeness, ending so abruptly and squarely.
4. The imminent danger of the overthrow of our Constitution and system of mixed national and State governments by the party in power, in a series of unconstitutional and destructive measures, devised by them to break down the checks imposed on Congress by the organization of the other departments, and to defeat the legal and proper efforts of the people to displace them from power.

This fourth epoch is not yet consummated, and what remains to be done will determine its character. It has interest greater than those which preceded it, because the essential good that each of them brought to the American people is all involved in it, and is now to be lost or continued to them; and its importance is proportionably augmented. The authors of secession did not propose or desire war with the United States; on the contrary, their earnest wishes, their great hope was, that they would be allowed peaceably to secede. They were moved by no hostility to our form of Government, for they framed one for themselves differing from it only in one principle, the admission of the right of secession. The southern States admitted their consanguinity, and made strong professions of friendship and peace for the adhering States and their people. They, and some of the other States, had become deeply dissatisfied and embittered with each other; and they sought a peaceful separation from, as they believed, their northern enemies. The publicly expressed opinions of the late President of the United States, of the President pro tempore of the Senate, of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, of Horace Greeley, and others, that if it was their settled wish they should be permitted to separate from the other States, aided them to reach the conclusion that in adopting that measure they would not precipitate war. It is now certainly a debatable question whether it would not have been better for all the States and all the people that "the erring sisters should have been permitted to depart in peace." Each one had the right, under the constitution of the southern confederacy, at any time to secede from it; and their position in the United States would have been soon demonstrated to be so much more eligible than membership in the southern confederacy that before this time all of them, one by one, would have returned to the old Union, contrite as was the prodigal son.

But if their military coercion is to result, not only in their conquest and subjugation and the destruction of their governments and institutions, but also in the overthrow of the Constitution and the mixed system of national and State Governments and the liberties of the people of the United States, and the erection upon their ruins of a military despotism, better a thousand times that the right of the southern States peaceably to secede had been at once fully admitted. One third of the dominion of the imperial Republic would have fallen from it, but liberty, regulated and secured by the Constitution, would have remained to all the people.

The rebellion has been successfully and signally suppressed, and the conflict of arms by which it was effected terminated about three years since. The rebels had made their experiment, and the completeness of their overthrow was only surpassed by that of their submission. Their country and its resources were utterly exhausted, and their hopes and spirits broken down. They submitted in perfect obedience to the Constitution, laws, and authorities of the United States, greatly needing and earnestly invoking their protection, prepared and asking to be allowed to resume their place in the Union and Government, to perform all their duties, and to be admitted to the possession and enjoyment of all their rights. They have been purified in one of the severest ordeals through which any people ever passed, and to-day, in principle and spirit, they are nearer to true loyalty to the Constitution than any portion of the people of the United States. Their present true allegiance to it is in striking contrast with the disloyalty of the Radical party; they sought some years ago to separate themselves from it, even at the hazard of civil war; but the Radicals are now subverting it to enable them to hold on to power, to continue their possession of the form of government for its honors, its offices, its spoils, and plunder. The simple but momentous question now is, which shall succumb, the constitutional Government and liberties of the people of the United States or the Radical party? They cannot both exist; one or the other must perish. Even to produce its overthrow, I have no wish that this party should persist in its mischievous measures, which have regularly proceeded from bad to worse, until they have culminated in the one now under consideration, and which, in view of the early age of our country, the general intelligence and virtue of its people, their watchfulness of their individual interests and prosperity, their devotion to the principles of liberty, and the constitutional defenses of them built up so recently by men whose memories we worship, is the most startling and monstrous measure that was ever devised in a legislative assembly to be imposed upon any people. I sometimes have to summon my cold reason to verify, that the strange and terrible events of the past eight years are reality; they seem so like the unsubstantial, shifting, but always horrible creations of a fever's delirium; and certainly of all the strange phenomena the most startling is the bill under consideration.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the United States was formed by the action of thirteen sovereign States. They made a Constitution for the organization of a Government for the whole, by which they delegated to it some general powers necessary and proper for the management of their common affairs; and all the powers not invested by the Constitution in the common Government were reserved by a special provision. The powers of each State to form its own government and make its own laws for the regulation of its people and domestic affairs, were not only not delegated to the common Government, but were comprehended by the words describing the reserved powers of the States. The validity of the common Government resulted wholly from the adoption of the Constitution by the States, and no amendment can be made to it but by their ratification.

The General Government was not only made by the States, but their governments were incorporated as part of its machinery. The members of the Senate can be chosen only by the Legislatures of the States; the qualifications of the electors of representatives to Congress are fixed by them exclusively; and "the times, places, and manner of holding elections of Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators." Each State appoints, in such manner as its Legislature may direct, its presidential electors; and if, in the presidential election, no candidate shall have a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if the States, by their representatives, would not vote or would divide so that no candidate could get a majority of them, there could be no presidential election. The Government of the United States was then formed with the knowledge and purpose by those who made it, that it could in various modes be brought to a final and peaceful end by these States.

1. By the people of the States refusing to elect Representatives to Congress.
2. By their Legislatures refusing to choose Senators.
3. By the refusal of their Legislatures to direct the manner in which presidential electors may be appointed.
4. By the failure of their representatives to go into an election of President when there has been no election by the electors.
5. By the States, when they proceed in such a state of case, to attempt an election, refusing or failing to give the vote of a majority of them to one candidate.

This view of the subject shows how the States and their governments are blended with the Government of the United States, that they are in truth a part of its essential framework and machinery, and that it could not be administered or exist without their friendly coöperation. The men who framed the Constitution comprehended fully what they were doing, and they not only did not intend that the Government created by it should manage the domestic affairs of the States, nor absorb any of their reserved rights and powers, but that it should be dependent for its continued existence upon the States. All the publications of the time show, that its best friends had serious doubts of the success and continuance of the new Government; that they clearly understood the different modes in which it could be terminated; and if it should from any cause come to an end, that every State should have a completely organized government, fully competent to take care of its affairs. Every intelligent man who has carefully read the history of that period, knows that the government of each State and its sovereign and exclusive control of all its own domestic affairs, were objects which greatly more absorbed the affections and solicitude of its people than even the great necessity for a common Government, and all the fruits which it could be expected to bring to them. When the work of the members of the Convention had been finished, and those great and virtuous men were about to affix their names to the draft of the Constitution, if it could then infallibly have been revealed to them, that the reserved sovereignty and rights of their respective States would be subject by the new Government to such atrocious violations as we have witnessed in the last few years, the pen would have dropped from the hand of all of them, and the unsigned Constitution would have been abandoned forever. Such a revulsion would have originated in exalted and far-seeing patriotism, for the reserved sovereignty and rights of the States are, beyond all measure, of more value to the people of each State than all the good which the Government of the United States can confer on them. Its chief end was to secure to them the reserved sovereignty and rights against foreign and domestic dangers, and when it destroys them it becomes a direful curse.

SENATE.

Reconstruction—Mr. Davis.

This atrocious bill strikes down all the reserved sovereignty and rights of ten States and their people, abrogates their governments and the States, notwithstanding Congress and the President and the Supreme Court have each, in many solemn, official acts, recognized their existence both during and since the suppression of the rebellion; wrests the Constitution and all its guarantees and protection away from their people; declares who shall and who shall not vote, and who shall and who shall not be candidates in the work of constructing the governments of those States; sets up the General of the Army as an absolute military dictator in them; ejects from them the jurisdiction and power of the Supreme Court, and of the President of the United States, both as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and as the chief executive officer of the Government, on whom the Constitution specially devolves the duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and whom it requires to swear that he will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of his ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States; and then declares all attempts of those high functionaries to perform their constitutional duties in those ten States to be crimes, and visits them with infamous punishment.

Here is the very frenzy of faction in its mischievous and deformed wickedness. The authors and supporters of this measure or I labor under mental and moral insanity, and it does not seem to me to be I.

Mr. President, some of the defenders of this reconstruction policy, and particularly its great champion in the other House, frankly declare that it has no warrant in the Constitution. That admission should end the controversy, for Congress derives all its powers from the Constitution, and when it attempts to exercise any outside of it becomes simply a revolutionary assembly. Several Senators have claimed that the reconstruction measures are authorized by the Constitution, but most of them who support the policy have not disclosed their position on this question. He is a bold man who, notwithstanding the public declaration of his conviction that the Constitution gives no authority to pass these acts, yet supports them; to be so convinced and to conceal it while voting for it is the easier part.

I propose to examine the provisions of the Constitution which have been relied upon as conferring on Congress the power to pass the pending and previous reconstruction bills. The fourth section of the fourth article, in connection with the provision which invests Congress with a power of incidental legislation, have been conjointly claimed as the source of this power by all the Senators who have spoken to this point, except my honorable friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] who repudiates wholly the former provision and claims the power exclusively from the latter one, which is in these words:

"Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or any department or officer thereof."

The power conferred by this clause is of an incidental and secondary character, and the laws it empowers Congress to pass, are such as may be necessary and proper to execute some other and enumerated power vested in the Government, or some of its departments or officers. This power of incidental legislation is a very extensive field, but any act of Congress under it must have three indispensable conditions. First, it must be to execute another power, named in the Constitution; second, it must be necessary and proper to carry that other power into execution; and third, it must itself be consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution. This whole class of legislation is of a parasitical character; it is the vine, and the enumerated power which it isto aid is the tree to support it, and without which it falls. The reconstruction acts find no authority in this provision of the Constitution per se. That it is not authorized by the fourth section of the fourth article, or both of them together, is equally certain, though it requires more of argument to demonstrate it.

To aid in this task I will read from Kent's Commentaries, and the writings of Madison, recently published, in explanation of the nature and general principles of our system of Government:

"The Constitution of the United States is an instrument containing the grant of specific powers, and the Government of the Union cannot claim any powers but what are contained in the grant and given either expressly or by necessary implication. The powers vested in the State governments by their respective constitutions, or remaining with the people of the several States prior to the establishment of the Constitution of the United States continued unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they are granted to the United States. We are to ascertain the true construction of the Constitution and the precise extent of the residuary authorities of the several States by the declared sense and practice of the governments respectively when there is no collision, and in all other cases where the question is of a judicial nature we are to ascertain it by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; and those decisions ought to be studied and universally understood in respect to all the leading questions of constitutional law. The people of the United States have declared the Constitution to be the supreme law of the land, and it is entitled to universal and implicit obedience. Every act of Congress, and every act of the Legislatures of the States, and every part of the Constitution of any State, which are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States are necessarily void. This is a clear and settled principle of constitutional jurisprudence. The judicial power of the Union is declared to extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution; and to the judicial power it belongs, whenever a case is judicially before it, to determine what is the law of the land. The determination of the Supreme Court of the United States in every such case must be final and conclusive, because the Constitution gives to that tribunal the power to decide, and gives no appeal from the decision."—1 Kent's Commentaries.

Mr. Madison, in what are called the Madison Papers, volume 4, page 394, dated in 1834, says:

"As the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the United States are coördinate, and each equally bound to support the Constitution, it follows that each must, in the exercise of its functions, be guided by the text of the Constitution according to its own interpretation of it; and consequently that in the event of irreconcilable interpretations the prevalence of the one or the other department must depend on the nature of the case as receiving the final decision from one or the other, and passing from that decision into effect without involving the functions of any other."

"It is certainly due from the functionaries of the several departments to pay much respect to the opinions of each other; and as far as official independence and obligation will permit to consult the means of adjusting differences and avoiding practical embarrassments growing out of them, as must be done in like cases between the different coördinate branches of the legislative department."

"But notwithstanding this abstract view of the coördinate and independent right of the three departments to expound the Constitution, the judicial department most familiarizes to the public attention as the expositor, by the order of its functions in relation to the other departments, and attracts most the public confidence by the composition of the tribunal."

"In the judicial department, in which constitutionality as well as legality generally find their ultimate discussion and operative decision; and the public deference to and confidence in the judgment of that body are peculiarly inspired by the qualities implied in its members and by the gravity and deliberation of their proceedings, and by the advantage their plurality gives them over the unity of the executive department, and their firmness over the multitudinous composition of the legislative department."

"Without losing sight, therefore, of the coördinate relations of the three departments to each other, it may always be expected that the judicial bench, when happily filled, will, for the reasons suggested, most engage the respect and reliance of the public as the surest expositor of the Constitution, as well in questions within its cognizance concerning the boundaries between the several departments of the Government as in those between the Union and its members.

These great authorities here state most important fundamental principles: that the Government of the United States is not of original and plenary, but wholly of delegated powers; that the Constitution is the source of all its powers, and it has none but what are expressly or by necessary implication conferred upon it by the language of that instrument; that all the other powers of political sovereignty and government are reserved to the States respectively and the people; that the powers organized by the Constitution are divided and apportioned by it among three separate and coördinate departments; and the legislative is vested in Congress, the executive in the President, and the judicial in the courts; that in all cases before the Supreme Court in which the constitutionality of any law of Congress or of a State, or any act of the President or other officer of the Government, arises, that court has the power to decide it, and its decision is binding upon the other departments of Government and all persons; and on all other questions of constitutionality each department to which it might come for action must decide for itself, and the decision of the one last having the charge of the matter must prevail. It results, necessarily, that where Congress has passed acts the constitutionality of which cannot or have not been brought before the Supreme Court for its judgment, which require the intervention of the President, either as the chief executive officer of the Government or as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to give them effect, he is the final judge of their constitutionality, and may upon his proper responsibility refuse to execute them.

The powers of government naturally assume a threefold form—legislative, executive, and judicial. A limited and free government can be organized only on the principle of separating those powers and assigning each class to a different and coördinate magistracy. Their union, however effected, and whether in one or a body of men, has been given by English as well as American statesmen to be the definition of a despotism. This partition has been made and guarded with jealous care by our Constitution. The legislative power is vested wholly in Congress; the executive in the President, except the Senate shares with him the power to make treaties and to appoint to office; and the entire judicial power is vested in the courts, with the special designation of the Senate to try all cases of impeachment. Neither department has any authority to review, control, or interfere with another in the performance of its functions, but the independent action of each was designed to check the abuse of power by the others.

Having stated these general principles, I again ask whence the power of Congress to pass this bill and the other reconstruction measures, as they are termed? The Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] and the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. Williams,] with a very confident manner and language, claim this authority under the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, in these words:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature or of the Executive—when the Legislature cannot be convened—against domestic violence."

That provision of itself certainly does not give the power, nor does it with the clause conferring the power of incidental legislation superadded. Before attempting to ascertain the meaning and effect of this fourth section I will premise that the Constitution vests certain specified powers in Congress, others in the President, and others in the courts, eo nomine; and some it confers on the United States by that designation. Among the powers thus vested in Congress is—

"To provide for calling forth the militia to exeoute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

This is a congressional power exclusively. But the fourth article presents instances of other special congressional powers, and also of powers conferred generally on the United States. It provides:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

And—

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States."

But the guarantee to every State in the Union of a republican form of government against invasion and domestic violence is intrusted to the "United States." The powers vested in Congress, or other department or officer by particular designation, cannot be exercised by any other department or officer; but those conferred generally on the United States are to be executed by Congress, by the President, and by the courts, as they can severally properly take hold of the subject.

The incidental power of legislation vested in Congress is not only to aid in the execution of its own enumerated powers, but "all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or any department or officer thereof." The act of 1795, to provide "for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," is legislation of this incidental character. The Supreme Court, in the case of Luther vs. Borden, decided that by the Constitution and that law the President alone had the discretionary power to intervene with the Army of the United States to suppress the domestic violence in the State of Rhode Island, produced by the attempt to supersede the Charter government with the Dorr government. But it cannot be reasonably doubted, that if the act of 1795 had not been enacted, on the application of the proper authority of Rhode Island, the President would have possessed the power, and it would have been his duty, to have made the same interposition. The Constitution requires him, before entering upon the execution of his office, to take an oath that—"He will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of his ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

And he is also commanded to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." The Constitution further appoints him—

"Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States."

If the execution of the laws of the United States were resisted by an armed force, or a State were invaded or disturbed by domestic violence, it is clear that the President, under these various provisions of the Constitution, irrespective of the law of 1795, would have the power, and he would be bound to interpose in each case with the military forces of the United States. That act is in aid of his power, and gives him facilities for a more prompt and efficient intervention.

GUARANTEE OF REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

But it is the first clause of the fourth section of the fourth article, that is generally relied upon by the friends of reconstruction as conferring upon Congress the power to pass those measures: "The United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government;" and this is claimed to be exclusively a congressional power. Neither the language nor the subject warrants that position, although its execution might generally require an act of Congress to give it full effect. But if a State were to abolish its republican form of government, and in its stead were to set up a monarchical or aristocratic government, the United States courts would have the power by its writs to restrain the persons charged with the powers of the new government from executing them, and if their execution were attempted by an armed force the President could meet that force with the military power of the United States, before Congress had proceeded to declare null and void the new State government.

But if the power in question were wholly and exclusively a congressional power, it gives no authority for the passage of the reconstruction measures. The power to guaranty to the States a republican form of government, though most important and delicate, is a narrow power. It imparts no authority on the part of Congress to make a government for a State; the first and essential idea of a republican government being that it must be made by the people or agents chosen by themselves, whom it is intended to govern. They must give it a republican form, and if they should not, Congress, the legislative power of the Government of the United States, under this provision of the Constitution, could expunge its anti-republican features or refer it back to them with that direction, and thus secure, guarantee to the State a republican form of government. Every State has a sovereign and unlimited right to make its own government, subject to the single restriction that it must be republican in form; and the whole power of the United States over the subject is to obliterate, or to require the State to obliterate, its features that are not republican.

But this power has no application whatever to the present or past condition of the ten southern States. Four of them were of the original thirteen, and all of them were States of the Union, and had governments republican in form when they attempted to secede; and the governments of those four States were then more popular in their character than those they had when the Constitution of the United States was formed and adopted, and the other six had governments equally popular and republican in form. The Federal Constitution was not made by the people of the United States, but by the States and their people severally, and each existing as an independent political sovereignty. They all had governments formed by each State for itself. Rhode Island and New Hampshire adhered to their charter governments granted by the British king, but modified them after the Declaration of Independence, and this modification was a remaking of them by their people. The government of New Hampshire then, and for fifty years afterward, excluded all Roman Catholics from office, and for the same period that of Rhode Island continued a property qualification to invest the right to vote. Many of the other States had property qualifications, both to vote and to hold office; and in some the Governor, one branch of the Legislature, and the judges were not elected immediately by the people, but were chosen by agents elected for that purpose, not by all the people, but by that portion of them in whom the right of suffrage was vested. There was not one of these governments that was purely popular in its character; there was much diversity among them in their minor principles and features; yet they had been formed and were administered by agents chosen directly or indirectly by that portion of their people who held their primary political power, the right of suffrage; and those agents, except the judges, whose tenure was generally during good behavior, held their offices for limited terms. None of those State governments were monarchical or aristocratic, but they were all of what this provision of the Constitution denominates "a republican form." Each of those governments was the very thing, the embodiment of what those who made the Constitution intended by "a republican form of government." The whole purpose of this provision of the Constitution was to prohibit the States then forming the Union, and new ones that might be admitted into it, from making monarchical or aristocratic governments, and requiring them to adhere substantially to the form of the State governments then in existence.

No position could be more unsound than that this provision of the Constitution was intended to condemn and proscribe, and require to be pulled down the existing State governments, and others to be substituted in their stead. There was not a single State that would have made, or submitted to the incorporation of such a principle in the Constitution; and the fact that every State, without question from any quarter, retained the government it then had for twenty, forty, or fifty years by its own sovereign will, and made others from time to time substantially of the same form, proves that the idea that those governments were not republican in form never entered into the imagination of the men of that day. Those State governments were closely scrutinized, and well understood by the statesmen who framed the Constitution of the United States. They fully comprehended that the right of suffrage in all of them but three, was restricted to half or less than half of the adult white population, and their partition and particular investment of all the powers of Government, and the modes by which their officers were elected and appointed. Instead of being repudiated, these State governments were the republican models upon which the Government of the United States was fashioned; and the Federalist and other publications of the day, that so powerfully commended it to the people of the States for their adoption, made the existing State governments the standards by which to prove that the proposed Government of the United States was republican in form.

These positions are fully sustained by the highest authorities. The thirty-ninth number of the Federalist says:

"If we resort for a criticism to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or at least may bestow that name on a government which derives all its powers directly or indirectly from the great body of the people and is administered by persons holding their office during pleasure or for a limited period or during good behavior. It is essential to such a government that it be derived from the great body of the society, not from an inconsiderable proportion or a favored few of it; otherwise a handful of tyrannical nobles, exercising their oppressions by a delegation of their powers, might aspire to the rank of republicans, and claim for their government the honorable title of republic. It is sufficient for such a government that the persons administering it be appointed, either directly or indirectly, by the people; and that they hold their appointments by either of the tenures just specified; otherwise every government in the United States, as well as every other popular government that has been or can be well organized or well executed, would be degraded from the republican character. According to the constitution of every State in the Union some or other officers of the Government are appointed indirectly only by the people. According to most of them the Chief Magistrate is himself so appointed. And, according to one, this mode of appointment is extended to one of the coordinate branches of the Legislature. According to all the constitutions, also, the tenure of the highest office is extended to a definite period; and, in many instances, both within the executive and legislative departments, to a period of years. According to the provisions of most of the constitutions, again, as well as according to the most respectable and received opinions on the subject, the members of the judiciary department are to retain their offices by the firm tenure of good behavior."

"On comparing the Constitution planned by the Convention, with the standard here fixed, we perceive at once that it is in the most rigid sense conformable to it."

In reference to this constitutional guarantee by the United States of a republican form of Government to every State, Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says:

"The Federalist has spoken with so much force and propriety on this subject that supersedes all further reasoning. In a confederacy, says that work, founded on republican principles and composed of republican members, the superintending Government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations. The more intimate the nature of such a union may be, the greater interest have the members in the political institutions of each other; and the greater right to insist that the forms of government under which the compact was entered into should be substantially maintained."

"It may possibly be asked what need there could be of such a provision, and whether it may not become a pretext for alterations in the State governments without the concurrence of the States themselves? These questions admit of ready answers. If the interposition of the General Government should not be needed, the provision for such an event will be a harmless superfluity only in the constitution. But who can say what experiments may be produced by the caprices of particular States, by the ambition of enterprising leaders, or by the intrigues and influence of foreign Powers. To the second question it may be answered, that if the General Government should interpose by virtue of this constitutional authority, it will be of course bound to pursue the authority. But the authority extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government, which supposes a preexisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long therefore as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms they have the right to do so, and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is, that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican constitutions; a restriction which it is presumed will hardly be considered as a grievance."

But, because the Declaration of Independence sets forth that all men are free and equal, some wild theorists claim that it invests Congress with the power to pass its reconstruction measures. Congress derives its powers, not from the Declaration of Independence, but from the Constitution alone. The Declaration of Independence is simply a statement of facts and principles to justify the separation of the Colonies from the mother country. It was not the purpose or effect of it to change the individual condition of any person, of whatever race or color, in the Colonies. It made none free who were slaves; it gave not a single right, civil or political, to a human being; it left the status of all as it was before; it had no force whatever of law or constitution; and the States made independent received no other result from it.

What idea the men who made the Constitution intended to express by the phrase "republican form of government" is illustrated by the substantial form of the State governments subsisting at the time; and he who in sincerity contends that they, and the other similar governments since organized by the States, are not such republican governments as are contemplated by the Constitution, is not competent to reason or to comprehend an argument on that subject.

Having ascertained what is a republican form of government exactly in the sense of the Constitution, I assert that each one of the ten southern States had, when this reconstruction policy was inaugurated, valid governments, republican in form; and that Congress had not only no power to abolish them, but none to interfere with them, under the pretext that they were not republican in form—that they were wholly outside and beyond the power of Congress. I believe this position can be established beyond reasonable doubt. No one will deny that those States were in the Union up to the time of passing their ordinances of secession. Previously they had regularly elected their Senators and Representatives to Congress, who were always admitted to their seats; and the Supreme Court, in the case of Luther vs. Borden, held that such admission was a recognition by the proper constitutional authority of the State and the republican form of its government, under which those members of Congress had been chosen.

There is no warrant for secession in the Constitution; it was revolution attempted to be disguised under another name, and success alone could have given it any validity. Its ordinances were absolutely void. A State in the Union is there as long as our system of government endures. There is no power anywhere to throw out or to expunge them. The organized States are parts of the framework of the machinery of our mixed system of national and State governments, and can no more be dispensed with than the Presidency or Congress or the Supreme Court. Their action is not so frequent in the operations of the General Government, but is not less necessary. The Federalist declares most truly that "the State governments may be regarded as constituents and essential parts of the Federal Government;" and to prove the position, adds:

"Without the intervention of the State Legislatures the President of the United States cannot be elected at all."

The Constitution makes provision for the "junction of two or more States, or parts of States, by the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of Congress;" but none for the annihilation or suspension of States, or for their trial or punishment by any mode whatever. The punitive power of the United States is directed exclusively against individuals, natural persons, not at all against States. The persons administering the State governments may commit treason and other crimes against the United States, for which they may be tried and punished by their laws and courts; but not so with the States or their governments, or their departments, or governmental machinery. Members of the Senate, or all the Senators and Representatives, the President, and the members of the Supreme Court, may be guilty of treason and other crimes, and be individually and personally punished therefor; but not Congress, or the Senate, or the House, or the Presidency or the court; but they, like the States, exist in perpetuity, as parts of the machinery and organism of our system of government, to be occupied and held and administered by true men, as traitors and criminals are expelled from them. These are essential and inherent principles which continue our Government, and without which it would fall into chaos and dissolution.

THE PUNISHMENT OF FORFEITURE OF STATES.

I then state these propositions to be true: that the union of the States, and the Government of the United States, and the States and their governments are constituent parts of the machinery of our complex system of government, and equally necessary to its continuance; that to constitute a State, a country with a boundary, a people, and a government, either in actual operation or in suspension are all indispensable requisites; that a State cannot secede, or commit suicide or self-destruction, or be expunged, suspended, or excised from her position and rights and powers in the Union by the Government of the United States; that a State can be displaced from the Union only by the successful revolt of her people, or by the conquest and permanent occupation of it by a foreign Power; but the people of a State or of several States may rise in insurrection or rebellion against the United States. Such a trouble was anticipated, and provision made for it by the Convention which framed the Constitution. It may be suppressed by armed force. Congress has not only an indefinite power "to raise and support armies," and "to provide and maintain a Navy," but also to provide for calling forth the militia of all the States to suppress it; and the President, as Commander-in-Chief, and in the performance of his duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed, must move with this military force upon the insurgents to what end? To suppress the insurrection. That is the power, and the whole power, which the Constitution gives to Congress and the President—to the United States—in the premises. When the insurrection is crushed out and the insurgents return or are reduced to submission and obedience to the laws, the power of arms by our Government is exhausted; and the laws and the courts only can then deal with the insurgents for their punishment.

CONSEQUENCES AND POST LIMINUM.

This is not a war, for that imports conquest and acquisition to the victors and loss to the vanquished, according to the law of nations regulating war. The idea of the United States conquering a portion of themselves and abolishing the State governments and suspending the Government of the United States to the extent of the conquest, is not only without any authority in our system, but utterly destructive of it. The United States cannot declare or make war against a State. To enforce the execution of the laws and to suppress insurrections and rebellions and domestic violence in the States, is not the exercise of the war power organized by the Constitution and vested by it in the Government of the United States, but of the great national police power. The one is an internal and conserving power, the other an external and destructive power acting on foreign nations. This national police power is of the same nature with the enforcement of the governments of cities and the States, of their police power in the suppression of insurrections against them. In none of those cases can arms be resorted to by the government until they are first used by the insurgents, and then only to quell the insurrection and to reduce the insurgents to obedience to the laws. This is a conflict of arms, and while it is raging and in operation, the parties are held to the usages and practices of war by civilized and Christian nations. If the insurgents are successful it is revolution, and results in the establishment of another national power; if they are suppressed and submit, that ends the right by the Government for the farther use of arms, and the treatment of those engaged in the insurrection then passes from the military to the civil authorities, and no other consequences can rightfully ensue than their punishment according to law. Immediately upon the suppression of the rebellion, by the operation and effect of the principles of the Constitution and the law of nations, both of which as to this matter are in perfect accord, things, except so far as positively destroyed by the conflict, as regards governments, institutions, persons, property and rights, public and private, are restored to the same condition in which they were before the insurrection.

This position is sustained by all approved writers on the law of nations, but I will read from one only. Vattel, pages 392, 394, 397, says:

"The right of post liminium is that in virtue of which persons and things taken by the enemy are restored to their former state on coming again into the power of the nation to which they belonged."

"The sovereign is bound to protect the persons and property of his subjects, and to defend them against the enemy. When, therefore, a subject or any part of his property has fallen into the enemy's possession, should any fortunate event bring them again into their sovereign's power, it is undoubtedly his duty to restore them to their former condition, to reestablish the persons in all their rights and obligations, to give back the effects to the owners; in a word, to replace everything on the same footing on which it stood previous to the enemy's capture."

Again:

"Prisoners of war who have given their parole, territories and towns which have submitted to the enemy and have sworn or promised allegiance to him, cannot of themselves return to their former condition by the right of post liminium; for faith is to be kept even with enemies."

"But if the sovereign retakes those towns, countries, or prisoners who had surrendered to the enemy, he recovers all his former rights over them, and is bound to reestablish them in their pristine condition."

"Provinces, towns, and lands which the enemy restores by a treaty of peace, are certainly entitled to the right of post liminium; for the sovereign, in whatever manner he recovers them, is bound to restore them to their former condition as soon as he regains possession of them."

This principle of post liminium has been recognized by our own courts. During the war of 1812, the British forces conquered and held possession of a part of the district of Maine, then attached to Massachusetts, within which was the port of Castine. This occupation expelled the authorities and laws of the United States and the State of Massachusetts, and the commander of the British forces established other laws, comprehending a system of import duties. An American ship entered the port and paid duties to the English custom-house officers, under their regulations. After peace was made, and the army and authority of England had been withdrawn from Maine, the United States district attorney had this ship and her cargo libeled for violation of the laws of the United States in not having paid duties in conformity to them. The case was tried in the United States circuit court by Justice Story, and in his opinion he says:

"The second objection is, that the court directed the jury that Castine was, under the circumstances, a foreign port. By 'foreign port,' as the terms are here used, may be understood a port within the dominions of a foreign sovereign, and without the dominions of the United States. The port of Castine is the port of entry for the district of Penobscot, and is within the acknowledged territory of the United States. But, at the time referred to in the bill of exceptions, it had been captured, and was in the open and exclusive possession of the enemy. By the conquest and occupation of Castine that territory passed under the allegiance and sovereignty of the enemy. The sovereignty of the United States over the territory was, of course, suspended, 'and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced, or be obligatory upon the inhabitants, who remained and submitted to the conquerors. Castine, therefore, could not, strictly speaking, be deemed a port of the United States; for its sovereignty no longer extended over the place. Nor, on the other hand, could it, strictly speaking, be deemed a port within the dominions of Great Britain, for it had not permanently passed under her sovereignty. The right which existed was the mere right of superior force, the allegiance was temporary, and the possession not that firm possession which gives the conqueror plenum dominium et utile, the complete and perfect ownership of property. It could only be by a renunciation in a treaty of peace, or by possession so long and permanent as should afford conclusive proof that the territory was altogether abandoned by its sovereign, or had been irretrievably subdued, that it could be considered as incorporated into the dominions of the British sovereign. Until such incorporation, by a recapture or repossession, the territory would be entitled to the full benefit of the law of post limine."

The United States, under and according to the Constitution, holds all over their territory a common, uniform, and equal limited sovereignty which has no sliding scale, but is the same in war and peace. They have many powers, for the execution of which there is no occasion but in times of war; but that state of things make no addition to their powers, nor does a state of peace subtract anything from them, except in relation to the single point of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. During the late rebellion, this limited sovereignty of the United States was expelled from the eleven States whose people entered into it; but there was no annihilation, but only a suspension of that sovereignty. The moment the authority of the United States regained possession of the whole or any part of those States the Constitution, laws, and jurisdiction of the United States, and the constitutions and laws of the States respectively were restored de jure without the aid of any act of Congress or the President, but by the effect and operation of the Constitution and general law. When there is an insurrection in a city or State against the Government thereof, on its suppression the previous government and order of things are always reinstated by the operation of the general principle of post limine and without any legislation. The domestic violence in Rhode Island was an insurrection by Dorr and his followers against the charter government, and it was so formidable that the State authorities invoked military aid from the Government of the United States. The President ordered the march of troops to suppress it, and when the insurgents learned this fact they abandoned their enterprise and dispersed.

But for this interposition the rebels would, in all probability, have driven out the lawful government and have taken possession of the State; and if this had been effected before the United States authorities had interfered, and afterward their armies had been marched into the State, and had suppressed the insurrection, immediately thereupon, without any legislation, State or national, but by the effect of the general principle of post limine the charter government and all its officers and authority would have been reinstated. When the British power abandoned Maine the same principle restored the government of Massachusetts and of the United States, without any legislation by either, over the whole country in which the sovereignty of both had been suspended by the occupation of another Power.

On the suppression of the rebellion in the southern States, this principle should, and probably would, have been applied, and have tranquilized the whole country but for their institution of slavery, which also would have been restored. But that is no difficulty now to the application of this healing remedy, because all the late slave States except three, by their own amended constitutions and laws, abolished slavery within their limits; and the thirteenth amendment of the United States Constitution abolished it throughout their entire jurisdiction. No power can ever restore slavery in the United States or any of them.

OUR GOVERNMENT SUI GENERIS.

If it be a general principle applicable to all Governments, though they have no fixed constitutions, that when a part of their country has been conquered and occupied by a foreign enemy, upon its reconquest all things are restored as though there had been no conquest of it: with what added force does this principle apply to our Government and country, when there has been an insurrection or rebellion of sectional and temporary success. The general purpose and spirit of our system finds an embodiment in that principle; indeed, could not be preserved without it. On the suppression of the rebellion everything that had been done to give it form, effect, and permanence passed away; the previous order of things stood at once de jure restored. During the whole period every person within the United States was under their jurisdiction and laws, and in all respects amenable to them.

The body of our Constitution is remarkably condensed and its language concise but clear; and if examined in an honest spirit there could not be essential difference in its construction. But there are three principal sources of its various and erroneous interpretation: first, persons have particular theories, and read and wrest its language to sustain their theories; second, it is often construed with a purpose to maintain the measures of party and faction; third, it is frequently attempted to explain and illustrate its provisions and powers by comparison with other Governments. It is the written law of a Government differing from all others; and the true light in which it should be studied is its own language, the defects of the system it was intended to remedy, the debates of the conventions which framed and adopted it, and the contemporaneous expositions of it. I will read from Mr. Madison in relation to this matter. On page 61, volume four, of his writings, he says:

"It has been too much the case in expounding the Constitution of the United States that its meaning has been sought in the peculiar and unprecedented modifications of power but by viewing it, some through the medium of a single government, others through that of a mere league of governments. It is neither the one nor the other, but essentially different from both. It must consequently be its own interpreter. No other Government can furnish a key to its true character. Other Governments present an individual and indivisible sovereignty. The Constitution of the United States divides the sovereignty; the portions surrendered by the States composing the Federal sovereignty over specified subjects, the portions retained forming the sovereignty of each over the residuary subjects within its sphere. If sovereignty cannot be thus divided the political system of the United States is a chimera, mocking the vain pretensions of human wisdom. If it can be so divided it ought to have a fair opportunity of fulfilling the wishes and expectations which cling to the experiment."

On page 74 Mr. Madison writes:

"I must say that the real measure of the powers meant to be vested in Congress by the Convention, as I understand and believe, is to be sought in the specifications; to be expounded, indeed, not with a strictness applied to an ordinary statute by a court of law, nor, on the other hand, with a latitude that under the name of means for carrying into execution a limited Government would transform it into a Government without limits."

Mr. Madison, in these passages, gives the true key to the meaning of the Constitution. It was made by preëxisting sovereignties surrendering a portion of their sovereignty, to form a Government having jurisdiction over common objects and retaining the entire mass of sovereignty that they did not give up to this new and national Government. This surrender of powers is wholly expressed in the Constitution which creates the Government, and none can be claimed or exercised by it but such as are conferred by the Constitution, that the powers with which it invests Congress are written and specified in the Constitution, and are all substantive and primary, except a grant of a general power of incidental legislation to pass laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the enumerated powers of Congress and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States. All agree that this provision gives only the power of incidental and auxiliary legislation, and this is the plain meaning of its language. The reconstruction measures are framed upon the idea that this is a power limited only by the discretion and will of Congress; and that the courts even cannot question the constitutionality of any such legislation. Never was there a more unsound, licentious, and dangerous position assumed. The Constitution expresses in all its provisions, principles, and language that the Government created by it is one of limited powers; but this interpretation of that clause authorizing incidental legislation would make the powers of Congress illimitable. It of itself would confer on that department vastly more power than is given by all the other provisions of the Constitution to the whole Government. It would break down every check, restriction, and limitation, demolish the other departments, and erect Congress into an absolute despotism. Until now the powers of Government, expressed and enumerated in the Constitution, have been regarded by every American statesman as the body and substance of the Government; and the power of incidental legislation as merely auxiliary to them, not capable of existence except in connection with them, the two occupying the relation of substance and shadow. But this monstrous heresy would make the incidental power swallow up not only the specified, primary, and substantive powers, to minister to which is its only office, but the entire Government in a congressional despotism. Such an idea could have originated only in the madness of faction.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of McCullough vs. Maryland, has given a very liberal construction of this power of incidental legislation by Congress; but he rules explicitly that while Congress acts within the pale of its constitutional power, it has the sole discretion to select the means; yet if the means selected are not necessary and appropriate, or if they violate the letter or spirit of the Constitution, or, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass acts for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the Government, it would be the duty of the court to pronounce them not to be the law of the land.

CASE OF LUTHER VS. BORDEN.

But the supporters of congressional reconstruction all assume most confidently, that the case of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard fully and clearly recognizes the power of Congress to pass them. I take issue with them, and assert that it denies to Congress any and all such power. Preliminary to the investigation of this question, I will read such parts of that opinion as bear upon it:

"Certainly the question which the plaintiff proposed to raise by the testimony he offered has not heretofore been recognized as a political one in any of the State courts. In forming the constitutions of the different States after the Declaration of Independence, and in the various changes and alterations which have been made, the political department has always determined whether the proposed constitution or amendment was ratified or not by the people of the State, and the judicial power has followed its decision. In Rhode Island the question has been directly decided. Prosecutions were commenced against some of the persons who had been active in forcible opposition to the old government, and in more than one of the cases evidence was offered on the part of the defense similar to the testimony offered in the circuit court and for the same purpose; that is, for the purpose of showing that the proposed constitution had been adopted by the people of Rhode Island, and had, therefore, become the established government, and consequently that the parties accused were doing nothing more than their duty in endeavoring to support it."

Again:

"But the courts [of Rhode Island] uniformly held that the inquiry proposed to be made belongs to the political power and not to the judicial; that it rested with the political power to decide whether the charter government had been displaced or not, and when that decision was made the judicial department would be bound to take notice of it as the paramount law of the State without the aid of process or the examination of witnesses; that according to the laws and institutions of Rhode Island no such change had been recognized by the political power; and that the charter government was the lawful and established government of the State during the period in contest, and that those who were in arms against it were insurgents and liable to punishment."

"This doctrine is clearly and forcibly stated in the opinion of the supreme court of the State against Thomas W. Dorr, who was the Governor elected under the opposing constitution, and who headed the armed force which endeavored to maintain its authority."

"The point then ruled has been clearly decided by the courts of Rhode Island. The question relates altogether to the constitution and laws of that State, and the well-settled rule in this court is, that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the State courts in questions which concern merely the constitutions and laws of the States."

"Moreover, the Constitution of the United States, so far as it has provided for an emergency of this kind, and authorized the General Government to interfere in the domestic concerns of a State, has treated the subject as political in its nature, and placed the power in the hands of that department."

"The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on the application of the Legislature or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

"Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State; for as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State before it can determine whether it is republican or not."

"And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority; and the decision is binding on every other Department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue, and as no Senators or Representatives were elected under the authority of the Government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the courts."

"So, too, as relates to the clause in the above-mentioned article of the Constitution, providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress, too, to determine upon the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when the contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere. But Congress thought otherwise, and no doubt wisely; and by the act of February 28, 1795, provided that, 'in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful of the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection."

"By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature or of the Executive, and consequently he must determine what body of men constitute the Legislature and who is the Governor before he can act. The fact that both parties claim the right of the government cannot alter the case, for both cannot be entitled to it. If there is an armed conflict, like the one of which we are speaking, it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful government. And the President must of necessity decide which is the government and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it before he can perform the duty imposed upon him by the act of Congress."

"It is true that in this case the militia were not called out by the President. But upon the application of the Governor under the charter government, the President recognized him as the executive power of the State, and took measures to call out the militia to support his authority if it should be found necessary for the General Government to interfere; and it is admitted in the argument, that it was the knowledge of this decision that put an end to the armed opposition to the charter government, and prevented any further efforts to establish by force the proposed constitution. The interference of the President, therefore, by announcing his determination, was as effectual as if the militia had been assembled under his orders. And it should be equally as authoritative. For, certainly no court of the United States, with a knowledge of this decision, would have been justified in recognizing the opposing party as the lawful government; or in treating as wrong doers or insurgents the officers of the government which the President had recognized, and was prepared to support by armed force. In the case of foreign nations the Government acknowledged by the President is always recognized in the courts of justice. And this principle has been applied by the act of Congress to the sovereign States of the Union."

"It is said that this power in the President is dangerous to liberty, and may be abused. All power may be abused if placed in unworthy hands. But it would be difficult, we think, to point out any other hands in which this power would be more safe and at the same time equally effectual. When citizens of the same State are in arms against each other, and the constituted authorities unable to execute the laws, the interposition of the United States must be prompt, or it is of little value. The ordinary course of proceedings in courts of justice would be utterly unfit for the crisis. And the elevated office of the President, chosen as he is by the people of the United States, and the high responsibility he would not fail to feel when acting in a case of so much moment, appear to furnish as strong safeguards against a willful abuse of power as human prudence and foresight could well provide. At all events, it is conferred upon him by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and must therefore be respected and enforced in its judicial tribunals."

"A question very similar to this arose in the case of Martin vs. Mott, (12 Wharton, 20.) The first clause of the first section of the act of February 28, 1795, of which we have been speaking, authorizes the President to call out the militia to repel invasion. It is the second clause in the same section which authorizes the call to suppress an insurrection against a State Government. The power given to the President in each case is the same, with this difference only, that it cannot be exercised by him in the latter case, except upon the application of the Legislature or executive of the State. The case above-mentioned arose out of a call made by the President, by virtue of the power conferred by the first clause; and the court said that whenever a statute gives a discretionary power to be exercised by him upon his own opinion of certain facts, it is a sound rule of construction, that the statute constitutes him the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of those facts. The grounds upon which that opinion is maintained, are set forth in the report, and we think are conclusive. The same principle applies in the case now before the court."

These positions are clearly ruled by this opinion. What is the government of a State, and who are the persons administering it, is a political question, and is to be decided by the political power of the government of the State and the United States. When the political power of the State has decided that question, the decision is binding upon its courts; and after it has been ruled by those courts the Supreme Court of the United States will adopt and follow their decision."

That under the Constitution and law of 1795, the President alone has the absolute and unappealable power to decide that question for the United States, and his decision is binding on all the departments of the Government; and that in the contest between the charter and Dorr governments of Rhode Island the President, without any intervention by Congress, did decide that question in favor of the charter government—his decision is approved by the courts. That when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority."

The principles recognized by the Supreme Court in this case utterly explode the power of Congress to pass the reconstruction measures. The court does not give any precise definition of "political questions" or "the political power" of the Government; but it treats both Congress and the President as that political power. Besides the legislative powers, all that are vested specially in Congress are to propose amendments to the Constitution and to admit new States into the Union; while in addition to the internal executive powers, the President holds the national intercourse with foreign Governments, recognizes their political existence, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, makes treaties and nominates and appoints ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, fixes the position of our disputed boundaries, and decides for our Government what are the possessions of foreign Powers. It is not material to the measure before the Senate to decide what is the political power of our Government, and where it is vested; but there is as much reason to contend that it is in the President as in Congress; it is probably correct to say it belongs partly to both."

After the surrender of Lee and Johnston and the submission of all the insurgents, and when there was no longer an arm raised by them against the United States, the people who had been in the rebellion, were properly exhorted by the President to rehabilitate their State governments and to resume their proper relations with the Government of the United States. They severally called conventions, which took up the constitutions and governments that they had before the insurrection, repealed their ordinances of secession, and renounced its principle, abolished slavery within their limits, repudiated their debts created by their rebellion, and adopted the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution, which abolished slavery throughout the United States."

RECOGNITION OF SOUTHERN STATES BY THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

During the whole war the United States Government, by all its departments, not only recognized the States which had attempted to secede as being de jure States in the Union, but also steadily and truthfully maintained the position that their ordinances of secession were null and void; that the people who had risen in their support were insurgents, and the conflict on the part of the United States was for no other purpose than to hold those States in the Union, and to reduce their people to the laws and authority of the United States, declaring the war was then to terminate. After the rebellion had broken out, and before the surrender of Lee and Johnston, Congress passed laws to apportion representation and direct taxes among all the States, including those that had passed ordinances of secession; to lay off the States, comprehending the whole, into circuits for holding the United States courts by the judges of the Supreme Court; and another law reducing the number and increasing the extent of those circuits; and has passed other laws to remove suits pending in the State courts in those States into the United States courts; to establish widely over them post offices and post routes; to change the places of holding the United States courts in Tennessee and Virginia; admitting West Virginia as a State into the Union, and reciting in the act that the State of Virginia had given her consent to the erection of the new State within her jurisdiction. Congress also submitted the thirteenth and fourteenth propositions to amend the Constitution to all the States, including the rebel States, and in the latter submitted a special proposition to them."

Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, was a Senator from Tennessee at the beginning of the insurrection, and was admitted and welcomed to his seat for three successive sessions, as MAYNARD and CLEMENTS were admitted as Representatives at the same time; and Senator Johnson was appointed military governor of Tennessee by President Lincoln, and afterward nominated and elected Vice President by the Republican party."

At the session of Congress beginning in December, 1861, CARLILE and WILLEY appeared at the bar of the Senate as Senators from the State of Virginia, and elected after her ordinance of secession had been passed. Their admission was resisted. The question was debated, and their right sustained by an almost unanimous vote, including every Republican Senator. CARLILE attended each session of the Senate until the expiration of his term, which was after the surrender of Lee and Johnston. The organization of West Virginia into a new State removed WILLEY as a Senator from Virginia in 1862, when Bowden was elected as his successor, admitted, and continued to act as her Senator until his death. The House of Representatives admitted Representatives from the State of Virginia to the Thirty-Seventh Congress.

The judges of the Supreme Court allotted among themselves the several circuits comprehending the rebel States, as they were organized by acts of Congress both before and since the capitulation of Lee and Johnston. It has tried cases coming up to it from the insurgent States prior and subsequent to the suppression of the rebellion; and its judges have held courts and issued writs of habeas corpus and other process operating within those States from the time of the proclamation of the President declaring the rebellion to be suppressed.

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS.

From that time the President has extended and put into operation the post office and internal revenue systems, with their extensive machinery, all over those States, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, has appointed in them judges, marshals, assessors, collectors, custom house and other officers, as in the other States, who have been regularly paid their salaries from the Treasury of the United States.

It is thus shown that the Government of the United States, by all its departments, in multi-form and important official acts extending through six years and up to the time of the inauguration of the reconstruction policy in March last, had recognized that the southern States were States in the Union and had governments of a republican form.

Mr. President, I believe I have demonstrated these positions to be true:

1. That the States and ~~the~~ governments are an essential part of the machinery of the Government of the United States, and cannot be expunged or suspended by it.
2. That it is as much the duty of the Government of the United States to defend, preserve, and protect the States and their governments as its own particular organization.
3. That in our system, forfeiture and all other punishment are personal visitations, and could not be inflicted upon the States without disorder and revolution.
4. That Congress has power to admit new States into the Union, and when a State is admitted that power is exhausted, and the State is one of the States of the Union until she is displaced by successful revolution.
5. That the guarantee by the United States to every State of a republican form of government, confers upon Congress no power to make the government, but only to require its people to make a republican government; and a government substantially similar to those of the States when the Constitution was adopted comes up to this constitutional standard.
6. That all the States, including those involved in the rebellion, up to the time of their respective ordinances of secession, had governments republican in form.
7. That secession is without any authority in the Constitution, and the attempt of the southern States and their people to secede was to make a revolution under another name; and having failed is wholly null and without effect.
8. That the whole power of the Government in relation to the rebellion was simply to suppress it; and that this power was to be executed by Congress and the President, and was exhausted by the suppression of the rebellion, and thereupon all other power over the rebels rested with the courts and the laws.
9. That upon the suppression of the rebellion, by the force and effect of the Constitution and the universal principle of post liminy, the jurisdiction of the United States in the States from which it had been excluded, and the governments, laws, and institutions of the States as to persons and things in them, were, without any legislation, State or Federal, restored to the same condition in which they were before the rebellion.

10. That after the suppression the people of the southern States set up their preëxisting governments, submitted fully and according to the Constitution to the authority of the United States, called conventions, declared null and void their ordinances of secession, repudiated their rebel debts, and adopted the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery throughout the United States.

11. That those modified governments of the southern States were republican in form, and more popular than their previous governments, and the States; that those governments were recognized by the United States acting by Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court severally in many official acts, and that neither of those departments can now take ground that they are not States in the Union.

AGGRESSIVE AND USURPING TENDENCY OF CONGRESS.

Why, then, Mr. President, has the deranged condition of our country, of its Government, and all its affairs not only continued, but progressively augmented as to have become almost unendurable? What is the disturbing and malign power that still continues to defeat general peace, order, prosperity, liberty, and security upon the principles of the Constitution? It is faction acting by a spurious Senate and House of Representatives, both mutilated by itself, and perverting and transcending its own powers and seizing upon others not intrusted to the Government, and breaking down the coordinate departments to perpetuate its own lawless and licentious rule. Let us hear how the prophetic and warning voice of Jefferson and Madison spoke to their countrymen of this overruling, aggressive, and absorbing power.

Mr. Jefferson, in his Notes on Virginia, says:

"All powers of government, legislative, executive, and judiciary, result to the legislative body. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic Government.

"It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would be as oppressive as one.

"Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the republic of Venice. As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism was not the government we fought for, but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the powers of Government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others.

"For this reason the Convention which passed the ordinance of government laid its foundation on this basis: that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be separate and distinct, so that no person should exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time; but no barrier was provided between those several powers. The judiciary and executive members were left dependent on the legislative for their subsistence in office, and some of them for their continuance in it. If, therefore, the legislative assume executive and judiciary powers no opposition is likely to be made, nor, if made, can be effectual; because in that case they may put their proceedings into the form of an act of assembly, which will render them obligatory on the other branches. They have accordingly in many instances decided rights which should have been left to judiciary controversy, and the direction of the Executive during the whole time of their session is becoming habitual and familiar."

In the forty-seventh number of the Federalist, Mr. Madison, says:

"The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one or few or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny."

And in the forty-eighth number he says:

"It is agreed on all sides, that the powers properly belonging to one of the departments ought not to be directly and completely administered by either of the other departments. It is equally evident, that neither of them ought to possess, directly or indirectly, an overruling influence over the others in the administration of their respective powers. It will not be denied that power is of an encroaching nature, and that it ought to be effectually restrained from passing the limits assigned to it.

"Will it be sufficient to mark, with precision the boundaries of these departments, in the constitution of the government, and to trust to these parchment-barriers against the encroaching spirit of power?"

"But experience assures us that the efficacy of the provision has been greatly overrated, and that some more adequate defense is indispensably necessary for the more feeble against the more powerful members of the Government. The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex.

"But in a representative Republic, where the Executive Magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and duration of its power; and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly which is inspired by a suppressed influence over the people, with an intrepid confidence in its own strength, which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions by means which reason prescribes; it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions."

"The legislative department derives a superiority in our Government from other circumstances. Its constitutional powers at once more extensive and less susceptible of precise limits, it can, with greater facility, mask, under complicated and indirect measures, the encroachments which it makes on the coordinate departments. It is not unfrequently a question of real nicety in legislative bodies whether the operation of a particular measure will or will not extend beyond the legislative sphere. On the other side, the executive power being restrained within a narrower compass, and being more simple in its nature; and the judiciary being described by landmarks still less uncertain, projects of usurpation by either of these departments would immediately betray and defeat themselves. Nor is it all; as the legislative department alone has access to the pockets of the people, and has in some constitutions full discretion, and in all a prevailing influence over the pecuniary rewards of those who fill the other departments, dependence is thus created in the latter, which gives still greater facility to encroachments of the former."

These were the views of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, on the State constitutions and their administration before the formation of the Constitution of the United States. On its adoption, Mr. Madison was elected a Representative from Virginia, and while attending Congress in New York, wrote a letter to Edmund Randolph, dated June 21, 1789, in which there is this passage:

"In truth, the legislative power is of such a nature that it can scarcely be restrained, either by the Constitution or by itself; and if the Federal Government should lose its proper equilibrium with itself, I am persuaded that the effort will proceed from the legislative department. If the probability of encroachments on the part of the Executive or the Senate were to be compared, I should pronounce the danger to lie rather in the latter than the former. The mixture of the legislative, executive, and judicial authorities lodged in that body justifies such an inference; at the same time, I am fully of the opinion that the numerous and immediate representatives of the people composing the other House will decidedly predominate in the Government."

That the dominating faction in Congress should have proceeded to shut the door of the Senate against twenty Senators and of the House against fifty Representatives, and to expel other members from both Houses to secure a majority of two thirds of the remainder, and proceed to overrule the President's veto of their oppressive and unconstitutional acts; to propose amendments to the Constitution; and not only without any color of authority, but in defiance of the most vital principles of the Constitution, should pass acts to overthrow ten States and their governments, and dominate them with martial law and five military tools, whom they have abstracted from the control of the Commander-in-Chief, and by this instrumentality set up governments in those States made to their bidding, to be administered by their creatures to secure their ambitions and selfish ends and their continuance in power, constitutes bolder, more hardy, and startling political enterprise, taking into view every condition and circumstance, than was ever before set on foot by man; and the apathy of the country to it is of more discouraging and fearful import than even the audacious spirit of its projectors. The faction now so wildly dominating, or the one that may succeed it will have equal authority, reinforced by this precedent, to assault any of the other States and their governments and make other revolutions.

SENATE.

Reconstruction—Mr. Davis.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

We are, indeed, treading in the footsteps of Mexico and the countries of South America.

Mr. President, a serious cause of increasing weakness in our system of blended national and State governments, is the greatly increased and still increasing number of the States, which is proportionably augmenting the power and influence of the General Government and decreasing that of the States. A single State cannot make herself felt in a Union of forty as she could in thirteen States. But the great weakness of our Government is the impeachability of the President and of the judges of the Supreme Court by the two Houses of Congress. It establishes on the part of Congress a perpetual and irrepressible aggression upon the other departments, that must sooner or later subvert their independence and break up the great principle of separating the powers of Government into three classes, and vesting each in a different magistracy. That inherent weakness of our system even now threatens it with utter overthrow, and fully justifies the serious apprehension of it which Mr. Madison expressed in the Convention. The impeachment will be generally not for crime or moral turpitude, but for political differences. It will require all the jealous watchfulness of the people to restrain the encroaching spirit of Congress.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. President, while factions are the bane of popular Governments, parties formed and maintained truthfully and temperately upon opposing principles and policies, tend to their safety and preservation. All strong parties that are possessed of the powers of Government for a long time, necessarily degenerate into factions, and abandon principle to follow the lure of ambition, avarice, revenge, and other debauching passions. For the safety of the country the duration of parties should be short, and follow each other in succession, and the party administering the Government should have a strong, able, and vigilant Opposition; nothing can long prevent its degeneracy, and that can only delay it. The Republican party has existed too long, and seized fas aut nefas upon greatly too much power, and aggregated too much in numbers. The best good of the whole country, the very existence of our system of mixed national and State governments, require that it should come to an end, and a speedy end.

Mr. President, do not your political friends give their opponents grounds thus to arraign them. The motives and ends of your whole policy of reconstruction are palpable and transparent, and none are so blind, so stupid, as not to see and understand them. Humanity and philanthropy, to benefit and elevate the freed negroes, are but pretexts. You know the inferiority and incapability of that race; but their liberation having been effected chiefly by your efforts, and knowing that this has bound them strongly to you, your conclusion is, that if they possessed the right of suffrage they would exercise it in the interests and conformably to the will of their benefactors. You persuade yourselves that you would get and hold possession of them, and that their votes would add so much to your political power. No man so credulous as to believe that if the negro population was as large in the former free States, respectively, as it is in the ten southern States, that any considerable number of your party would advocate their right of suffrage; and every one knows that if you were convinced they would as generally vote against you, as you now believe they would for you, the vehemence of your opposition would greatly exceed the zeal of your present advocacy of that proposition.

If you are true and sincere in supporting the right of suffrage to the hundreds of thousands of negroes in the southern States, why do you withhold it from the few thousands in your own? If you and the southern white people were in exactly reversed situations as to the freed negro, there is none of you, not one, that would now be found advocating negro suffrage. If you are such disinterested and generous friends of that downtrodden race, and you in truth believe that they are still wronged and outraged by their former owners, why do you not hold out to them inducements—great inducements—to leave such unfriendly society and come to your fraternal arms, where you could give them full community of civil, political, and social rights and privileges with the white race? You ostentatiously proclaim that it is only prejudice, senseless prejudice, that operates upon any white persons to bring them to reject the negro race from this full community. You who take this ground have the privilege to prove the truth of your professions by your works. Have you done so? How many of you have negro wives, negro sons-in-law, and daughters-in-law?

Who of you, when you spread your feasts and have your convivial parties, when you gather to your hospitable mansions the white youth and beauty and innocence of your circles, invite and mingle with them the black skins, the woolly heads, and the odoriferous effluvia of the sons and daughters of Africa? If upon these points you are as exclusive as others, does it not prove that when you take position in favor of negro equality you are only attempting to cajole them and their weak friends by shallow and false demagogery to cheat them of their votes? If they would go and reside among you they could receive at once, if you were disposed to confer it upon them, free and unobstructed suffrage and the fullest equality with you. A few years since a proposition was made in this Chamber to distribute the whole negro population of the United States among the several States, in the ratio of their white people, and you voted against it. You are opposed to that race being colonized out of the United States; many of you are unfriendly to its removal from the southern to the northern States, and to foreign white immigration into the southern States; but you are all in favor of the negroes in the southern States staying there and being enfranchised, and large numbers of the whites being disfranchised, so that the few white Radicals and all the negroes may cast the votes of those States at the presidential and congressional elections in your interests and for your candidates.

In furtherance of this policy you have passed laws to enfranchise seven hundred thousand negroes and to disfranchise three hundred thousand white men in the ten southern States. You have abolished the governments formed by their white people under the guarantees of their independence and the Constitution of the United States, and instead you have substituted a military despotism to organize negro governments, to be administered under your tutelage and to secure your continuance in your power. You carry forward this work of usurpation, revolution and tyranny by the organization of five extraordinary military departments in those States, and by the presence and surveillance of large bodies of soldiers, commanded by five willing and active epauletted tools, and you propose its consummation by the erection of a military dictatorship in the person of the General of the Army of the United States. You forbid any further recognition of the State governments in those States by the executive or judicial departments, although the Constitution vests the cognizance of State government in each department of the Government of the United States for its appropriate constitutional action, and from which Congress has no more authority to exclude the executive and judicial departments than they have to exclude Congress. Over this, and all other subjects confided to the several departments, they are coördinate and coequal and neither can affect any control or superiority over the others. Without a particle of constitutional power you prescribe who shall and who shall not vote, who shall and who shall not be candidates in those ten States, and your edicts are to be enforced by the bayonet. This is equivalent for you yourselves, without the intervention of any agency to make governments for those States. This mocking burlesque of the enactment of the sovereign power of the people of a State to form their own government, you declare in the bill to be "to the end that the people of the said several States may speedily reorganize civil governments, republican in form, in said several States, and be restored to political power in the Union."

The Constitution invests the President with the power, and charges him with the duty, of having the laws faithfully executed; and makes him the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. It tolerates no partition of these great powers, but organizes them as units, and vests them in the President alone. From his exercise of them there is no appeal, no revision, but his action is final and absolute. Yet the terms of this bill divest the President of both those powers for an indefinite time in the ten southern States, and clothe the General of the Army with them. Those powers form most important parts of his office, which he has sworn faithfully to execute, notwithstanding this bill declares any attempts by him to execute them in the ten States to be crimes for which it subjects him to ignominious punishment. The bill invites and urges the General of the Army and other military officers to insubordination and disobedience of the authority of the Commander-in-Chief, and if any of them should be weak enough to yield and incur the guilt, they would be subject to die by the sentence of a court-martial.

But your reconstruction bills not only violate the Constitution by seizing upon powers which it does not confer upon Congress, and forbidding their exercise by the departments to which it has confided them, and by stripping the white people of ten States of their power to form the Governments and control the internal affairs of their respective States, but they have also torn from the southern people all the rights, privileges, and liberties guaranteed to them in common with all the people of the United States by the Constitution. Those States were during the whole war de jure States of the United States, with the proper relations between them and the Government of the United States and the other States suspended by actual hostilities; but when those hostilities terminated, by the operation of the Constitution and laws, the States involved in the rebellion rightfully resumed the same relations in the Union which they had occupied before the revolt; and they and their people became entitled to all the rights, liberties, and privileges, and subject to all the duties and obligations, of the other States and their people; but all persons of every State who had entered into the revolt were liable according to law, both civilly and criminally, for their acts. That the citizens of the States whose relations with the United States were suspended by the insurrection that remained faithful to the Constitution, laws, and authorities of the United States, notwithstanding, become alien enemies, and subject to all the consequences which the laws of nations extend to alien enemies, is as unsound and as untrue as it is unjust and cruel. The case is not controlled by the law of nations, but by the principles of our own Constitution and mixed system of national and State Governments; and it must be decided by them alone, and between them and the doctrine regulating alien enemies there is irreconcilable and fatal conflict.

But to concede for argument that the State governments of the ten southern States were abrogated by the rebellion and its suppression, their people continued to be citizens of the United States. Is there any one so demented as to contend that the portion of people of the revolted States who continued true and faithful to the United States throughout the rebellion at its close were and yet continue to be alien enemies? The people of those States now are, and throughout the whole rebellion were, citizens of the United States; most of them were criminals, but all were citizens. Every citizen of the United States, whether a resident of a State or a Territory, or of any spot within the boundary of the United States, although outside of the States and organized Territories, is entitled to all the rights, liberties, privileges, and protection organized by the Constitution. If the southern States are in truth blotted out their people are not, and with all their follies and crimes they have the right to put on the panoply of the Constitution, which also provides for their trial and punishment.

What are the rights and liberties which it assures to them in common with every American citizen? The freedom of religious opinion and worship; the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, subject to be suspended by Congress only, when the public safety may require it in times of rebellion and invasion; that treason shall consist only in levying war against the United States, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort—no person to be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court; the freedom of speech and the press; the right of the people to keep and bear arms, and to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches; no warrant to issue against any one but on probable cause, supported by oath, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or things to be seized; no person to be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the military or naval forces; no person to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb for the same offense, or to be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor to be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; private property not to be taken for public use without just compensation; in all criminal prosecutions every person to have secured to him a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and District wherein the crime shall have been committed, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have assistance of counsel in his defense; no excessive bail or excessive fines, and no cruel or unusual punishments.

What a noble summary of justice and freedom and fundamental law to secure it, comprehending the essential, natural, and civil rights of universal humanity; and all acts of Congress impairing them are declared null and void. They are the true ends of all just and legitimate government, and that is the best government which assures them in the greatest perfection to every citizen. But you have swept them all from the southern States, and stripped alike the loyal and the disloyal of all their benefits; and you have the same power so to despoil any other portion of the American people. Before the age of Alfred the Saxon mind and heart of England had fully compassed those great rights and liberties, and organized them into immortal principles of the common law; and during the long intervening ages the grandest struggles ever made by man have been for their reinstatement, as from time to time they were borne down by the forces of despotism. They have often been overthrown but never crushed out, for they "spring eternal in the human breast." Without their enjoyment, or the hope for them that never dies, neither government nor life would be desirable.

This immortal aspiration peopled the New World with its votaries, carried our ancestors through the long struggle of the Revolution, and incorporated those principles of liberty as of the very body of the Constitution, to be handed down a priceless heritage to posterity through indefinite ages. Those principles were imbedded deep and strong in our fundamental law, that they might abide inviolate all the mutations of peace, all the storms of war, and all the machinations and assaults of the demon of faction. Their enemies are the enemies of our country and mankind. Factionists in the possession of power make loud but hollow professions of devotion to them while trampling them under foot; and to continue their rule and their plunder of the nation they are now offering to immolate the Constitution and all the rights and liberties guaranteed by it, because they stand in their way.

A Government that cannot defend that Constitution and those liberties is worthless; one that will not be criminal, but one that operates to destroy them is wicked to the last degree, and deserves the abhorrence of all patriotic men. When that Government, embodying a desperate faction, proceeds practically to break up this Constitution and crush those liberties, to abolish the governments of ten States, to absorb all the powers of the several departments, and to usurp other and vast powers for the perpetuation of its rule, and to make certain the consummation of this great scheme of parricidal ambition, organizes a military dictatorship, the rally cry of every true patriot should be, "Down with the revolutionary Congress and the iron-mailed dictator set up by it!"

Relief from Political Disabilities.

REMARKS OF HON. J. P. C. SHANKS,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 17, 1868,

On the bill (H. R. No. 778) to relieve William W. Holden and others from disabilities.

MR. SHANKS. Mr. Speaker, the proposition before the House is the beginning of a new series of troubles unnecessarily being brought upon us by our own hands.

A measure that discourages and discounts those who have remained loyal during the years when all these men sought to be relieved by this bill were traitors, and many of them engaged in open war on their Government. This bill offers a premium upon treason and crime by raising them in defiance over loyalty and virtue. These men when pardoned will, as they do now, despise those whose loyalty aided in defeating the purposes of their treason. This bill puts the weapon at the heart of our friends and encourages our enemies to strike. It in effect says, that patriotism has no virtues or honors that treason may not claim and receive. These men can never atone for their great crimes and should not be released from their voluntary disabilities under the law. If these men are true and worthy they will not ask place in the Government they sought to destroy. If not, they should not be permitted to receive it. If they were honest they would bow down in humility before the wide-spread evidences of their great crimes, and repair with their property and their labor, to the utmost of their ability, the wrongs they have committed upon their country and kind. But this proposition comes not from meekness under repentance. It is not the humble prayer of the Republican, who, with a contrite heart, "smote upon his breast, saying, God, be merciful to me a sinner." But it is the mockery over petition which finds its counter part in the arrogance of the Pharisee in public places who said, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are." What atonement have these men made for their offenses? Have they atoned to the loyal people of the southern States whose persons have been wronged and property wasted in the war provoked by these traitors? Have they atoned to the much-abused poor but loyal colored people for the wrongs inflicted and still being inflicted on them, the result of these men's treason and oppression?

Have they atoned to the Treasury of the nation and to our tax-burdened people for the great debt they aided in imposing on them by the rebellion? Have they atoned to their own misguided neighbors and people for the loss of life and property they caused by their reasonable teachings to them by which they induced the war? Have they atoned to the hundred thousand widows of loyal and brave men who died to save their country from their treason? Have they atoned to the half million orphans whose sires fell victims to the war these men provoked and waged? Have they atoned to the mothers of the country who sent their loved ones to do battle for their fatherland, and who watched the sun as it rose and set, counting with a mother's devotion the hours of their absence, and with hopes and fears awaited their return? Have they atoned to the fathers of this land for the sons they have lost—murdered by traitors? Have they atoned to the maimed soldier or seaman for the wounds their treason gave him? Have they atoned to the flag they insulted, the Constitution they violated, and the land they drenched in blood? Have they atoned to the civilization of this age for the attempt to destroy this free, republican Government and to erect upon its ruins a despotism the chief corner-stone of which should be human slavery? Have they atoned for the crimes of Andersonville, Millen, Macon, Salisbury, Libby and Belle Isle, Fort Pillow, Memphis, and Orleans? Have they atoned for the cold, deliberate treason by which they contracted with crowned heads of Europe for the sale of the liberties of the people and the overthrow of the Government? Have they made any atonement? No, sir; while the wide-spread desolation caused by their treason is weighing as a mountain upon the people, while there are in the seceded States loyal men by the thousand who have been wronged in person and robbed of property by these men and their criminal coadjutors, who have made no amends for their many crimes, they, in common with their treacherous associates hold their property protected to them by the Government they sought to destroy, and of which they now, with villainous arrogance, demand to be released from the disabilities their voluntary crimes have imposed on them under the law, the Representatives of the loyal people, who have suffered these great sacrifices in defense of the Government, are told that we should vote for this bill of release.

Sir, in the name of the people I represent; in the name of the stricken soldiers and seamen of the country; in the name of my country, burdened with debt consequent upon the war; in the name of the wronged loyal citizens of the southern States, victims of treason; in the name of the parents who gave their sons in this struggle; in the name of the widows and orphans this war has made; in the name of the poor, unlearned, long-suffering, but loyal colored people of the South; in the name of justice, my country, and a common humanity, I protest against this untimely proceeding; this invidious distinction in favor of traitors, setting them up in defiance of the loyal people they and their coadjutors wronged, the country they betrayed, the Union they attempted to disrupt, the flag they insulted, the peace they disturbed, the Constitution they mocked, the property they wasted, the homes they desolated, and the blood they spilled. Sir, the sun might well refuse to shine when this deed is being consummated here by the people's Representatives.

HO. OF REPS.

Finances—Mr. Bromwell.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Finances.

SPEECH OF HON. H. P. H. BROMWELL, OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 14, 1868.

The House, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the President's annual message—

Mr. BROMWELL said:

MR. SPEAKER: So far as regards this question of Alaska and the treaty-making power I only wish to say that I cannot understand how the Senate and the President can annex foreign territories, introduce foreign countries, and incorporate them as parts of the community of the United States without consulting the law-making power of the Republic. My idea is that the annexation of any portion of a foreign country to this, so as to make its territory a part of our domain and its people a part of our community, capable of exercising a voice in this Government, requires the disposing power of this nation, which is in the law-making department and not in the executive arm, which is but to execute laws, nor in the judicial arm, which is but to interpret them, but in the law-making department, which exerts the disposing power of the Republic. Notwithstanding what the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] has urged, I still hold the belief that it is competent for this House, holding the people's power in trust for them, to exercise a proper discretion in granting or withholding appropriations of the public money to pay for the annexation of land or people. Otherwise, by the exercise of power on which the people can express no opinion, the Republic itself might come to be utterly changed in its boundaries, in its population, and its character, and so the actual institutions of the country be wholly subverted.

Now, sir, I wish to speak in behalf of a class of the community who seem to be very seldom represented on this floor by one of their own number. I refer to those whom we in the West call the "old settlers" of this country. [Laughter.] There is and always has been a numerous body of people who dwell upon the borders of the wilderness. They have much to do with the welfare of the country. They are the sappers and miners, who subdue the forests and make way for the march of civilization. Simple-minded as they may be, and unskilled in letters or arts, they are devoted to the welfare of their country.

The reason why I speak for them now is that every year gives additional evidence to my mind that the forces of capital and its kindred influences, which assume to themselves the patronage and proprietorship of all that is excellent and progressive, are becoming each year more and more powerful in this Republic, as in all other countries. They stifle the voice and crowd out the interests of the mass of the common people, who are, nevertheless, the class most entitled to be heard in this great experiment of self-government, which has failed in all other hands from the beginning.

I speak for those whose hands have shared the toils of frontier life from youth, because they have a right to be represented here according to their own sentiments and opinions, and particularly by one of their own number, for such am I. I was surprised the other day on being asked by a member from a State not very distant from mine, what was meant by an "old settler," and when I answered by saying that they were the men who knew how to use the ax, the maul, the log-chain, and the frow, he further asked "What in the world is a frow?" If our people and their occupations and habits are so lost sight of here, I will say, for the information of all present, that it is an implement that is used by operative "old settlers" to convert the bolts of living timber into shingles, clapboards, laths, and staves, and though not much used at present with us is still kept bright on the frontier and among the pineries, and but few years ago furnished the finishing lumber of the best houses in all the regions represented by a majority of this Congress.

Sir, of the people whom I represent not less than twenty thousand voters belong to the class I have mentioned. They may be divided in politics touching certain questions which divide other portions of the country. A portion of them may be opposed to the policy adopted by the majority of this House with whom I act, nevertheless I feel bound upon other questions than those in issue, when they cast their votes, to stand by the great body of people who sent me here and to represent their views as nearly as possible on the subjects I shall now present.

It is well known that the truths which are most valuable in all the practical relations of life are those which are known and felt by common perception. Though by continual study, lucubrations, and ratiocinations the learned may give out theories concerning political economy, finance, and other matters; although men may become skillful in arts and learned in many sciences of great interest and use from the perusal of books, yet the fact remains that the most fundamental and valuable truths are perceived and recognized by the common perception of the common people, and made practical by experience in common things. This common perception is called by the "old settlers" "wild-hog sense." It is also to the common people that we look to maintain the laws of the land and to uphold and defend in war the character and integrity of the Republic. But because the common mind in its simplicity looks for light to the more learned, to those who assume more scientific knowledge and possess skill in laws and public affairs, many of our people may be misled, yet it is not to be denied that they have the welfare of their country at heart and rejoice in its prosperity and power.

In discussing the question of finance, when we hear learned addresses on this floor, whom do the gentlemen speaking represent? Do they represent the interest of capital or the interest of labor? Are they standing by the men who work with their hands and brains, or are they representing those sentiments and opinions naturally engendered and kept in vogue in all communities where the influence of capital has laid its hands on every energy and every interest and twined its meshes around every enterprise of society? To read the books which men put forth, the circulars which are so frequently laid on our table, as well as many of the articles of the public press, a man would scarce suppose there was an interest in the world to be looked after until capital should be first provided for.

When gentlemen talk of reducing the currency and coming to a specie standard, as though that of itself would open the gates to the golden age and bring about a political millennium, they speak for capital, they look too much from the stand-point fixed for them by capital, and overlooking labor in its low estate they seem to think that hard money should be the only currency of the country, and if any other is to be permitted it must be furnished by capital on its own terms and not by the people. Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say there never was a day when there was hard money enough to carry on its business and give to the laboring man his fair share of the general prosperity, although it is true there never was lacking gold and silver enough in the country to give to capital a grasp upon the earnings of labor. But when was there a time when the common business of the country was done or attempted to be done by gold and silver alone? On the contrary, it has been found during the whole experience of the Republic that no party could rise with power enough to put in execution a project of resorting to gold and silver alone. There are, perhaps, enough of the precious metals in some countries for all their purposes, and some of them seem to have tried that system for a sufficient period of time. It has been tried, in Persia, in Arabia, in Syria, and in other countries of the Asiatic continent, from before the day when Abraham weighed out the money for the cave of Machpelah; and what do you find? That they have stood by gold and silver, and still the labor of men's hands has had no value compared with the worth of labor in this country; and you find that those nations are where they began. The squalid slave still follows the stolid ass or buffalo, dragging the wooden plow; the indolent caravan plods its painful way along roadless deserts with troops of guards who camp in the open air and spend as much time and labor to convey a few car loads of merchandise as far as from here to Pittsburg as an American contractor would require to move the material of this Capitol to the Mississippi valley.

While ignorant poverty crouches beside the ruins of luxury and vanity throughout all that continental expanse, America, and even Europe, have wrought wonders in the amelioration of man's condition, to say nothing of the stupendous advance in knowledge and the arts.

In this country we have so far made long strides in progress toward the freedom of the people in thought and act, and such has been the advancement that every man's hands are untied, every man is invited to cooperate and compete, every man is challenged to take up every implement of labor, to pursue every honorable vocation, and make himself busy and useful to his country and his kind. Is there anything in common between a country in which society runs in the old grooves of four thousand years of despotism and debasement, reaching to every corner of the land, and to every hearthstone, and a country where every man is supposed to be a citizen and a king; between the shiftless drudgery of Oriental serfdom and the buoyant and bounding enterprise of American free labor? Yet men high in authority in this country tell us that gold and silver must be made the currency, and wages and prices lowered to a European standard, not seeing that the door which opens for their golden age brings in the squalid poverty and doleful poor-house system of Europe with all its miseries and sin.

I undertake to say that it will be found the rule from the beginning to the end, that in proportion as wages are high and a man by the earnings of his hands acquires a greater proportion of the circulating medium, whatever it may be, in that proportion he enjoys a larger share of the valuables of the community; and this should be the end and object of the distribution of wealth. Not that a man shall have so much money, but that he shall have so much of that which is of use to him for his body or his mind, for when wages and all other things are high labor is sought for and commands its price; but when all things are low, labor begs for opportunity and capital commands its price.

Writers and speakers are continually dwelling upon the amount of our currency before the war, and estimating the same at so many or so many millions; but where is the man, either in office or out of office, who has counted or computed the currency existing before the war at an amount anything like what it really was? They will tell you there were so many bank notes of those pet banks which infested the country, and so much gold and so much silver, and they foot up these amounts and tell you that before the war began we had so many millions of currency, and since the war we have so many greenbacks, and so much national paper, so much gold, and so much silver, and these they also add together as the existing currency.

But, Mr. Speaker, where are the promissory notes and the book accounts which before the war took the place of currency, and exceeded the amount of all our greenbacks? Who has taken these into the calculation?

The Secretary of the Treasury puts forth his report and discusses this subject. I do not wish to attack him. I am not here to-day for the purpose of making an assault upon his conduct. I know of no facts that would bear me out in saying anything derogatory to the honest management of the Department's accounts; that is, I see nothing with any certainty that would justify me in accusing him. I shall, therefore, treat him as he has always treated me—with the courtesy due to an officer of this Government.

But with this official paper of his we all have to do, and upon this I beg leave to submit a few reflections. And the reflections I will submit are those which strike the common mind of the common people, whom I have the high honor to represent here, and are not the ratiocinations or conclusions of political scholars, financial experts, agents of capital, or millennial harbingers, now abounding in the political and financial world. The Secretary says in one place in his report:

"A certain amount is required for facilitating exchanges and determining values. The exact amount required cannot of course be accurately determined, but the excess or deficiency of money in a country is always pretty accurately indicated by the condition of its industry and trade. In all countries there is just as much money needed as will encourage enterprise, give employment to labor, and furnish the means for a ready exchange of property, and no more."

Now, if the Secretary will stand by and carry out that doctrine he might, it seems to me, accomplish all we desire. I also say that the state of trade and industry in a country indicates whether there is or is not a sufficient amount of money in circulation, and that being admitted, I desire in behalf of myself and all the "old settlers," without distinction, to say to Secretary McCulloch and others who are pressing contraction, that the course he has seen proper to advocate in this country is calculated to bring great numbers of able-bodied men to idleness; and whether that makes a difference or not in his calculations it will, in our opinion, make a vast difference in this country's prosperity whether all hands are set to work with energy, as we propose, or more than five hundred thousand independent citizens are wearing holes in their coats, and particularly in their trousers, sitting on store-boxes and horse-blocks about the country-seats and cross-road groceries, watching the neighbors pitch horseshoes for dog-leg tobacco for want of better employment, as has always been the case in times of contracted currency.

When the war broke out our surplus population went into the Army. When the war closed, and they came back to the number of a million, the country then had what it never had before; that is, good money enough to set all hands at work of the myriads of men who had followed General Grant and his illustrious comrades in the armies of the Republic. They went with alacrity into all the departments of life. They opened new avenues of business; they entered upon new projects; they brought forward many new industries. The whole land teemed with activity and energy. Railroads were extended, farms opened, cities built; the arts flourished. Every species of industry, mechanical, commercial, and agricultural, went forward; the tools of all craftsmen were in motion, and the musical sounds of prosperity from forest and field and forge and factory filled all the land.

I venture to say from this experience that he who adds ten per cent. to the energies of the people has done more than he who doubles their capital; for one hundred minds, impelled by even a small increase of energy in productive pursuits, will bring a power to add material wealth to the nation more than thousands sitting upon doubled capital, managing and working to make that capital, sponge-like, suck and draw proportionate returns from the proceeds of struggling industry.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot now, for want of time, go through all this paper of the Secretary, particularly as I speak without preparation, according to the usage of my people in such cases, for the "old settlers" never require a man to say more than he knows at one time; but if time were allowed I think I could go on just now and make a speech on this subject so nigh like a good one that you would not notice the difference. But I have not intended to do more than present the general views of the people with whom I have grown up, and who send me here to represent them before you. [Voices. "Go ahead, you shall have time," &c.]

Again, the Secretary says:

"The prices of most kinds of property in the United States advanced near threefold during the war, but this advance was mainly the result of the increase of the circulating medium, and in reality only indicated its depreciation. The purchasing power of the money in circulation was diminished in the ratio that its volume was increased. The farmer, for example, received three dollars a bushel for his wheat, but, except for the payment of his debts, these three dollars were of no more value to him than one dollar was before the suspension of specie payments."

Here is logic for you! According to this report, as I will shortly show, the excess of greenbacks makes the difference between them and gold, which is now say forty per cent., but the same excess makes wheat worth three times as much. Now, if the premium on gold to-day is in proportion to the excess of paper money, of course forty per cent. of paper withdrawn would not make gold even. Then what would become of the price of wheat, and how much more would wheat fall than gold? If no more, then the price does not depend entirely on the amount of currency and farmers may continue to be distressed with high prices for their products.

Mr. MULLINS. I wish before the gentleman closes that he would give us to understand whether he proposes to liken this Walrusia to the land of Canaan, where Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah?

Mr. BROMWELL. If I have time, and I can think of anything to say that would be interesting upon that point, I will certainly do so before I sit down.

Secretary McCulloch then says:

"The policy of contracting the currency, although not enforced to the extent authorized by law, has prevented an expansion of credits, to which a redundant and especially a depreciated currency is always an incentive, and has had no little influence in stimulating labor and increasing production."

And again, in continuation of the same views, he says:

"An increase of money beyond what is needed for the purposes above named, according to all experience, not only inflates prices, but diminishes labor; and coin, as a consequence, flows from the country in which the excess exists to some other, where labor is more active and prices are lower."

"Where labor is more active and prices are lower," says the Secretary. Now, sir, since I was old enough to shoulder an eggshell I have never heard it said by any party or any man representing any set of opinions that to squeeze down the money and make "wages lower" rendered "labor more active;" that to take away the reward of labor "stimulates industry and promotes production." How can that be? If this were true, it would have been better during the war to burn the money we had than to increase its amount, and thereby our industry would have been increased; whereas the people saw and felt that the increase of the currency was accompanied with remarkable energy in every branch of business, and the people were stimulated to labor because the facility with which they could change that labor into valuables brought the valuables, as it were, to tempt their very eyes. For to make money plenty is to the man who labors to put him comparatively nearer on a level with the class who holds that money.

Why, sir, how very industrious the people ought to be in Syria, in Persia, in Arabia, or on the northern coast of Africa, and in all those countries where wages are so low that labor is in contempt by reason of the scarcity of money circulating among the common people! Does not every man know that this country is great only because of its immense enthusiasm and energy, and that these depend upon the reward of labor, and that the reward of labor must be ready and waiting for the grasp of the men who are to undergo the hard toil, and on whose Atlasan shoulders the real burdens of the Government must be borne? Governments and nations are not built up by smart writing in books and pamphlets; they are not built up by men becoming rich or learned in the lore of political economy and writing books—teaching the arts of sharp trading and speculation. They become strong because of material wealth so diffused as to permit diffused education and enterprise and of the power consequent thereon, and this comes from the hands and the brains of men engaged in productive industry, and not otherwise.

Again, the Secretary of the Treasury makes another declaration to which I wish to call attention:

"In all countries there is just as much money needed as will encourage enterprise, give employment to labor, and furnish a ready exchange of property, and no more. Whenever the amount in circulation exceeds the amount required for these purposes the fact will become apparent by a decline of industry, an advance of prices, and a tendency to speculation."

All this is my opinion exactly; yet still I wish to say a word about speculation. The people whom I represent would rather see a hundred men speculating on the prosperity of this country than one man speculating on its necessities.

Men will speculate forever, and they will speculate either on the prosperity of their neighbors or on their adversity. They will either speculate because the universal energy develops new fields of profit, or they will speculate because hard times have closed around the people; and creditors resort to the law, judgments fill the dockets, and executions cover all the court-house doors, and the majority of the people are at the mercy of the money monger. Let me say to the Secretary of the Treasury that the speculations which cut the vitals of the community are made in hard times, when money is scarce, as it was in 1841 and in 1857. Let him but bring the country again to that pinch, and though speculations may not be on so gigantic a scale, in great railroad enterprises and getting up paper cities, they will be in those small but infinitely numerous operations which capital enables men to make upon the small means of a neighborhood. In a State oppressed by want, tied down by straitened circumstances, and stripped of currency, men have not the means of doing what they will with their own. A man is not really free to act when he must wait from day to day to barter and make exchanges, and by this slow means arrive finally at that which he needs.

Now, further, concerning the time before the war, not only are the promissory notes and the book accounts left out of the calculation, but all that immense mass of business which was nothing but barter. In "hard times" before the war a man owning oxen and wanting to procure sheep did not sell his oxen and buy sheep. He had to wait until he found a man who wanted to make the exchange. Sometimes he had to travel till he found a man who would trade something else with him. He might have to trade first for horses, then trade the horses with another man for land, and finally exchange the land for sheep. So that after he had spent weeks in waiting to accomplish the exchange he would succeed in procuring what he wanted in the first instance, but then, perhaps, of an unsuitable quality.

This was the way business was transacted quite commonly in this country during all the hard times from 1840 to 1862. But where there is money in circulation a man sells to one and buys of another, and in an hour's time he has done his business. His energy is all in force and his time is not wasted, and when the energies of people are alive the country, as we have seen, becomes filled with new farms, houses, churches, school-houses, mills, factories, and depots, so that it is a matter of astonishment that improvements can be so rapid. Indeed, if a stranger had visited my section of country at the beginning of the war and should go there now he would throw up his hands in admiration as the Queen of Sheba did when she stood at the portals of Solomon.

Is it contraction of the currency that has produced this? Let me ask the Secretary of the Treasury to take upon himself for three months the business of dealing in cattle and produce in the western States and he will soon see what the policy of contraction is doing and like to do for the benefit of the country, and whether there is too much money in the country to carry on business in such a way as to give every man the advantage of his labor. A pilgrimage of that sort through the central, that is, the western States, would bring more knowledge of the condition and wants of the people to the Treasury Department than is to be found in all the books of finance that were ever written by lamp-light or gas light since the art of printing was brought out of darkness. The Secretary further says:

"Money is simply a medium of exchange and measure of value. As a medium it facilitates exchanges, and by doing this necessarily stimulates production."

True. But, sir, how much is needed? I say as much as will put all the people at work. So long as you find men seeking employment without being able to find it, the country needs more money. When you find men of means hunting for workmen but unable to find them, then the country has sufficient money—then the country is prospering; and much as some may dread such a state of things, the only danger will be that men who boast of wealth may have to go to work when their poorer neighbors are all employed. I would to God there was enough of the medium of exchange, whatever it may be, so that every man in the United States could, to some extent at least, be the master of his own hands. That cannot be realized under a contracted currency. Capital will own him body and soul, and, like the giant cuttle, will fasten its grasping tentacles about him as long as the amount of currency is kept at the low rate required by capital to insure its own reward.

But the Secretary goes on to say:

"No sane man supposes that his own wealth, or the wealth of the nation, is increased by the depreciation of the standard by which it is measured. If the paper circulation of the United States should be doubled during the next year, and the prices of property should be likewise doubled, would it be imagined that the real value of property would be thus advanced?"

He argues, first—as I said I would show—that the doubling of the currency doubles values, which is not true and never was, as this very report proves, in speaking of which; and secondly, that it would add no thing to values, to which last I agree. But I wish to say that it is not of the prices of articles which I now speak when I say that the wealth of the country is increased by an abundant currency. I know that appraising an article at a certain price adds nothing to its intrinsic value; but I say that a system which puts better clothes on men's bodies, better boots on their feet, better horses in their stables, better wagons on their roads, better implements on their farms, and better furniture in their houses, is the better system for the community. Judging by this test, I feel justified in saying that the people of this country added more to their material wealth in the two years prior to 1867 than in any five years before. And by this means the national debt was in effect diminished, for to increase the valuables of the country makes the debt proportionally smaller, and to diminish prices and values makes the debt proportionally greater, as all can see.

MATERIAL PROSPERITY.

This, I undertake to say, has diminished in proportion as we diminished the amount of current money below what the amazing expansion of industry and business in this country made necessary two years ago.

For the purpose of doing this the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized by a law of this Congress to burn $4,000,000 of greenbacks a month, a privilege which he seemed to greatly enjoy. What followed? A universal cry arose among those who are paying the inflated taxation of this country. It is very well to talk about "inflated currency," but I wish to suggest that at the same time we are paying and must pay an inflated taxation, and nothing but that inflated currency, as it is called, ever enabled our officers to collect the taxes for one month without public distress. Neither will they be able, under any circumstances, any longer to collect internal taxation such as we have had for one single month whenever we shall return to what they are pleased to call a specie basis. Now, sir, in my humble judgment, I considered, and I did hope when I offered a joint resolution to that effect that this Congress would consider, it better to collect $48,000,000 a year of our bonds of any description and burn them instead of our money. It would have been better for the country to do that than to burn $48,000,000 of the circulating medium, leaving the bonds to bear interest, as has been done. For to burn $48,000,000 of money it must first be collected as tax, so that amount of tax was actually collected for the fire. The House, however, has not seen fit to direct any such action, neither do I know that it will do so. If $48,000,000 of anything is to be burned the old settlers live so far from Wall street that they cannot see why it should be the circulating medium and not the interest-bearing debt of this country. I would that this Congress would make the amount of bonds to be called in and destroyed more than $4,000,000 a month, so that there should be a material reduction in our interest-bearing indebtedness, for by this means greenbacks may come to par. The Secretary argues that by contraction greenbacks will be brought to par. He has been contracting for two years, and where is the par to which he has brought greenbacks? His theory has been "tried by fire" and is found wanting. The truth is, so long as these bonds, which the greenbacks represent in a certain sense, are at so great a discount, the greenbacks will be below par. If the bonds were being taken up, or by any other means the credit of the Government were kept up, so that they were not being hawked about the markets of the world at seventy cents on the dollar, then we might expect some advance in greenbacks.

I wish, sir, to compare for a moment, before I go further, the condition of the country as it really was before the war and as it really is, and not as pictured by the imagination of political writers. Before the war, let the amount of currency be what it might, the dockets of the circuit courts in every county that I know anything about west of the Alleghany mountains were black with decrees in chancery foreclosing mortgages and executions upon promissory notes and obligations. The court-house doors were placarded with advertisements of masters' and sheriffs' sales; and advertisements of sales of lands for taxes filled up the county newspapers over a year from the title page to the end. Why was this? Was not the currency scarce enough? It had been so for several years.

How is it now? How was it two years ago? How was it after the people had enough legal-tender ready money with which to transact their business? And yet Secretary McCulloch, in speaking of these very greenbacks, uses this language:

"Regarding, as he does, the issue of United States notes, in the first instance, as having been a misfortune," &c.

He, the Secretary of the Treasury, admitting that necessity required it, still regards the issue of this money, which unlocked executions and stayed the sheriff's hammer on one half of all the real estate in this country, and which saved the country from executions upon the personal property of tens of thousands of men—he regards the issue of greenbacks as a misfortune!

Let me say here that it cannot be doubted that the making of these greenbacks legal tender saved this country from financial ruin. Without it we should have been involved in universal bankruptcy, such as now afflicts all the communities of the South. Without these greenbacks having been made legal tender there would have been nothing in the shape of industry, no business from which to have raised the taxation which supported the Government. Without it, since the war, you would have been precisely where the people of the confederate States were when they came out of the contest, without anything but chaff and dust and ashes in your hands with which to meet legal obligations, or with which to make exchanges of any merchantable value. And yet the Secretary regrets the passage of a law giving the people the power to use their own credit and resources, to take the burden off their own backs, to untie their own hands and put their industry to profit.

I undertake to say, further, that but for the acts which brought out the legal-tender notes and the national currency this country, from the very necessity of the case, would have been overwhelmed with the issues of wild-cat banks in every town and county-seat from Maine to California, excepting the gold-producing States and Territories. Let me say further to this House that unless this Government does see to it that its people have a currency sufficient for their wants the local Legislatures will again begin the work of spreading irresponsible notes of corporate banks broadcast throughout this country. They will do it because the public distresses will compel the people to pay any price rather than to be ground down again as they have been heretofore. It may not be wise, but it will nevertheless be done.

MR. DAWES. I have listened with a great deal of gratification to the able remarks so far made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BROMWELL.] But there is one point upon which I desire to obtain his opinion. I perceive by the newspapers published in Cincinnati, where this plan originated which he is advocating, that the proposition is to issue $2,500,000,000 of greenbacks, and divide them up among all the people of the country, and they have figured out that it will give $400 to each man, woman, and child in the country. Now, I want to ask my friend if he will not go for the proposition to make it $450 each? It will be necessary for us, if we would not lose the popular favor in such a matter, to go at least that far beyond what the other side proposes. [Laughter.]

MR. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BROMWELL,] I will correct a misstatement, or an error of fact, on the part of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. Dawes.] The gentleman from Massachusetts says that this plan originated in Cincinnati, Ohio. Now, I think in that statement he does great injustice to a person well known, and whose proposition dates far back of any proposition the gentleman alludes to as having originated in Cincinnati.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Finances—Mr. Bromwell.

Ho. OF REPS.

I allude to a person no less distinguished than Mr. Wilkins Micawber. [Laughter.] Mr. Micawber was indebted, as we are unfortunately indebted. Mr. Micawber was indebted to his friend Thomas Traddles, and he knew not how to get the wherewithal to pay his indebtedness. A lucky idea occurred to him, which he announced in this way:

"To leave this metropolis and my friend, Mr. Thomas Traddles, without acquitting myself of the pecuniary part of this obligation, would weigh upon my mind to an insupportable extent. I have therefore prepared for my friend, Mr. Thomas Traddles, and I now hold in my hand, a document which accomplishes the desired object. I beg to hand to my friend, Mr. Thomas Traddles, my I O U for forty-one, ten, eleven and a half, and I am happy to recover my moral dignity, and to know that I can once more walk erect before my fellow-men."

Mr. DAWES. It is very likely that the original invention dates as far back as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] has suggested. But the reissue of the patent dates from Cincinnati. And I wish to ask my friend from Illinois [Mr. BROMWELL] if he will not go the $450? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROMWELL. The gentleman wishes to extend the terms of the patent. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Yes; and unless he goes for that I cannot go for his policy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SELYE obtained the floor.

Mr. BROMWELL. I hope the House will allow me a little more time, as I have been interrupted by this patent case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLAIR.) How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BROMWELL. I think I can say all I desire to say in fifteen minutes.

Mr. SELYE. I will yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman.

By unanimous consent Mr. BROMWELL's time was extended by the House fifteen minutes.

Mr. BROMWELL. I understand the House has kindly consented to allow me fifteen minutes.

Mr. DAWES. Provided you answer my question.

Mr. BROMWELL. Very well; I will come to it. The question now raised by the gentlemen is whether this Government will pay its obligations in good faith or not. That has nothing to do with the question I was discussing.

Mr. DAWES. The question is whether it is to be paid in good faith or in mere promises to pay.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will say, first, that the discussion upon this point hinges on the word irredeemable. I have never advocated, and never intend to advocate, keeping our currency irredeemable. I have said nothing about paying anything. [Laughter.] Gentlemen are talking about a matter as foreign to that which I was discussing as astronomy.

Mr. MILLER. I do not understand the gentleman to say that he intends those greenbacks shall never be paid.

Mr. BROMWELL. I have said nothing of the sort. I have said nothing about the payment of our indebtedness or any of the modes or manners thereof, and gentlemen know it. Either they do not know what I was talking about or their object in interrupting me is to introduce new matter about which I was not speaking. The question of how much money we want is one thing. How we shall pay our debts is another. I desired to finish what I began, and not attempt a new matter just as I must close; but, being called upon, I will leave the matter I was speaking of and answer this.

So far as regards any scheme of paying our creditors by issuing an increased quantity of greenbacks, increased in such numbers as to make them comparatively worthless, I conceive that that would be bringing upon this country as great a calamity as would be brought upon labor by the scarcity of money, and, at the same time, disreputable. Nay, more; it is worse than simple repudiation by the Government, because it, in effect, would turn the money to waste paper in the hands of its own people. Any scheme to dilute the currency until it shall be worth comparatively nothing is only a fraud upon the public creditors, and worse than a fraud upon the laborers of the country, who must have some species of available currency for the common business of life.

I recognize as fully as any man on this floor that a Government bond is a contract obligatory with interest, and a Government greenback is a Government due-bill without interest. I have never paid the creditor who held my note payable with interest by asking him to take my due-bill without interest. The American people, and particularly the old settlers, will never consent to treat their creditors in that way. It is not the way my State acted when pressed by a debt heavier in proportion to her means than than this of the United States now is. In order to secure our creditors in the most ample manner we made a new constitution, levying a special tax to pay our bonds and interest, and we paid them; for though some may boast of paying their debts according to law, the "old settlers," I am proud to say, pay according to contract.

Nevertheless, it is true, as I have already said, that the American people do demand of their Government enough money—good money; not depreciated money—to carry on their daily business; and they can have it if this Government will but put the same energy and the same intellect into devising ways and means for that purpose which they put forth in the stupendous efforts of the war. I feel certain that the American people will never relinquish their hold on paper money of some description. They will never come down to that state of society which depends on gold and silver as the only circulating medium. You might as well expect them to carry scales to weigh their money, as Abraham did, as to do this. But the people do demand of their Government one kind or another of United States money which shall be as good in the State of Illinois as it is in the State of Maine.

When men cry out about "irredeemable paper" is that any argument against this Government supplying its people with its Treasury notes called greenbacks? What is the necessity of making this currency irredeemable? Some men seem to take it for granted that a greenback must be, ex necessitate rei, irredeemable. The Government now has in its vaults $100,000,000 in gold; and this amount, if it had started in the first place in that way, would have been enough, with such credit as the Government has, to keep those greenbacks at par by redemption at the Treasury. It could not, however, I feel sure, be done to-day, although it has been proposed in this House. In my humble opinion to attempt a resumption of specie payments with that limited amount now would but result in a general rush upon the Treasury and the exhaustion of its funds as fast as they could be counted out, because the notes are all out before any redemption begins. But had the Government begun in the first place, after the manner of banks, with such a fund as that on hand, and with proper means to keep it replenished, the greenbacks to-day might be upon a par with gold; and we may yet make redemption possible.

One more reflection I will make on this point. I know of no use for gold in this country, under the present circumstances, except to buy foreign merchandise of various sorts for importation and to pay duties thereon.

Does any man know for what purpose he would buy gold in Wall street except for the purpose of importing merchandise? Whenever this country shall import as much gold as it exports, or, what is the same thing, export as much in value of merchandise as it imports, I would like to know who could sell gold at a premium in New York or anywhere else. Who would buy it? No man would want it to pay a debt with, for the very money with which he would purchase it would pay that debt. No man would want it to pay an execution or redeem land with, for the courts have declared and must declare that greenbacks are a legal tender and the end of the law. The truth is, if this country will, either by the adjustment of a tariff or by any other means, balance exports with imports, the question of paying our bonds in greenbacks will never trouble us at all.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to keeping up the controversy as to what we shall do with our public creditors. Every speech made about paying greenbacks to our public creditors costs us money. Every man who writes a letter discussing the question whether or not these bonds are legally payable in legal tenders makes the matter worse. As long as that controversy is maintained it is impossible for us to keep up our credit in the markets of the world with our bonds, and our bonds being at discount what better can Treasury notes be? What the Government wants is credit at a low rate of interest. How can we expect to get it by agitating the question how we will pay our present creditors? A man who is caviling on the legal terms of his contracts for borrowed money is in no situation to borrow more on favorable terms. There can be no denial of that. Let this controversy rest; manage the affairs of the country until greenbacks are on a level with gold; and then it will make no difference whether these bonds call for paper or specie. The controversy now going on may be good to get up party capital, but it is bleeding the Treasury in advance for the benefit of politicians.

We are not now prepared to pay them in gold, because we have been preventing ourselves from borrowing by keeping up the controversy, and we cannot pay them in greenbacks without flooding the country and making the money almost worthless. I believe in husbanding our resources, in diminishing our taxes, in keeping out as far as possible importations, and bringing the country up to the point at which greenbacks are on a par with gold. All proper means should be resorted to for the purpose of giving the people some description of currency, so that every hand shall be employed throughout the length and breadth of the land, and then paying our creditors as we would expect to be paid if we held the paper of others.

I know the people prefer the greenbacks to the national bank currency. I know, also, that there is a great deal of humbug in the talk about locking up $300,000,000 at interest with the national banks, because there are large sums to be deducted for revenue from those very banks, arising in several ways. Nevertheless there is some truth in it. We are paying more for the national bank currency than we would pay for a redeemable currency furnished from the Treasury of the United States. But, after all, the people are not going to stop the issue of paper money on that account. We are obliged to accept paper money of some kind; and it will be either greenbacks, national bank currency, or wild-cat notes. Every man looks to one or the other of these alternatives, for it is apparent that there is not enough gold and silver, and never will be enough, for currency, and paper must therefore be substituted. The evils of State bank currency in this country have been prodigious. Whole communities have been driven to desperation; the people have been plundered and devoured by speculators who embarked in banking enterprises and made their harvest off the disasters of the people.

But I will not continue this discussion further than to say this: that this whole money question is involved in the causes of the war through which we have recently passed. It takes hold on the interests adverse to and destructive of the country on one side, and the restoration and integrity of the Union on the other. If this country is ever prostrated in its credit with the elements of discord now within it, then, indeed, it will be like Sampson shorn of his locks and deprived of his sight in the hands of the Philistines.

I believe, as I said the other day, that the contest between those interests and elements which seek the disruption and dissolution of this Republic and those which seek to perpetuate it in its integrity must go on, whether it be attacked by striking at the currency, and so, in fact, bringing greenbacks to be lampblack and rags, by striking at the Union, or by striking at its laws, until either the disloyal elements shall have succeeded in their designs or the true friends of humanity and progress shall have triumphed in the contest which has raged so long.

I thank the House for its courtesy in extending my time.

SPEECH OF HON. FREDERICK STONE, OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. STONE. Mr. Chairman, the articles of impeachment reported to this House are ten in number, but substantially there are but two offenses charged. I may say, indeed, that there is only one offense charged, for the tenth article charges, in fact, no offense heretofore known to our laws and is sustained by no proof whatever. The only offense charged in the first nine articles is one violation of the tenure-of-office bill, the alleged offense being set forth in nine different forms only.

The distinguished gentlemen who report and sustain these articles claim that the President is guilty under the law; that the question is a purely legal one; that he should be tried by the law and condemned or acquitted as the law may justify. I propose, therefore, to examine the question legally, and see if it will stand the test the friends of impeachment claim for it.

I do not propose to discuss the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office act. Although I deem that act as clearly unconstitutional as any act ever passed, yet, as that question has already been so fully discussed, I do not deem it necessary again to refer to it.

But, if the Chief Magistrate of the country, now on his trial, has only the common privileges extended to him that are daily extended to the meanest criminal that ever disgraced a dock; if he is tried by those rules of justice, law, and right which the experience of a thousand years has proved the benefit of; if the Senate shall do "impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws," then the President need not apprehend the result, even should that Senate think the tenure-of-office act constitutional and binding.

The second section of article third of the Constitution says:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States," &c.

The command thus given by the Constitution is imperative. It says that the judicial power shall extend, not that it may extend. The jurisdiction thus given to the judiciary of the United States is beyond the power of Congress. No act of Congress can take away from the judicial power of the United States the right to decide cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. That power, authority, and right are expressly given to that great coördinate branch of the Government by a higher authority than Congress, and a higher authority alone can take them away.

While the section quoted gives this power to the judiciary of the United States, it also gives another not less important right to the people. In saying that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, it unequivocally gives to every citizen of the United States who has a case arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States the right to appeal—to appeal to that judicial power for protection and redress.

Congress cannot shut the doors of the courts of the United States against any man who has a case at law or equity under the laws of the United States. The words of the Constitution are sweeping. It says "all cases." This includes civil and criminal cases. The power to punish crimes committed against the laws of the United States is coextensive with the right to obtain redress from laws of the United States. No exceptions whatsoever are made by the Constitution. He who has a case arising under the laws of the United States has the right of trial by the judicial power of the United States, let his position be what it may. All are equal under that supreme law of the land. The President of the United States, a member of the Congress, a judge even of the Supreme Court, and the beggar in the streets are all equally liable to be punished by that judicial power whenever they infringe the penal statutes of the United States.

The President is not excepted from this clause of the Constitution. If he has a case arising under the "Constitution and laws of the United States" he has the same right to have it settled by the judicial power that any other citizen has. The duties of the President with regard to the Constitution are peculiar, and as they differ somewhat from the other departments, a brief notice of them may not be amiss.

The President is required, by the oath he takes, to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution," while all the other departments are only required to support it. He is required by his official oath to do more. His duty is not passive obedience merely, but active, and, if need be, active protection. The Convention of 1787 drew a marked distinction between the oath which they required the President to take and the one they required of any other department of the Government.

They required the Executive to swear to "preserve, protect, and defend," the legislative and judicial to "support and obey" only. Unless he chooses to perjure himself, the President must take all the constitutional means at his command to "preserve, protect, and defend" the Constitution. He has no choice. If he believes that any part of the Constitution is infringed or broken he must take the means the Constitution gives him to repair it. He must take all the constitutional means. He must not take one only if there are several, but he must exhaust all the means that the instrument has placed in his hands to "preserve, protect, and defend." Until he does so his duty is not done, his sacred oath not fulfilled. But the advocates of impeachment say that the only means given to the President to "protect, preserve, and defend" the Constitution is the veto; that when he has used that without avail he has no other constitutional weapon to "preserve, protect, and defend" the Constitution with.

This assumption I utterly deny. By the clause of the Constitution just quoted every citizen has the right, the unquestioned right, to test the constitutionality of an act of Congress before the judicial power of the Government, whether the act was passed by a majority only, by a two thirds, or even a unanimous vote. Because an act of Congress is passed by a two-thirds vote it is not for that reason necessarily constitutional. If this were so then two thirds of Congress are superior to the Constitution. There is nothing to prevent, or which ever has prevented, a private citizen from questioning an act on constitutional grounds which has been passed by a two-thirds vote. The President has certainly as much right to appeal to the courts to test the validity of such an act as a private citizen. He has the same right of resort to the judiciary as any other citizen. The veto power is only one check on unconstitutional legislation which the President alone has and the private citizen has not. But by giving the Executive the veto the framers of the Constitution did not take away from him other rights which he had in common with other citizens. Because he has the veto he is not deprived of the protection of the judiciary.

If the theory of those who say that the President is bound to execute every law of Congress passed by a two-thirds vote is right, then if this Congress should by a two-thirds vote pass a law giving the command of the Army to the Speaker of this House it would be the duty of the President to hand it over to him at once; that all that it would be necessary to do would be to make it a high crime in him not to do it, and you could then impeach him if he did not. If the President has the right to appeal to the courts he certainly has the right to take the steps necessary to bring the case before the court. It would be strange, indeed, if Congress could impose a penalty upon any one who takes the preliminary steps to bring his case before the courts. They cannot say the doors of the Supreme Court are open to you by the Constitution, but we can impose a penalty on you if you seek to enter these doors. And yet this is the very thing that this impeachment amounts to. It is, in fact, a penalty attempted to be imposed on the necessary effort to obtain an undeniable right.

The facts are very brief, and consist only in an order for the removal of the Secretary of War without consent of the Senate. The tenure-of-office act is so drawn that it is impossible to test its constitutionality in any other way. The President must pass an order of removal and make an appointment before the question can be settled judicially. This act was aimed at and intended for the President only. He must go on and execute what he believed to be an unconstitutional law, and, therefore, no law, or bring the matter before the courts of the country. He must do one or the other. The most astute lawyer that ever drew a brief cannot examine the tenure act and say that its constitutionality can be tested in any other way. The President has sworn to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, and not sworn to do everything that two thirds of Congress may require him. If anyone else could have tested the law without the President's passing an order in conflict with its provisions the President would no doubt have left it to the party aggrieved to carry the case into court. But, unlike any other law ever passed, this law affects the Executive only, and no one but the Executive could take the steps necessary to test it. A great deal of clamor has been raised upon the subject of the President's executing the laws until the courts pronounce them void. But this law could never be declared void by the proper authority without the President took steps such as he has taken.

But the advocates of impeachment say that he who does an act forbidden by a penal statute acts at his peril; that if the statute is valid he incurs the penalty, whatever may be his motive. This is true—no man denies or disputes it. It is the very thing the President is ready and willing to do, the risk that he is willing to incur. It is all that he asks, to be allowed to try his case and submit to the penalty if he fails. But that is the very thing that Congress will not allow. The tenure-of-office bill makes a removal without the consent of the Senate punishable by fine or imprisonment upon conviction by the courts. This is the whole penalty imposed by that act. It does not mention the word impeachment; it does not impose any further punishment or penalty except fine or imprisonment. The House proposes to add a new and additional penalty not mentioned in the law. The House seeks, under color of that act, to inflict pains and penalties not imposed by the act itself. Is this just, fair, or legal? By every fair and known rule of construction we must conclude that no other pains and penalties were intended by the framers of the law except those mentioned in the law itself.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

HO. OF REPS.

It was perfectly competent for Congress to have imposed the penalty of impeachment in lieu of fine or imprisonment, or in addition thereto; but they did not do it. They now seek to add it after the act is done. It is a rule without exception in the United States that penal statutes are construed strictly. No sentence is ever imposed not warranted by the plain language of the statute. A common thief would laugh to scorn the idea of imposing upon him any penalty except that mentioned in the statute itself. Constructive penalties are not allowed in any case to be imposed; and yet you do not give the Chief Magistrate of the country the benefit of the rules of law that the common thief claims and always obtains.

But it is said that the Senate, sitting as a court for impeachment, is the highest judicial tribunal known to our country; that it is, in fact, a tribunal superior to the Supreme Court. He who thus asserts has read to little purpose the Constitution of his country. The Senate has the sole power of impeachment; that is all the judicial power it has. It is a jury to sit on official life or death, but nothing more. But the powers of the Supreme Court are much more extensive. They extend to all cases except impeachment, and their decisions are authoritative and binding on all. Their decisions on a question of law is binding on the Senate, while the decisions of the Senate are not binding on them. Take this case as an example: the question of the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office bill will arise in the trial of the President before the Senate. Suppose the Senate were to decide that it was constitutional, would any man out of his horn-book say that when the act is hereafter brought before the Supreme Court to decide upon its constitutionality that the Supreme Court would be bound by that decision? If so, then no act can ever be declared unconstitutional by the court, because by its very passage the Senate expresses its opinion upon the constitutionality of an act. But it is the decision of the court, and not of the body that makes the law, which controls by the express provision of the Constitution.

The Senate may convict and may ground their conviction upon an opinion of the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office act, and the Supreme Court may afterward decide the act void. They may, in fact, settle the question that the President was right, and you are then powerless to repair the wrong you have done. It will be a great wrong to the President, but a greater wrong still to the people who placed him there and whose servant and representative he is.

But the Constitution itself settles, I think, most conclusively the question that the Senate is not of equal dignity and authority with the courts. It says that conviction on impeachment shall not prevent trial or conviction for the same offense by the courts of law; that after a person has been convicted of the high crime on the impeachment trial he may still be convicted by the courts of law of the same crime, and the legal and prescribed penalty inflicted. Now the converse of this proposition must be true. He may be acquitted by the Senate and yet convicted by the courts of law and punished.

Acquittal or conviction by the Senate cannot be held a plea in bar on a trial at law. The Supreme Court would go on and give judgment without any sort of reference to the action of the Senate sitting as a court for impeachment. It [the court] would not be bound in any way by any judgment the Senate might render. How, then, can it be said that the Senate is the highest court? The Senate sitting as a court for the trial of impeachments is nothing but a court of special criminal jurisdiction, nothing more or less. Their duty is to ascertain whether just cause exists for the removal of a public officer. The Constitution has prescribed what that cause must be. It must be the commission of a high crime or misdemeanor.

Intention is the essence of all crime, and cannot, in the nature of things, but be so. There is no moral turpitude involved in the mere act of removal of an office-holder. It cannot be made morally wrong. It must always belong to the class of mala prohibita and not mala in se. The Parliament of England, in the plenitude of its imperial power, once made it penal to bury the dead except in the prescribed burial clothes, or for the living to wear shoes with points over a certain length. But neither the Parliament nor Congress can make such acts morally wrong. The only offense is in the violation of the statute, and the party is liable only to the penalty the statute inflicts.

Now, the intention of the President is as clear as intention ever can be made. It is shown by words and acts. It is shown by his repeated declarations to General Grant as well as to others. It is shown by only passing an order for removal. These all demonstrate beyond a doubt that his sole intention was to test the validity of the tenure-of-office act. For the proper tribunal to determine the question whether it was or was not a law, and for exercising the right secured to him by the Constitution to bring his case into court, you impeach him. In vain the President points to his scrupulous execution of all the laws you have passed, whatever he might think of their constitutionality whenever any one except himself had the right to bring to the test of a judicial decision, and assures you that he only declines to execute this because that is the only possible way that it can be tested, and that he has no idea of refusing to execute it for any other reason. In vain he tells you that the Constitution is his highest law; that he has sworn to "preserve, protect, and defend" it, and in this case he must appeal to the only tribunal competent to instruct him as to what is his duty, and that, and that alone, is all he desires. You answer that is a high misdemeanor, and he is no longer worthy to sit in the presidential chair. The term high crimes and misdemeanors as used in the Constitution means nothing more nor less than aggravated or atrocious crimes and misdemeanors. In your judgment, the mere order of removal of Edwin M. Stanton is a crime so atrocious or aggravated that the punishment imposed by the act which made it a crime is not sufficient. The penalty imposed by the act is not enough, but you add a constructive penalty.

Pretexts for wrong are never wanting. Of all the wrongs those perpetrated under color of legal proceeding are the most abhorrent to those who have known the blessing of law. It is the using a noble means for an unworthy end. The perpetrators of the wrong are in comparative safety. It does not require the courage of the open and avowed wrongdoer. It did not require any courage in Jeffries to murder Lady Alice Lisle with all the forms of law. She was tried with all the forms of law. She, too, was tried for a high crime, convicted, and executed. The judgment, the unanimous judgment, of all succeeding generations has been that her trial was a mockery of justice and law, and a century and a half has not lessened the indignation that the forms of law were made subservient to so great a wrong. This trial will soon pass into history, and every lover of his country regrets that coming ages will pass the same verdict on this case.

Freedmen's Bureau.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE M. ADAMS,
OF KENTUCKY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 17, 1868.

The House having under consideration House bill No. 598, to continue the Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes—

Mr. ADAMS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: As one of the minority of the committee by which the bill under consideration was reported, and in which report I did not, therefore, concur, I desire briefly to offer a few reasons why, in my judgment, this measure should not become a law. As yet I have heard no good reason assigned for its enactment and no argument advanced in its support. The honorable chairman of the committee [Mr. ELLIOT] has not yet, I believe, presented to the House (as I understand he contemplates doing) a written report of the reasons and considerations which induced the committee to recommend to the House the passage of this bill; and in regard to his remarks in the House a few days since upon this subject I must say, with all due respect for that gentleman, that they seemed to me to be a denunciation of the President of the United States and a tirade of abuse against the Democratic party rather than a speech in support of his bill or an argument in favor of its passage.

This bill proposes to reenact and continue in existence the measures heretofore enacted for the relief of refugees and freedmen, together with such amendments and modifications as are herein contained. What, then, is the character of the measures heretofore passed and thus proposed to be reenacted, and what the nature of the amendments and modifications now proposed by this bill?

The first of these measures was passed March 3, 1865, and provides for the creation of a new bureau in the War Department, to be termed the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, to be continued for one year after the close of the war, to which shall be committed, in the language of the bill itself—

"The supervision and management of all abandoned lands, and the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States, or from any district of country within the territory embraced in the operations of the Army under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the head of the bureau and approved by the President."

The bill goes on and provides for the appointment and pay of a commissioner, assistant commissioners, and other officers who are charged with the execution of the law. The Secretary of War is authorized to make such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel as he may deem necessary for the relief and support of destitute refugees and freedmen. The abandoned lands, as they are termed, are to be set apart for the use of the freedmen and refugees, each one of whom is to be allowed to rent forty acres thereof, and be protected in the use and enjoyment of the same for the term of three years, and then, if he choose, to purchase the same from the United States. Thus, Mr. Speaker, this bureau is authorized to take possession of and exercise ownership over land to which the United States has no title and to which it has never professed to make any claim; to rent, and ultimately to sell, the same in utter disregard of the rights of the legitimate owner who may happen to be temporarily absent therefrom. It is also to exercise exclusive control over all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen. And this control is to be exercised how, to what extent, in what manner, and under what limitations? Not in such manner as may be prescribed by a constitutionally enacted law, but in such manner and to such extent as the chief of this bureau may dictate, in the language of the bill itself:

"Under such rules and regulations as may be pro-

HO. OF REPS.

Freedmen's Bureau—Mr. Adams.

scribed by the head of the bureau and approved by the President."

And finally, the Secretary of War is authorized, as before remarked, to issue, not a definite or limited supply of stores for the support of the refugees and freedmen, but without limit, and in his own discretion, regardless of cost to the Government, to issue such supplies as he may see proper to appropriate to these purposes.

Such, sir, are the provisions of the act of March 8, 1865, which created the bureau, and which we were then told was to be a temporary measure, intended to continue during the war and for one year thereafter, and which would, therefore, have long since expired by limitation but for the act of July 16, 1866, which provided for its reenactment and continuation for the term of two years thereafter, with certain amendments and modifications therein contained, which increase and enlarge the powers of the bureau, and still further encroach upon the rights and liberties of the people. The Secretary of War, in addition to the issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel, provided for in the act of March 8, 1865, is also authorized to issue such medical stores, transportation, and other aid as he may deem necessary for the relief of refugees and freedmen.

Section fourteen, to which I wish more particularly to call attention, provides that in the rebel States, as they are called—

"The right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings concerning personal liberty, personal security, and the acquisition, enjoyment, and disposition of estate, real and personal, including the constitutional right to bear arms, shall be secured to and enjoyed by all the citizens of such State or district without respect to race or color or previous condition of slavery."

Again, it goes on to say:

"And no penalty or punishment for any violation of law shall be imposed or permitted because of race or color or previous condition of slavery other or greater than the penalty or punishment to which white persons may be liable by law for the like offense."

Here Congress undertakes to confer upon the negro population of these States all the civil rights and immunities that are enjoyed by white persons, and declares that they shall be subjected to no punishment other than that to which white men are subjected for the commission of like offenses.

If Congress has the right to determine who shall testify in the courts, to say what shall be the nature and extent of punishments to be imposed for the commission of offenses against the State laws, and to determine who shall make and enforce contracts, and, consequently, who may marry and intermarry—for marriage is in law nothing but a contract—then why may it not also determine who shall vote and hold office in the different States, and what questions have the States the right to determine for themselves?

Now, sir, in the State of Kentucky, which I have the honor in part to represent, we think that the good of society and the welfare of the country require that there should be some limitations to both the civil and political rights of these colored persons whom we sometimes call negroes, but whom I ought not, perhaps, here to characterize by such an objectionable term, as it would doubtless sound harshly upon the ears of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

But, sir, I shall not stop here to inquire whether it is best that all these rights should be conferred upon the colored people, for I maintain that, whether best or not, these are all local questions, over which Congress has no control and which are to be regulated by the people of each State respectively, to whom is left by the Constitution the right to control their own domestic institutions in their own way.

How is it provided that these rights thus attempted to be conferred shall be protected and enforced? Not through the agency of the civil courts and legal tribunals, by which alone the rights and liberties of any class of people can be secured, but through the instrumentality of military orders and the bureau courts. On this subject the act goes on to declare that—

"The President shall, through the Commissioner and the officers of the bureau, and under such rules and regulations as the President, through the Secretary of War, shall prescribe, extend military protection and have military jurisdiction over all cases and questions concerning the free enjoyment of such immunities and rights."

But the enlarged powers and increased jurisdiction conferred by this section of the law were to extend to and be exercised only in the States that had been engaged in the rebellion, and in which it was claimed there were no civil governments, and were to cease as soon as such States should be restored to their constitutional relations in the Union. It was not then claimed, or pretended to be claimed, that Congress could interfere with or exercise any control whatever over the internal affairs and local institutions of States which had not been thus deranged and disorganized. It is now, however, proposed to reestablish this bureau in all the States where it has been wholly or in part withdrawn, and to continue its operations and extraordinary powers in the States from which it has not thus been withdrawn, provided the Secretary of War may think necessary to do so.

It is proposed not certainly to reestablish and continue it in certain States for a definite term, but to let the Secretary of War say when and where it shall be reestablished and continued. In other words, not to enact a definite and fixed law, because it is known the public good requires it, but to leave it discretionary with the Secretary of War to determine whether it shall or shall not be a law so far as certain States are concerned.

Mr. Speaker, if this measure is thus to be enacted, if this systematized anarchy is to be thus inaugurated in this country, and the rights and liberties of the people are no longer to be regulated and protected by fixed laws, but left to the whims and caprice of any one man who may happen to be Secretary of War, then I for one can only pray that some more just, upright, and liberal-minded man may occupy that position than the one who now claims to be the incumbent of that office and has possession of its records.

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, alluded to some of the leading features of the laws establishing and continuing this bureau, which, in my opinion, are subversive of the ends for which all good Governments are established. Governments are not formed, sir, for the purpose of preying upon the property and overriding the rights of their citizens, and more especially is this the case with our free Government, the preamble to which declares:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

And yet, sir, in the face of this declaration, the lands of private citizens are taken possession of in the name of the Government by this bureau, to which the United States never held the shadow of a title, and the President of the United States, for restoring the possession of these lands to their legitimate owners, and for thus refusing to become a party to this wholesale robbery, is denounced in these Halls as an unworthy and unfaithful Executive.

But, sir, we are told that these lands were the property of rebels, and that they have therefore been forfeited and confiscated, and all that. These lands are confiscated; how, sir; under what law; by the judgment of what court? Before a man's property can be confiscated he must have violated some law previously passed providing such penalty, and must have been pronounced guilty by the judgment of some tribunal competent to try the case. Under what law, then, were these lands confiscated? There was, I believe, a confiscation law passed in 1862, but if it apply to these lands, then, I ask, by what tribunal, under the judgment of what court, have they been declared forfeited? By what tribunal have the parties owning them been pronounced guilty of a crime which works forfeiture or confiscation? By no tribunal, sir, unless it be by the edict of a petty agent or the mandate of an assistant commissioner.

I desire here to remark that while I am utterly opposed to this bureau and all its operations I have no warfare to make against its chief, General Howard; indeed, from all I have ever seen or heard of General Howard, I have reason to believe him a most estimable gentleman and a good officer, against whom or whose administration of the affairs of the bureau I have no cause of complaint; but, sir, against the bureau itself and its alarming powers I do complain, and in the name of my people here protest against its continuation.

The laws establishing and continuing this bureau are, in my opinion, and as I shall attempt to show, not only unauthorized by the Constitution, but in open violation of its plainest provisions. What right has this Government to take possession of and appropriate to public use the property of its citizens without just compensation therefor? Where in the Constitution do you find authority to feed, clothe, educate, and support one class of people to the exclusion of all others equally as destitute and much more deserving? What clause of the Constitution confers upon Congress the right to regulate the internal affairs and local institutions of the States as is provided by this and the previous bills, which confer upon the officers and agents of the bureau these extraordinary powers? Where, from the beginning to the end of that instrument, does Congress get the right to authorize the trial, conviction, and punishment of civilians by military courts?

We look in vain to the Constitution for authority to Congress to exercise these alarming powers. This being so, I might here close my argument, and in the absence of such a grant of authority by the Constitution confidently appeal to the House not to reenact these measures; for it must be borne in mind that Congress has not the inherent and unlimited right to do whatsoever it may choose; on the contrary, it possesses only the delegated powers conferred upon it by the people in the formation of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, sir, in the formation of that Constitution which gave existence to the Congress certain powers theretofore passed by the people of the several States were conferred upon it. And Congress being simply the creature of the Constitution thus formed by the people possesses such powers, and such only, as are there granted to and conferred upon it, the remaining powers not thus granted to Congress nor prohibited to the States being, of course, reserved to the people of the States. This, sir, is manifest from the very nature of the case; but, sir, lest in coming time Congress should attempt to exercise powers not granted, an amendment was added to that instrument which declares that—

Hence, in determining the powers of Congress, we look to the Constitution to see whether the authority in question is by express terms or necessary implication conferred, and if not, then there can be no such authority.

But, sir, the officers and agents of this bureau are exercising, in pursuance of these congressional enactments, not only powers not conferred by the Constitution, but also those which are in direct conflict with its provisions.

40TH CONG...2D SESS.

Freedmen's Bureau—Mr. Adams.

HO. OF REPS.

In General Howard's report for 1866, page 15, I find, among other things, the following regulations for carrying out these congressional enactments:

"I. Bureau courts shall be composed of three members, to be appointed by the assistant commissioner, subject to the approval of the Commissioner, one of whom shall be an officer or agent of this bureau, and the other two citizens of the county in which the court is organized.

"II. Bureau courts shall have jurisdiction of cases relating to compensation for labor of refugees or freedmen, and may hear and determine other civil cases between refugees, freedmen, and others not involving more than the sum of $300; they may also try offenses committed by or against freedmen, provided the punishment imposed shall not exceed a fine of $100 or imprisonment at hard labor for thirty days. The judgment of these courts may be enforced by military authority, and shall not be obstructed by the stay law of any State."

Thus authorizing these bureau courts, composed of three persons, to determine questions of property where the amount does not exceed three hundred dollars, and to inflict punishment not exceeding a fine of one hundred dollars or imprisonment for thirty days. The Constitution of the United States declares that—

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed."

And in another article it says that no person "shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." And again it declares:

"ART. 7. In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law."

But, in utter disregard of these provisions, citizens are deprived of their property without legal proceeding, and are tried and sentenced to imprisonment, not by a jury of their peers, but by the judgment of a bureau court, consisting of an irresponsible agent and two other men, who are to compose the court.

But, sir, it is, perhaps, idle for me to quote here the Constitution of the United States, which has been characterized by persons of the same political school with the gentleman from Massachusetts as a "league with death and a covenant with hell," and outside of which prominent members of the Republican party of this House declare they are acting in all their legislation respecting the rebel States.

I beg, however, to read from another document, which, I am sure, the Republican side of the House will recognize as entitled to their consideration. One of the resolutions of the platform of the Republican party upon which Mr. Lincoln was first elected, and by which the party were pledged to stand, reads as follows:

"That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its domestic institutions, according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends; and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

Now, sir, when the officers and agents of this bureau are sent into States, with a military force to protect them, and instructed to take possession of the lands of the people, and to override their civil laws, what is it but "a lawless invasion by armed force of the soil" of such State, which was then declared by the Republican party to be "among the gravest of crimes?"

Sir, I indorse to-day the doctrine then promulgated by the Republican party in this resolution; and I hope I may be pardoned for saying that I regard the operations of this bureau as nothing less than an armed invasion of the States, and, in the language of the Republican party, "as among the gravest of crimes."

But, Mr. Speaker, even if Congress had the clear and unquestioned right to pass such laws, I deny that there was ever any necessity for the establishment of this bureau, and especially do I deny that there is any necessity for its continuation at this time. The avowed object for which the bureau was established, and for which it is proposed to be continued, is twofold: first, to protect the freedman in the enjoyment of certain rights; and second, to afford them relief and assistance. Now, sir, there can be no possible necessity for the continuation of this bureau for the purpose of protecting them in any right. The civil rights bill, passed March 9, 1866, provides abundantly for that. The first section provides:

"Be it enacted, &c., That all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States; and such citizens, of every race and color, shall have the same right in every State and Territory in the United States, to make and enforce contracts; to sue, be parties, and give evidence; to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property; and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

And, lest the local tribunals in the States should deny some of the rights thus conferred, the act goes on to provide that any person who shall refuse to recognize these rights and enforce this law shall be fined $1,000, or imprisoned one year, or both; and as a further means of securing these rights the United States circuit and district courts are opened to the freedmen and given original jurisdiction over all cases affecting persons who are denied these rights in the State courts; and, still further to provide facilities for securing these rights to the most obscure person in the most remote part of the country, the act provides for the appointment of additional commissioners to assist in its execution. On this point it says:

"And with a view to affording reasonable protection to all persons in their constitutional rights of equality before the law, without distinction of race or color, it shall be the duty of the circuit courts of the United States and the superior courts of the Territories of the United States, from time to time, to increase the number of commissioners, so as to afford a speedy and convenient means for the arrest and examination of persons charged with a violation of this act."

Thus, Mr. Speaker, this civil rights bill confers or attempts to confer upon the freedmen all the rights proposed to be conferred by the bill under consideration; and provides the means by which the humblest freedman can avail himself of its benefits.

But, sir, in addition to this, another act was passed March 2, 1867, establishing military governments in ten States of this Union, the professed object of which was to punish crime and protect all persons in their rights.

I beg to read some of the provisions of this bill:

"Whereas, no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now exist in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas:

"SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President to assign to the command of each of said districts an officer of the Army not below the rank of brigadier general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district to which he is assigned.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property: to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished all disturbers of the public peace and criminals; and to this end he may allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of him and to try offenders; or when, in his judgment, it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose, and all interference under color of State authority, with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be null and void."

Thus, sir, military dictators, with an army sufficient to enable them to enforce their orders, are sent into these States, and there, uncontrolled by any law, are directed to exercise absolute and unlimited control over the lives, liberties, and fortunes of the people of one entire section of this Union, and all this under pretense of protecting the rights of the people. And now, Mr. Speaker, after the passage of both these arbitrary and unconstitutional laws, each of which stands unrepealed and in full force, both protecting the freedmen, one by the civil and the other by the military arm of the Government, we are to-day urged to pass yet another law for the protection of the freedmen. If it be claimed, under these circumstances, that another law should be passed for this purpose, then it must be admitted that the military governments in the southern States, the support of which has already cost so many millions of the people's money, are a failure and should, therefore, be abolished.

As to the propriety of continuing this bureau for the purpose of affording relief to the destitute freedmen, I hold that this country, under its present financial embarrassments, is not able to continue in existence a bureau for the support and maintenance of any class of its people, and more especially for the support and education, as proposed by the bill, of this class of roving vagabonds called freedmen, whose only idea of freedom is that it confers upon them the right to be idle, and whose destitution is the result of their own indolence.

Sir, the country is to-day groaning under the weight of a public debt, the amount of which can hardly be estimated, and the people are harassed with the burdens of taxation to such an extent that they cry for relief from every section of the whole country, and at this time, laboring as we are under such financial embarrassments, it is proposed to continue a bureau which has already cost the Government immense sums of money.

And here, sir, while alluding to the cost of this bureau, I desire to notice some statements made by the gentleman from Massachusetts in his remarks upon this subject a few days since.

In alluding to a remark made by the President of the United States in the latter part of the summer of 1866, and repeated on several occasions, to the effect that this bureau had then cost the Government $12,000,000, the gentleman from Massachusetts used some extraordinary language, which I was surprised to hear fall from the lips of that gentleman, who is ordinary so polite and courteous toward others. He indulges in the following intemperate, and I may add, unjust remarks:

"It is difficult to characterize, in fit phrase, without transcending far beyond the line of courteous debate, these statements which I have read, made officially by the President of the United States; first, in his veto; second, in the speech to the delegates at Philadelphia; and again in the course of his journey through the West. And yet these statements have been taken up by gentlemen who have affiliated politically with the President in this House, on the stump, through the country, in the South, in the North, and in the West, everywhere, as though in very truth they rested upon the authority of one who ought to be credited."

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect for the gentleman, I assert here on this floor that the statement then made by the President was true, notwithstanding the assertion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the contrary. I do not say this amount of money had been appropriated to the bureau out of the Treasury, but I do say that the money and the property which had at that time gone into the possession of the bureau from various sources amounted to something near twelve million dollars, as stated by the President.

And again, in answer to certain interrogatories put by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. EDWARDS,] he says: "every ration that has been given out under the administration of the bureau has been charged, so far as I know." Now, sir, if the gentleman had investigated this subject as carefully as he might have done, he would have found that not only rations, but also immense supplies of medical stores and quartermaster's stores, including transportation, have been issued under the direction of this bureau, which have never been accounted for or paid out of the funds of the bureau.

The fact is, sir, as General Howard himself admits, that from the organization of the bureau down to the 1st of July, 1866, none of the commissary, medical, or quartermaster's stores, including transportation, issued under the direction of the bureau, were ever charged to or accounted for out of the funds of the bureau.

HO. OF REPS.

Pacific Railroad Freight Tariff—Mr. Washburn.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

I do not, however, charge the gentleman with any intentional misrepresentation of the facts, and shall not, therefore, indulge in any unbecoming remarks such as were employed by that gentleman in reference to what he supposed to be an incorrect statement of the President, but shall content myself with supposing that it was only a mistake on his part, which can be accounted for in a more charitable way than by charging an intention to mislead the House.

The gentleman from Massachusetts told the House, in the course of his remarks, that the whole amount of money appropriated to this bureau out of the Treasury, from its origin down to this time, was $10,780,750, which is very nearly correct, the true amount being $10,820,750. But, sir, in order to determine the cost of this bureau we must not look merely to the appropriations of money from the Treasury; for to these must be added the large sums of money and the immense amount of property, which, from various sources, have found their way into this vortex of abominations, beneath whose depths have been buried so much of the treasures and so large a share of the liberties of the people of this country.

I have endeavored to ascertain from the reports of the Commissioner the cost of maintaining this bureau, the result of which I shall state in a moment. In the first place, I may remark that the accounts of the bureau have been kept in such a manner that it is very difficult to determine from them the cost connected with its operations. I have, however, made an estimate, which, I think, approximates the true amount. It is as follows:

Total money received from all sources.....	$13,434,771 82
Deduct amount held as retained bounties.....	$115,236 49
Deduct pay, bounty, and prize money collected for freedmen.....	882,586 06
Voluntary contributions.....	1,000 00
	908,832 55

Leaves public funds chargeable to bureau.....	$12,435,939 27
---	-----------------

To this must be added the pay of officers of the Army on duty in the bureau and not paid out of its funds, estimated at $1,500,000. Also, the money value of commissary, medical, and quartermaster's stores, including transportation furnished prior to July 1, 1866, and never paid for out of the funds of the bureau, $2,541,180 64, making an aggregate of $16,477,069 91.

And to this, perhaps, ought to be added the immense amount required to feed, clothe, and pay the army which is sent along with the officers and agents of this bureau to assist in its operations; for this I regard as an expenditure legitimately chargeable to the bureau; which, if added, might run the expenditures of this bureau up to $50,000,000, and, perhaps, to $100,000,000.

How long, sir, will a tax-burdened people consent that their hard earnings shall be thus taken and appropriated to the support of a bureau by which the negroes of this country are to be fed, clothed, educated, doctored, and transported to wherever they may choose to go.

If this Government feels able thus to care for any class of its people, I ask, in God's name, that the wives and children of those who have died in defense of their country may first be provided for. Let this Government, which their fathers and husbands died to defend, first provide for the support and education of this class of persons before it undertakes thus to support in idleness these roving vagrants called freedmen.

Mr. KELLEY rose.

Mr. ADAMS. I have already given notice that I decline to be interrupted.

Sir, the soldiers of this country have been appealing from time to time to Congress to grant them a bounty of $100 for each twelve months of honorable service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. ADAMS. As the gentleman from Massachusetts had his time extended, and as I am hardly through with my remarks, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes longer.

The SPEAKER. It is not usual to extend the morning hour, but it was extended on this same bill for the gentleman from Massachusetts. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. ADAMS. About fifteen minutes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ADAMS. I was about remarking, sir, that Congress has persistently refused to give to the soldier a bounty of $100 for each year of honorable service, for the reason that the Government, under its present financial embarrassments, could not afford to do so.

Now, sir, I say if the Government can afford to establish and continue a bureau for the support and education of negroes, who have no claims upon the gratitude of the country, then it can and ought to give to the soldier these bounties which he has so dearly earned upon the battle-field, and which he so richly deserves at the hands of the Government which he fought to defend.

Mr. Speaker, this bureau has now been in operation for three years, and is now proposed to be continued one year longer, and at the end of that time we will doubtless be asked still further to prolong its existence. While we continue to feed and clothe these negroes they will remain a destitute and dependent people. If the letters which the gentleman from Massachusetts read to the House from officers and agents in different sections, urging the continuation of the bureau, are to be relied upon, the negroes are still as helpless and dependent as they were at the close of the war, and it is upon the ground of their ignorance and dependence that the continuation of the bureau is urged. Sir, when the reconstruction measures, as they are called, were passed the freedmen were not certainly regarded or treated as an ignorant and dependent people. They had, by these enactments, the whole civil and political control of ten States of this Union intrusted to their care. They were then considered not an ignorant, benighted, and dependent people, but, by solemn enactment, were declared to be sufficiently enlightened and intelligent to make constitutions, enact laws, and establish governments; not only able to take care of themselves, but to take care of the white people also.

Mr. Speaker, among the letters presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts to the House, urging reasons for the continuation of the bureau, is one from a certain Hiram Willis, who seems to be an agent of the bureau in the State of Arkansas. I beg to read to the House one of the reasons urged by this gentleman for the continuation of this bureau. He says:

"3. The bureau should be continued one year longer to act as a sort of moderator between white and black during the exciting contest now impending over the whole country. It can thus assist wonderfully in reconstructing the South on a loyal basis. To continue the bureau one year more than is provided will cover most all the exciting political issues about to be made in the election for President, and this is of no little importance to the whole country."

Thus, sir, one of the reasons assigned for continuing the bureau by this correspondent, and which the gentleman from Massachusetts adopts as his own by incorporating it into his speech in support of the bill, is the political influence it is to wield in the coming presidential election, which he announces is of the utmost importance.

And the gentleman from Massachusetts classes his speech in support of the bill to continue this bureau with the following significant declaration:

"We propose to attack; to attack here in the House, at home, upon the stump, by speech and by voice, by vote, and by press everywhere, to attack this slave power, beaten in the field, but hopeful yet, by cunning counsel and political stratagem to undo the work our armies have accomplished."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the object of this bill be protection to the freedmen I cannot see the necessity or propriety of its passage, the rights of the freedmen being abundantly protected by other laws, as I have already endeavored to show. But, sir, if the object be to organize an army of office-holders, and by the patronage and intimidations of this bureau to control the political destinies of this country, then I admit that the bill under consideration is eminently adapted to the accomplishment of that end.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Massachusetts intends to organize this bureau into an engine of political warfare, and intends thus to attack the Democratic party, which he is pleased to call the slave-power, I say to him that when he does it he attacks the Constitution of the United States, which he is sworn to support and uphold. When he does it he attacks the rights and liberties of the people which he is sent here to protect and defend. When he does it, sir, he does what he and his whole party declared in 1860 to be among the gravest of crimes.

Pacific Railroad Freight Tariff.

SPEECH OF HON. C. C. WASHBURN,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 20, 1868.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) to regulate tariff for freight and passengers on the Union and Pacific railroads and their branches—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask that the consideration of the joint resolution now on the Speaker's table providing for a board of commissioners to fix a tariff for freight and passengers over the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads and their branches, be considered now; and I desire to offer some reasons why it should be passed.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read the joint resolution. It proposes to constitute the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney General of the United States a board of commissioners, whose duty it shall be on the 1st day of July in each year to establish a tariff for freight and passengers over the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads and their branches, which tariff shall be equitable and just and not exceeding double the average rates charged on the different lines of railroad between the Mississippi river and the Atlantic ocean in latitudes north of St. Louis, Missouri, and that it shall not be lawful for said railroad companies to charge any sum in excess of the rates so fixed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, at a very early day in the session I introduced a bill and had it referred to the Pacific Railroad Committee providing for a commission, consisting of the Secretary of War, Secretary of the Interior, and Attorney General, whose duty it should be on the 1st of July in each year to revise the tariff of rates for transportation over the Pacific railroads. Waiting for a long time for some action from that committee, and becoming satisfied that there would be great delay and perhaps the bill would "sleep the sleep that knows no waking," I endeavored to arrive at the same result by the means of a joint resolution. But, sir, the House refused to second the previous question, and this resolution, which was introduced by my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] at my request, as he at the time had the floor, went upon the Calendar, and when it came up in regular order for consideration the other day a motion to lay it on the table failed, and for want of time to consider it it went to the Speaker's table.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman yield one moment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Not now.

Mr. PRICE. I would like to correct the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I state nothing but what is correct. The gentleman from Iowa I have spoken with several times, and I have understood from him that the committee had had the matter under consideration, and I think that he is in favor of the measure, but that a majority of the committee have no intention of reporting that bill.

Mr. PRICE. That is a mistake.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I am glad to know that it is a mistake, and that the committee intend to report a bill so necessary and just as this. That this proposition should meet with any opposition here is most astonishing, not to say alarming. I must believe that the measure is not understood, and that members do not understand the necessity for it. As I intend to press it or some kindred measure at every opportunity until it becomes a law, I claim the attention of the House for a short time while I state some of the many reasons why we should act at this time.

No one sees more clearly than I do that the Pacific railroad is a work of necessity or will go further than I to hasten it to a completion, due regard to the protection of the rights of the people being had. So far as I know any of the parties connected with these roads I entertain for them the most friendly feelings. I have no private griefs to avenge or personal wrongs to complain of, but I am speaking, as in duty bound, in the interests of the people, who have no lobby to work for them.

The Pacific railroad is the greatest enterprise of modern times. The completion of it is an object of universal desire among the American people. So great is the public anxiety for the road that our people have been willing to shut their eyes to every consideration in regard to it, and to give absolute control to the parties engaged in its management, regardless of all future consequences. It is a characteristic of our people that when they want a thing they will have it, cost what it may, but often, when too late, have cause to regret their own short-sightedness and lament their extravagance and folly. If they want a railroad they are always ready to yield a willing ear to the voice of the railroad syren, who whispers them to loan the credit of their counties, towns, cities, or farms to aid an enterprise which promises to make all rich, but often results in repudiation, bankruptcy, and ruin.

No great work has ever been started in this country in which the great public has so vast an interest as in the Pacific railroad. It is a work in which over sixty million dollars of the people's money is to be invested, a work in which the prosperity and growth of the country are involved, a thoroughfare that is to furnish transit for the commerce of Asia and the Pacific coast, a corporation exceeding in power and magnitude any upon earth, and one that will hold hereafter, if not checked, the destinies of this country in its hands. Yet, sir, notwithstanding this, I will undertake to say that outside of the parties interested as stockholders or employees there are not ten men in the United States who understand the history of these different Pacific railroads, how they have been brought into existence and prosecuted up to the present time. This Congress ought to understand the question and the public ought to understand it; and if then they see fit to sacrifice posterity for all coming time to the grinding control of a giant monopoly they can do so. I propose to relieve myself of any responsibility if Congress does not at once interfere, for it is not difficult to see that if we allow matters to progress as they have done until these roads are completed and they have $100,000,000 of our money in their hands they will successfully defy any legislation that may ever be attempted here.

The first bill enacted into a law in regard to building a Pacific railroad was passed July 1, 1862. It contemplated an organization composed of men from all quarters of the country, and that the stock should be distributed in an equitable manner to the different parts of the country. The names of the corporators were one hundred and fifty-eight in number, taken from all parts of the country. The main features of the act were: first, to incorporate the persons named, with five commissioners to be named by the Secretary of the Interior, under the name and style of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, who were authorized to build and maintain a railroad from the one hundredth meridian to the western boundary of Nevada Territory. The capital stock named was $100,000,000, divided into shares of $1,000 each, not more than two hundred shares to be held by any one person. Bonds were to be opened, and as soon as two thousand shares or two per cent. of the stock was taken up, and ten dollars a share or one per cent. on a dollar paid in, then the president and secretary of the board of commissioners were to appoint a time for the first meeting of the subscribers to the stock, who should meet and elect officers for the corporation, and vast powers were given to the corporation thus constituted; right of way was granted through all the public domain, with all necessary grounds for stations, buildings, workshops, side tracks, &c., and alternate sections of land for ten miles on each side of the road. There was also granted in aid of the road United States bonds at the rate of $16,000 per mile for about five hundred and fifty miles, $48,000 per mile for three hundred miles, to include the sections crossing the Rocky mountains and Sierra Nevada, and $32,000 per mile for about eight hundred and fifty miles included between the two ranges named. These bonds were declared to be a first mortgage upon the road, and the grant was made on the express condition that they should be paid at maturity, and all compensation for services rendered to the Government was to be applied to pay the principal and interest on said bonds, and five per cent. of the net earnings of the road was to be reserved and applied to the payment of said bonds.

In section nine of the same act the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company of Kansas, a corporation under the laws of Kansas, was authorized to build its road from the mouth of Kansas river to connect with the Union Pacific at the one hundredth parallel; and the Central Pacific railroad, a company chartered by the State of California, was authorized to build its road to the eastern border of said State, and both said last-named roads were granted the same aid by the Government as to the Union Pacific.

By section thirteen of said act there was also granted to the Hannibal and St. Joseph road a subsidy from the Government of $16,000 for one hundred miles, and that road was authorized to connect with the Union Pacific, eastern division. That road has obtained its subsidy for one hundred miles, and is now clamoring for more.

By section fourteen the Union Pacific Railroad Company was also authorized to build from the west boundary of Iowa to the one hundredth parallel, and was authorized and required to build a road from Sioux City to connect with the Union Pacific road on the "nearest and most practicable route," and the same subsidy was granted.

And now, right at this point, though it may break the continuity of my statement of the legislation had upon the subject, I desire to call attention to the manner in which this Sioux City road has been built, and to the utter violation of the letter and spirit of the act of Congress. I state it as a matter of history that this Sioux City branch road was incorporated in the first Pacific railroad bill, at the instance and demand of the members from Minnesota, and that but for that the bill would have had their opposition instead of support. The reason for this will be obvious when you look at the map I now have before me.

It is here discovered that from a given point on the Pacific railroad, less than one hundred miles west of Sioux City, it is one hundred miles nearer to the head of Lake Superior than to the city of Chicago. The importance, therefore, of that provision to the people of Minnesota and to the people of Superior City, in my district, must be apparent to every gentleman, because the proposed road would bring Superior City one hundred miles nearer to the Pacific than Chicago, and would place the State of Minnesota and the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis on the shortest Pacific highway. I wish to call the attention of members of the House to what has been done in that matter. The object of the members from Minnesota I think I have made perfectly apparent. But, instead of building the road which was contemplated by the original law and as good faith required, and where the law declared it should be built, namely, in a direct line from Sioux City to the Pacific railroad, on the "nearest and most practicable route," so as to have a short and direct line to Lake Superior, what have they done? What have they obtained from this Government? Instead of building the road so as to bring Superior City one hundred miles nearer than the city of Chicago to the Pacific ocean they have built the road from Sioux City down the valley of the Missouri river, upon the dead level bottoms of that stream, and have obtained a subsidy of $16,000 a mile and a grant of lands at the rate of twelve thousand eight hundred acres per mile, provided there was unappropriated land to that extent, and have built seventy-two miles of that road within the State of Iowa; and I assert here that for sixty-eight miles of that distance every mile after they leave Sioux City takes them further from the Pacific coast than they were at the end of the preceding mile. I assert that at the end of sixty-eight miles from Sioux City they are twenty miles further from the Pacific ocean than they were at the point whence they started, and that after traversing one hundred miles from Sioux City and joining with the Pacific road they are but six miles nearer the Pacific than the point of departure. If gentlemen will look at the map they will see the correctness of that statement.

After running in a southeasterly direction for sixty-eight miles from Sioux City the road turns westward and crosses the Missouri river some thirty odd miles above the city of Omaha, so that that city, which, like Jonah's gourd, springing up in a night through the impetus given by this road, is destined by the same cause that created it to hasten to swift decay, as it will be left upon a side track about thirty miles removed from the direct line to the Pacific, and thus that till now flourishing city, which had made great gifts to this company, is to be sacrificed by a soulless corporation without regret or remorse.

Mr. DODGE. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] acquainted with the country west of the Missouri river, and does he undertake to say that a line of road from Sioux City west of the river is as practicable as the one already built?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I am not acquainted with the country west of Sioux City. But any gentleman must see and know that Congress never could have contemplated the building of any other road than the one in a direct line leading toward the Pacific; it never contemplated giving $16,000 a mile for a road in Iowa running southeast down the valley of the Missouri river upon a dead level plain. And it certainly never contemplated the building of sixty-eight miles of the road in Iowa to carry it twenty miles further from the Pacific ocean than where it started from.

HO. OF REPS.

Pacific Railroad Freight Tariff—Mr. Washburn.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Mr. PRICE. Has the Government given one dollar more of subsidy to the road on that route than it would have been obliged to give had the road been built on the other route?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; but suppose it had not, that would not help you any; because, had you built one hundred miles of road west, you would have joined the Pacific road forty-five miles further west than you now do. This Sioux City Railroad Company is practically a private company, and is no more a Pacific railroad than the Illinois Central; and what business had the Secretary of the Treasury to appropriate to this company $16,000 a mile within the limits of Iowa, on the pretense of building a Pacific railroad, when, as I have asserted, after building sixty-eight miles, they are twenty-four miles further from the Pacific ocean than when they started? Thus the Government has paid, or will pay, a subsidy of $1,200,000 to build a private road in the State of Iowa which is in no sense a Pacific railroad.

I am not familiar with this country. I have never lived in Nebraska; I never set foot in that State; but I say that the Congress never could have contemplated such a grant as has been conceded to these parties by somebody; I do not know who. I see the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. TAFÉ] sitting near me. I do not know how long he has lived in Nebraska, but I presume he has lived there long enough to be somewhat familiar with the nature of the country there. I will ask him to state to the House whether it is practicable to build a road from Sioux City on anything like a direct line to connect with the Pacific railroad?

Mr. TAFÉ. I have lived in Nebraska for about twelve years, and have a general acquaintance with the country through which such a road would have passed. I have lived opposite Sioux City for about seven years. Of course I do not propose, by mere assertion, to contradict professional statements of fact made by engineers; but, from my general knowledge of the country, I have no hesitancy in saying that there is a practicable route for a railroad from Sioux City to Columbus, and a good route; and this I say in opposition to any published report of any engineer who professes to have examined this route.

And let me state further: the engineer's report, which I have seen and read, and which I believe was made to a party who has an interest in that road, states that the engineer has examined every ravine and creek from Sioux City down to the Omaha reservation; and then it goes on to make some general statements about the character of the country. Now, so far as that is concerned, I will say that there is not a ravine and only one creek between Sioux City and the Omaha reservation. I state that from a personal knowledge of the country, acquired by a seven years' residence there.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I state from information from reliable gentlemen who have resided for years between Sioux City and Columbus, Nebraska, that the route for a railroad between these points is an excellent one, and entirely practicable to the point of intersection with the main Pacific railroad at Columbus or any point east of it. I have no doubt it was for the interest of these parties to build a road down the valley of the Missouri river, over dead level ground, and obtain a subsidy of $16,000 per mile, together with a grant of land, so as to enable them to intersect with another road of theirs running west from Cedar Rapids; but, sir, it is a violation of law and a fraud upon the people of the United States. I do not call attention to this with the expectation of remedying anything that has already been done. Our land is gone and money spent, and there is no help for it. The Secretary of the Treasury issues to a railroad company, in no sense a Pacific railroad company, $1,600,000 in Government bonds, in direct and positive violation of the law. The Secretary of the Interior certifies to the same company a vast body of land, equally without law, and the people are, I fear, without remedy. If they may issue $1,600,000 without law, why not $100,000,000? I advert to the matter now for the purpose of urging upon Congress, in the future, when disposing of various railroad schemes (for such in great numbers and in great power are afoot, and some already before Congress) to be more guarded. It is safe to say that $125,000,000 in additional bonds will not satisfy present demands. The fact is, you can never satisfy these railroad lobbyists. Their cry is still "give, give." The more you give the more they demand. Increase of appetite grows by what it feeds upon.

In speaking of this Sioux City outrage I have been a long way diverted from the main line of what I intended to say, but before leaving it I wish to call attention to what seems to me another outrage of a kindred nature to this. I now allude to a misallied Pacific railroad in California, running from Sacramento City, via Stockton, to San José, a road one hundred and twenty miles in length, starting from the navigable waters of the Sacramento river, and running upon a very indirect route, not to San Francisco, but to a point not on the Pacific or the navigable waters connecting with the Pacific, but the inland town of San José.

Now, let us see under what law this road, called the Western Pacific railroad, from Sacramento city to San José, has been built. Under the first Pacific railroad act, passed in 1862, in the ninth section, it is provided that—"The Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of California, are hereby authorized to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the Pacific coast, at or near San Francisco or the navigable waters of the Sacramento river, to the eastern boundary of California," &c.

Now, here was an alternative proposition, to build either from or near San Francisco or the navigable waters of the Sacramento river. They adopted the latter alternative, and commenced their road at Sacramento City, on the navigable waters of the Sacramento river, and that is the starting-point of the Central railroad of California; but, by a strange kind of sleight-of-hand, another company, chartered by the State of California, claiming to have an assignment from the Central Pacific, proceeds to build a road from Sacramento, via Stockton, to San José, not on the waters of the Pacific, a distance of one hundred and twenty miles, and receiving a subsidy of $1,920,000, besides a large grant of land. The right under which this is done, it is claimed, is an act of Congress passed March 3, 1865. That act professes to give no greater right to this Western Pacific than was given to the Central Pacific, and as the Central Pacific never had the right to build a railroad from Sacramento to San José, and if it had it had waived it when it adopted for its starting-point the navigable waters of the Sacramento river, then it may safely be said that the subsidies given to this road are in violation of law. I say what I do on this subject only to call attention more forcibly to where we are drifting, and to point out the dangers that so constantly beset us.

Now, sir, to return to the point from which I was diverted. I was then detailing in brief some of the provisions of the original Pacific railroad bill, passed in 1862. By section sixteen of the act (to which point I had reached) it is provided that all railroad companies named in the act, or any two, are authorized to consolidate and form themselves into one company. Under this section the following-named roads may, and probably at no distant day will, be consolidated into one vast corporation, wielding a capital greater than was ever consolidated on the face of the earth, exercising a power that will successfully defy all legislative control; a power that will make and unmake Presidents, Senators, members of Congress, Governors, Legislatures, and judicial officers of States, and endanger the liberties of the people; a power that can and will force every interest of the country to pay it tribute as the price of its existence. The companies thus authorized to consolidate are the Union Pacific railroad, the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad Company, or what is known as the Eastern Division, the Hannibal and St. Joseph road, the Sioux City railroad, the Central Pacific railroad of California, and, by subsequent act, the Burlington and Missouri River road, and Western Pacific. By section seventeen it was provided that if the companies failed to comply with the act that the roads should be forfeited to the United States, and that on a part of the road twenty-five per cent. and on the rest fifteen per cent. of the bonds were not to be delivered until the roads were completed. By section eighteen, after the net earnings should exceed ten per cent., exclusive of five per cent. reserved to pay the United States, or, in other words, after the net earnings should exceed fifteen per cent. per annum, Congress reserved the right to fix the rates of fare by law; but in the same section Congress reserved the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act, due regard being had to the rights of said companies.

I have thus, in as brief a manner as possible, gone through and stated the main conditions of the first Pacific railroad act. It was regarded as liberal beyond precedent at the time, providing, as it did, for a gift outright of a vast body of land and a loan of over sixty million dollars, with no greater security than what the Government had itself furnished the means of offering, and, indeed, far less.

Though the act was carelessly drawn some regard appears to have been had for the interests of the Government, and the following provisions were made for the public security:

1. The Government was to have a first mortgage on the road to secure its advances.
2. Twenty-five per cent. of the bonds on a part of the line and fifteen on the rest were to be reserved until the road was completed.
3. The price for the transportation of Government freight and passengers was to be applied in liquidation of the bonds, and five per cent. of the net earnings were also to be set aside for the same purpose.
4. The amount of stock held by any one man was limited to two hundred shares.

Parties were not long found wanting to avail themselves of this act.

It has already been seen that to complete the organization it only required two thousand shares to be subscribed, and one per cent. on a dollar, or $20,000, paid in to perfect the organization. Parties were ready and prompt to act and obtain control and cut out the public, in violation of what was contemplated in the act naming a large number of corporators in all parts of the country. The organization being completed, what was next to be done? Go on and build the road? Not a bit of it.

With the first grant secured—a grant worth untold millions—instead of proceeding to build the road, this Union Pacific, before spending a dollar in building the road, or, as I believe, in moving a shovelfull of earth, came down upon Congress—

"Like the wolf on the fold,
And their cohorts were gleaming with purple and gold."

and in 1864 succeeded in securing the passage of an act to wipe out every provision made in the original act for the security of the public.

Of the manner by which said last act was passed I care not to speak. It is of the act itself that I speak. Who voted for this amended act it is impossible to ascertain, as the record shows that all attempts to obtain the ayes and noes on its final passage failed. We know this, that every interest of the people that was guarded in the first act was sacrificed in the second. We know that the security of the Government was subordinated to a first mortgage amounting to over sixty million dollars, that the reservation of any part of the bonds until the road should be completed was repealed, also the five per cent. net earnings to apply to liquidate the bonds, and the provision for applying the earnings of the road on Government transportation was also altered so as to require but one half to be so applied, and all restriction as to amount of stock that any one man could hold was removed. The land grant was doubled, giving the different Pacific roads a territory, according to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, "within one fourth of twice the area of England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, Guernsey, Jersey, the Isle of Man, and the islands of the British seas, and less than a tenth of being equal to the French empire proper," and nothing that the ingenuity of man could invent for their benefit was withheld. This is the present aspect of affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think there is a history about that matter which ought to be published to the country.

Mr. HIGBY rose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I do not yield to the gentleman from California. He shall have full opportunity on this subject, and I want to hear from him and the other California members, for no part of the country is so much interested as is that State.

The work is progressing with unexampled rapidity, as well it may, since Government furnishes every dollar in money that is necessary to build it. The public are rejoiced to know that it is going so rapidly forward; and, as I have before said, no one will go further than I to hurry its early completion, due regard to the rights of the people being in the meantime had; and what I now wish to show is that before issuing any more bonds we should insist upon securing the rights of the public for all coming time. Failing in this, let the Government at once take the control of the road and build it through as early as possible, and make it a cheap line of commerce between the Atlantic and Pacific. Why not? If the Government furnishes the money to build it why should it give it away to a company of monopolists, who are free from all control in their dealings either with the public or Government?

Now, how all these changes were wrought by which the public interests were sacrificed is not for me to say or even conjecture.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me, I can tell him something about how it was passed. I was here.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I must decline to yield for that statement. No matter now how the act was passed. I suppose it is no use to advert to that matter. I, of course, do not believe that any corrupt influence was ever used upon any member of Congress; I would not intimate anything of the kind; but I believe I state nothing more than what is notorious when I say that the vice president of that road has charged the company with $500,000 as having been expended in Washington to secure the passage of that act; claiming that the money was expended in a confidential way, and declining to furnish any vouchers.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman is referring to the first act.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. No, sir; the act of 1864. The company had not the money in 1862.

Mr. HIGBY. I am sorry to hear the gentleman make the statement which he has just made. This is the first time I have ever heard it intimated that any money was used to procure the passage of the act of 1864.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I make no reflections whatever. I will simply say that I state what is a notorious fact: that the vice president has claimed that he used money in a confidential way in Washington. But there is one significant fact which I may be pardoned for adverting to, and it is this: that in this act of 1864, virtually voting away $60,000,000 of the people's money, the opponents of it in vain demanded the yeas and nays upon the final vote on agreeing to the report of the conference committee of the two Houses, and by which vote the bill was finally passed.

Nothing shows more clearly where we are drifting than the fact that this Pacific Railroad Committee, only three or four days ago, attempted to report another Pacific railroad bill, from Portland, Oregon, to connect with the Pacific road at the north bend of the Humboldt river. In looking at the line for this road I find that for the first one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and fifty miles it will run south, up the rich and thickly-settled Willamette valley, and then, turning in a southeast direction, cross mountains and plains, until it reaches the Humboldt river, a distance of six or seven hundred miles, and requiring subsidies at the rate of $18,000, $32,000, and $48,000 per mile, together with the usual land grant of twelve thousand eight hundred acres per mile.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I am glad to hear that I am mistaken. I know that my friend tried to report a bill from his committee, but he informed me that his only object was to have it recommitteed and printed. I do not understand that he is in favor of any such bill, but I speak of it to show that there is no end to the demands of these men who want Government subsidies. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will assert, prove, and maintain that the Government of the United States will furnish every dollar necessary to build these roads, and that for these vast advances Government has practically no security whatever. By computation it appears that the Government subsidy will average about thirty thousand dollars per mile for the entire distance. In the judgment of reliable railroad men there is not to exceed three hundred miles of the entire line that will cost to exceed that sum per mile, while a large part of the rest of the line will cost far less; yet, I find that when the bill of 1864 was up for consideration it was stated on the floor of the House that there were many miles that would cost $500,000 per mile.

Mr. DODGE. I hope the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. DODGE. I want to know how a railroad can be constructed from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean at that price, when there is not a road running in his own State that has not cost from twenty-five to sixty-five thousand dollars a mile.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. They cost anywhere from twenty-five to two hundred thousand dollars because of the rascality which prevailed in the early management of those who built and controlled them. There are hundreds of miles of railroad in my State that could be built to-day and fairly stocked for $25,000 per mile, yet these same roads, by a kind of conjuration known only to railroad men, represent a cost on paper of four times that sum.

There is great exaggeration about the difficulties attending the building of these Pacific railroads. If gentlemen want information I will give it to them. I will give the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Dodge,] the very able and distinguished engineer of the road, some of his own figures. I will refer to his report of 1868. It was asserted in Congress in 1864 that there were miles of this road that would cost $500,000 per mile to build. Here is my friend's own report made in 1868; and I will ask the reporter for the Associated Press to take down the figures I shall read, so the public may see for themselves. I read from the engineer's report, page 22. I will publish the entire table in the Globe, but will only here state the result of the figures, and leave gentlemen to form their own opinion as to how much it will cost to build such a road. The table of grades shows upon the line from Omaha to the eastern line of California a distance of one thousand six hundred and twenty-two and a half miles; of dead level ground two hundred and seventy-two miles; from level to twenty feet per mile, six hundred and sixty-five miles; ranging from twenty feet to forty feet three hundred and forty-three miles; from forty feet to sixty feet per mile, ninety-six miles; from sixty to eighty feet per mile, eighty-one miles; from eighty to one hundred feet per mile, forty-five miles; from one hundred to one hundred and sixteen feet per mile, thirty-seven miles:

HO. OF REPS.

Pacific Railroad Freight Tariff—Mr. Washburn.

40TH CONG.... 2D SESS.

Such are the grades of this Pacific road as determined by their own engineers. The almost impassable mountains of which "Pathfinders" and others give such marvelous accounts, when brought to the unerring test of the engineer's level dwindle into insignificance; and I think I can safely assert here that there is no sixteen hundred miles of road running in any given direction in the United States that show such easy grades as from Omaha to the line of California. There was much difficulty in determining where the base of the Rocky mountains was, but it was finally determined in the level valley of the Platte river at Crow Creek Crossing, and from that point to the summit of the mountains the distance is only between thirty-one and thirty-two miles, although we give them a subsidy of $48,000 per mile for one hundred and fifty miles at this point of the road.

Mr. DODGE. I desire to state to the gentleman that the report to which he refers only reaches the California State line. It does not show the grade over the heavy mountain ranges in crossing to the Pacific.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. That is true. This report purports to give the line of the road from Omaha to the eastern line of California. But that part of the road over the Sierra Nevada belongs to another road—the Central Pacific railroad. I have not the grades of that road. In looking over their report I do not see that they state them, but I see this, that they claim and receive a subsidy from Government of $48,000 per mile within seven miles of Sacramento.

Now, I am not speaking against any road; I am speaking purely in the interest of the public; but knowing that there is to be but one Pacific railroad for some length of time I say that unless we place a restriction upon it now it will become a stupendous monopoly, and one that all the people of the country will have occasion to regret. I give this as my deliberate opinion. These people say, "All we ask is to be let alone." But, sir, I am willing to let them alone only when the road will consent to a restriction such as I propose. I am not particular that it should be put on to take effect now; if it can take effect when the road is finished, so that the public may have the benefit of it then that is sufficient.

Now, sir, I have asserted that this road can nearly or quite be built with the Government subsidy. The first five hundred miles are nearly a dead level. I am assured by gentlemen who have traveled over the route that up to the base of the Rocky mountains it is a dead level, so that the sleepers are laid down for miles and miles on the naked soil without any grading, only a ditch on each side.

Mr. DODGE. I do not see how it can be a dead level when the rise from the Missouri river to the base of the mountains is five thousand feet.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. When I say a dead level I should say that the average rise from the Missouri up the valley of the Platte, a distance of five hundred miles, is about ten feet per mile. They lay the sleepers down on the bare sod, and there is very little grading.

Mr. DODGE. I undertake to say that the sleepers are not laid on the bare sod, and I see gentlemen here who have some knowledge on the subject who will say that it is one of the best built roads in the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have not disputed that fact. I do not say that they lay their sleepers on the bare sod to detract at all from the road. I believe they have been doing the work very well. Doctors will disagree. Some very able railroad men tell me it is better, where it is level and requires no grading, to lay the sleepers on the bare sod. I am not undertaking to decide that question. I merely state what I understand and believed to be the fact, that the country is so level that all they had to do for many miles was to lay down the sleepers on the sod, and if they are not so laid it is not because the ground requires to be graded.

Now, certainly there can be very little grading, at all events, for the first five hundred miles. Gentlemen can figure for themselves, and tell me how much per mile the road would cost built in this level valley of the Platte. A mile of iron (it is very light iron, fifty-six pounds to the yard) will cost about eight thousand dollars laid down at Omaha; and two thousand five hundred ties for a mile, at two dollars apiece, a very high price, would cost $5,000 a mile; the ties and iron would cost perhaps $13,000 a mile, and you may throw in whatever you please for grading and bridging; but suppose we allow you $30,000 a mile to build the road up the Platte valley over nearly dead level ground, which is a great deal more than it can cost, and where do we stand?

Let me remind you here that from what they call the base of the Rocky mountains the company receives $48,000 per mile for one hundred and fifty miles, and from that distance to the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada, a distance of about eight hundred miles, $32,000 per mile; and I will say that I am informed by gentlemen who know that this eight hundred mile stretch has few heavy grades and follows the line of water-courses a large part of the way. There cannot be a shadow of doubt that your subsidy in bonds will nearly or quite build and equip the road, for this part of the line at least, with the vast grant of lands thrown in.

Now, sir, what security has the Government for the repayment of this money or the people that the monopoly you have created will not be wielded for their oppression? Absolutely none. You say that the company is bound to pay the bonds in thirty years, and as security you have a second mortgage. That is true. But suppose they do not pay? Then there is ahead of this mortgage a first mortgage of $60,000,000. That mortgage will be foreclosed as soon as the roads are fairly completed, and the whole thing will be bought in and the roads operated by other organizations. The experience of all other railroad companies justifies me in saying this. The Government, of course, will not pay off the first mortgage, for that will represent all the road actually cost. It will be sold and pass to other hands, and Government will be left out entirely. The obligation which the present company is under to apply the price of carrying one half of the Government freight in liquidating the interest on these bonds will be wiped out with the foreclosure, and the Government will be left with absolutely nothing to show for its untold millions of dollars and acres.

My object, as will be seen, is to point out these dangers now and apply the remedy before it is too late, for I need not tell you that after we shall have issued these companies $60,000,000 bonds and their roads are completed the people will seek in vain for any legislation that is opposed by these companies. I have already indicated what I desire, and that is to establish a perpetual board, whose duty it shall be to fix an annual tariff for these roads.

It may be said that under section eighteen of the original charter we have no right to do it until the earnings exceed ten per cent. of the cost of the road, and five per cent. to be reserved under that act as a sinking fund. But the act of 1864, under which these companies are acting, and through which they derive these vast and practically unsecured subsidies, fortunately contained a provision that that act might be altered, amended, or repealed at pleasure. But, sir, I would have no objection to the parties who put their money in this great enterprise receiving ten per cent., and more. I think they ought to; but when they so contrive matters as to evade this provision and give themselves forty or fifty per cent. on the money the Government has furnished it is necessary that they should be exposed. I have already said that this road could be built for the Government subsidy, and I reiterate that, provided it is built as other roads are built, by contracting with the lowest bidder. To make the road cost the stockholders no more than absolutely necessary, and at the same time to make it represent a nominal cost that would relieve the stockholders from the appearance of not putting in money of their own, and also to relieve them from the ten per cent. dividend proposition, they resort to a device unheard of before in this country.

The stockholders in the Pacific road are few in number. They could easily have made a contract with themselves for the building of the road, without bids or advertisements of any kind. They could have agreed to have paid themselves one or two hundred thousand per mile, swelled the nominal cost to such a figure as to neutralize the ten per cent. provision in regard to earnings. But would such a transaction have been regarded as an honest or legitimate and straightforward one, and binding on the Government? Clearly not. Would a transaction which amounts to precisely the same thing, arrived at in an indirect manner, be any more honorable and straightforward or binding on the Government? Instead of contracting for the construction of the road as all other roads have been built, what do they do? A, B, C, and D are the stockholders of the company. A, B, C, and D, under a charter from the State of Pennsylvania, organize themselves into a company called the Credit Mobilier of America. A, B, C, and D, stockholders, enter into a contract with the Credit Mobilier to build this road at fabulous prices, and the Credit Mobilier lets out the contract at the lowest figure at which the road can be built, making a clear profit of the difference between the price at which the contract is taken and the price actually paid to those who do the work, a sum, I am assured, that will not fall short of many, many millions of dollars. It will readily be seen from this that the company practically contracts with itself to build the road, and that the enormous figures they exhibit as representing the cost of the road are absolutely fictitious.

Let me now call your attention to one other fact. The company say here in their report that they have contracted to build nine hundred and fourteen miles of the road at $68,000 per mile, $5,000 of which is to be in rolling stock. Well, for the present, suppose that it will cost $30,000 per mile to build the first five hundred miles of the road, the level part of it up the Platte; that will leave their contractor, whoever he may be, $116,962 per mile for the remaining four hundred and fourteen miles, a sum which no man in his senses will pretend to say it actually can cost, or anything approaching it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the gentleman will yield to me, I desire to inquire of the Chair how much time the gentleman has left of his hour?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the gentleman's time be extended for fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. HIGBY. I will not object, provided time is given to others to speak upon this subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Certainly; I do not propose now to call the previous question. I want this subject to be fully discussed, and I want particularly to hear from my friend from California, [Mr. HIGBY.]

No objection being made, the time of Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, was extended for fifteen minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have stated that the Government has actually no security; that in my judgment these bonds never will be paid by these companies. I make this statement from what I know of the history of other railroads.

And I will state, further, that the security for the first mortgage Pacific railroad bonds is the most perfect security ever offered by any railroad company. That is so; there is no doubt of that fact. It could not be otherwise, for we expended $80,000,000 to make them so, and have allowed these companies to establish a thoroughfare with enormous privileges which I undertake to say will be the greatest thoroughfare in the world. No man in this House who hears my voice to-day can comprehend the extent of the business which will be done over that road. It is to be the great highway of nations.

Every intelligent member of Congress knows that any company representing a capital of $100,000,000 can defeat any legislation that ever may be sought here in the interest of the public. They already publish to the world their immense receipts, greatly in excess of the amount they have to pay for interest on their bonds and on the bonds of the Government. The Central Pacific Railroad Company declares that they are earning four times the amount required to pay the interest on their indebtedness. They say in their report made in October, 1866, as follows, namely:

"The statements of the present revenue of the company from the traffic on seventy-three miles only of their road are very important, as showing that the local trade of California and Nevada alone is sufficient to make the enterprise immensely profitable, independent of the through traffic which may be looked for when the completed lines shall span the continent."

And the Union Pacific Railroad Company say in the report of their treasurer, John J. Cisco:

"It must be remembered that for many years to come the Union Pacific railroad and its western connections will be the only Pacific railroad."

I have no doubt of that fact.

"And being without competition it can always charge remunerative prices."

In other words it can always charge what it pleases, because there will be no competition:

"And while the present rate is four times the tariff of the eastern roads—"

That they themselves admit.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. I want to ask the gentleman whether, in making that statement he does not know that the law organizing this company declares in express and positive terms that when this road is finished the freights and fares may be regulated by Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. If the law did declare that, I would not be willing to postpone this action till the road is completed.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman permit me to read the law?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; the gentleman may read the law.

Mr. PRICE. Section eighteen of the act of 1862 provides—

"That whenever it appears that the net earnings of the entire road and telegraph, including the amount allowed for services rendered for the United States, after deducting all expenditures, including repairs, and the furnishing, running, and managing of said road, shall exceed ten per cent. upon its cost, exclusive of the five per cent. to be paid to the United States, Congress may reduce the rates of fare thereon, if unreasonable in amount, and may fix and establish the same by law."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Why, where has the gentleman been while I have been speaking?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have adverted to that very paragraph of the law. I have said it provided that whenever the net earnings shall exceed ten per cent. on the cost of the road, with this additional five per cent., Congress may regulate the rates for freight and passengers. But I have shown that by some slight of hand, some hocus pocus peculiar to this company, they make the cost of the road appear to be two or threetimes what it actually is. I have adverted to that point, and I thought had made myself perfectly understood. I have shown by the company's own statement that they are charging four times the rates charged by other roads, and that they are now earning a great deal more money than is needed to pay the interest on all their bonds, Government and otherwise.

Mr. DODGE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this company is charging four times the rates charged by any other roads?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I do. The company says so in its report. By the same document it appears that its bonds have advanced in price from ninety to ninety-five and are now at par. And no wonder these bonds are in demand. I will read from the report of the treasurer of the company:

"It must be remembered that for many years to come this Union Pacific and its western connections will be the only Pacific railroad, and as it will be without competition it can always charge remunerative prices."

Mr. DODGE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to the gentleman from Wisconsin yielding to the agents of the road, unless some of the Representatives of the people can be heard.

Mr. DODGE. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I stand here as—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DODGE?]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I decline to yield. I think there is no necessity for any controversy just now between the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Illinois.

I call attention still further to the language of this report:

"While the present rates are four times the tariff of eastern roads they are not one fourth of the former cost by teams, of which twenty-seven thousand left two points on the Missouri river on their westward journey within a single year."

From this we can gain some idea of the amount of business to be done by this road. I take issue, however, with the statement that they are not charging nearly as much as the teams charged. I think that the people are actually paying more for the transportation of freight since this great railroad company broke up the established lines of teams than they did before. I have been so assured by gentlemen from that section of the country, who, having noticed that I had introduced so proper a resolution as this, have written to me in great numbers from along the line of the road to say that since this railroad company have succeeded in driving off the organized means of transportation they are charged more than they were before the road was built.

Mr. DODGE. I would like the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I must decline for want of time. The gentleman will have an opportunity hereafter.

Now, the Central Pacific Railroad Company says in its report that "the rates received by the company are very remunerative, being at the rate of ten cents per mile, and fifteen cents per mile per ton for freight in gold."

Now, I want my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] to do a little figuring while I do a little more talking. I desire him to calculate how much it will cost to transport a ton of freight from California to Omaha at the rate of fifteen cents in gold per mile per ton.

Mr. PRICE rose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I decline to yield.

Mr. PRICE. I thought the gentleman wanted me to answer his question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I wanted you to do the figuring while I did the talking. Any gentleman can satisfy himself how much it will come to at ten cents a mile for a man to travel to San Francisco from Omaha, that is, if he be not a member of Congress and have not a free pass, which few of our constituents have. Freight from Omaha to San Francisco at fifteen cents per mile would cost about five thousand dollars per car load in gold.

Now, sir, this is getting to be a serious matter. I see that the people of California are crying out about it. A dispatch from San Francisco represents that the Central Pacific Railroad Company has bought up every other railroad company in California, and the people there are seriously alarmed. Some person in California, to me unknown, did me the favor a short time since to send me a copy of the report of the Central Pacific railroad, together with a San Francisco paper, from which I read the following:

"For a Reduction.—We notice that more petitions are flowing into the State Legislature from citizens of the counties depending on the Central Pacific railroad for passenger and merchandise conveyance asking for a reduction of the rates of fare and freight. In addition to the needs or selfish interests of the people, the petitioners point to the assertions of agents of the company that it is earning a very large interest on the cost of the road, which cost has been mainly paid by the people."

I have before me the freight tariff of the Union Pacific railroad, forwarded to me from Nebraska. From Omaha to Cheyenne, five hundred and sixteen miles, the rates are per hundred pounds for first class, $3 85; second class, $3 70, and third class, $3 65.

Mr. PRICE. Is that fifteen cents a mile?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. It is so much per hundred pounds. Figure it up and you will see how much it is per mile per ton; you will find it fifteen cents per ton per mile for first-class freight.

Here is a letter I will read that I have received from a gentleman on the line:

COLUMBUS, NEBRASKA, January 16, 1869.

DEAR SIR: I this day forward you a copy of the freight and passenger tariff as issued by the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

I have received letters from every station of importance along the line of the road that they are forwarding you petitions similar to the one I sent. This grasping and selfish monopoly has no friends with the settlers along the line of its road. We are now carting our freight from Omaha to this place twenty cents per hundred weight cheaper than railroad tariff. How long this will continue we know not.

Wishing you success in your efforts to properly restrain this great monopoly, I am, truly yours,

Hon. C. C. WASHBURN, M. C., Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not give the name of the party writing that letter, or he will fall under the ban of this road.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Of course I will not give the man's name, for I have no idea of subjecting him to the hostility of this corporation.

Mr. DODGE. I only wish to know the station.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Columbus.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They will now find out who he is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. If they do I presume he can take care of himself. The people out there are with him. And when they are on the side of a man he can defy even such a corporation as this; but I do not think it fair to give his name. To the same point is the letter I read from the Chicago Tribune:

CHEYENNE, DAKOTA TERRITORY, February 24.

To the Editor of the Chicago Tribune:

I desire to call your attention to a most flagrant outrage perpetrated upon the people living upon the line of the Union Pacific railroad. I refer to the exorbitant tariff imposed by said company, both for fare and freight. The fare from the terminus to Omaha, a distance of five hundred and thirty-seven miles, is $52 50, almost ten cents per mile. The fare from Omaha to New York, three times the distance, nearly fifteen hundred miles, is only a trifle over forty dollars. Freight is charged in proportion, and I venture nothing in saying that freight can be shipped cheaper from New York to Cheyenne than from Omaha to Cheyenne. What is the result of this short-sighted policy? People are deterred from traveling or shipping over a road charging such excessive rates. I will illustrate a case in point. On my last trip from Chicago there were on board the train representatives of several commercial houses from that city, who intended passing over the Union Pacific railroad to Cheyenne, but, upon learning that the fare was $52 50, they each and all declined making the trip, as the round trip would cost from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and fifty dollars. One of them remarked that he could make a trip to Europe for that sum.

MERCHANT.

Mr. Speaker, lest it should be thought that my remarks are intended to apply particularly to the Union Pacific railroad, I wish to say that is not my intention. They apply with equal or greater force to them all. We pretend to hold some control over the Union Pacific by appointing directors, while the eastern division, the Central Pacific, Sioux City, Atchison and Pike's Peak, and Western Pacific roads, companies organized under State legislation and receiving about $36,000,000 of bonds and vast land grants, are subject to no such control.

Now, sir, can there be any doubt as to our right to put a restriction upon this company before they go further and before we issue any more bonds? Can there be any doubt as to our obligations to our constituents to say that after having given over twenty million acres of land and furnished money to build this road, we will demand that the road shall deal fairly by the people? I propose to deal fairly with the company. I propose that they shall not charge more than double the average rates charged between the Mississippi river and the Atlantic ocean. That is enough, because it is going to be an immense thoroughfare; and the day is not distant when they can afford to carry freight and passengers as cheap as any other road.

Mr. DAWES. Why not apply your rule to the New York Central and Erie roads?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is attempting to divert me from my point; but I thank him for his interruption, for it reminds me to call attention to the great railroad war now being waged in New York between Vanderbilt and Drew. He asks why do we not end that quarrel? Simply because we probably have not the right to do so. If we had the right I believe we should exercise it, and that speedily. What does that quarrel mean? It means that if one party is successful there shall be but one management of all the lines of travel between New York and the great West. With the Erie and the New York Central consolidated there would still be for the time being some other highways by which we could get home; so it would not be so bad as this uncontrolled Pacific; but if Vanderbilt succeeds in securing the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania Central then our people would be in the position that they are likely to be in with the Pacific roads, at the mercy of a gigantic monopoly. It is a most fortunate thing, Mr. Speaker, that no man can live to more than eighty or one hundred years, for I believe Vanderbilt, if he lived for the next fifty years, would own the whole world. [Laughter.]

A few words more, and I close what I have to say. I have omitted to give an estimate of the amount of bonds issued to Pacific railroads or to be issued under existing laws. The following table, furnished by the Secretary of the Interior, shows the amount to be $60,669,120:

Name of road.	Distance in miles.	Total amount of bonds to be issued.
Union Pacific railroad.....	955.705	$24,726,560
Central Pacific railroad....	701.235	24,726,560
Union Pacific railway, eastern division.....	381	6,096,000
Western Pacific railroad....	120	1,920,000
Atchison and Pike's Peak railroad.....	100	1,600,000
Sioux City and Pacific railroad.....	100	1,600,000
Total.....	2,358	$60,669,120

There are many other matters of great importance connected with this subject to which

I would gladly advert, but, the House having already kindly extended my time, I will not further abuse its patience than to thank gentlemen for the attention they have given to my remarks.

SPEECH OF HON. C. A. NEWCOMB,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 21, 1868.

The House, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the President's annual message—

Mr. NEWCOMB said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The provision of the reconstruction acts above all others most objectionable to our opponents is that conferring the right of suffrage upon all loyal citizens, regardless of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. At this opposition I am not surprised. No other provision of those acts will or can accomplish so much in the work of destroying all that is left of rebellion and securing the full and perfect triumph of a pure and enlightened Democracy. That principle once permanently established, and radicalism, freedom, and progress, instead of conservatism, decay, and aristocratic rule, will be the governing idea of the American Union.

Manhood suffrage is now the cardinal doctrine of the Republican party faith, the grand inspiring idea underlying the present contest for political supremacy in the American Republic, and it is high time Representatives on this floor quit the girlish practice of standing timidly on the defensive and discussing the question as though of doubtful propriety and requiring an apology. We have reached that crisis in national affairs requiring the people's Representatives to boldly assert, zealously maintain, and aggressively promulgate the doctrine that every citizen of the Republic grown up to maturity and unconvicted of crime has an inalienable right, derived from his Creator as part of his humanity, to participate in the choice of the rulers and making of the laws by which he is to be governed.

If the Republican party at its national convention, to be held at Chicago in May next, fails to assert fully and unequivocally its belief in that faith, defeat—ignominious defeat—will, in my opinion, be its fate at the elections in the November following. No party, no matter how glorious may have been its past history, nor how much it may have contributed to the greatness of the Republic, can rally around its standard the earnest radical masses after failing in courage to assert boldly the eternal principles of universal freedom and the common brotherhood of all mankind; and no man, not even General Grant himself, no matter how loyal and devoted he may have proved himself during the bitter contest with rebellion, nor how brilliant may have been his services in the cause of Union and liberty in days gone by, is strong enough to draw to his support the true Republicans and true Democrats of the nation after failing to enter the contest with liberty and equality for a rallying cry. Contests won by timidly ignoring agitating questions have always proved victories barren of results, and hastened the dissolution of the party winning them. The old Whig party met its death dodging questions and from lack of courage, and the old Democratic party fell from honor and power to treason and infamy in disgraceful attempts at stifling the agitation of principles underlying the structure of our Democratic institutions; and well will it be if the Republican party profits by their example.

The Republicans of my own State are rallying for the approaching contest under the banner of loyal manhood suffrage, and no doubt or fear is entertained of the result. The loyal voters of that State have suffered too much in the recent contest with rebellion to permit thus early a base prejudice, conceived in oppression, brought forth in injustice, and nurtured in hatred and passion, to rob them of the fruits of the nation's victories on the battle-field. No matter how much the Republicans of other States, from whom we had reason to hope for better things, may play the coward's part, the loyal, radical, liberty-loving Republican voters of free Missouri will never consent to "dash to earth the victor's plume," and permit prejudice and policy to regain to rebellion "what arms have lost." Missourians have paid too dearly for their tuition in the school of humanity and freedom, and suffered too intensely in their devotion to the cause of Union, to forget the terrible lessons of the recent bloody contest ere the grass has had time to grow over the graves of husbands, brothers, sons, and friends murdered by those now arrayed in opposition to the national Republican party. Let the same determined spirit animate the Republican voters of other States that gives inspiration to those of Missouri, and next November will witness the dying out of the last hope of rebellion, cowardice, prejudice, and conservatism in every State of the Republic.

I am conscious of the fact there are persons on this floor professing all republicanism, and elected by earnest radical voters, who assert manhood suffrage is not now and will not in the ensuing contest be a principle of the party faith. They even go so far as to tell the nation there is no inconsistency in their position in voting for the insertion of such a principle in an act providing for the reorganizing of a rebellious State and refusing to recognize it as an article of party creed. Without stopping to admit the soundness of such a position or expose its fallacy, I will now offer a few reasons for the adoption of manhood suffrage in the States recently in rebellion on the ground of sound policy. Policy, I claim, outside of any ideas of natural rights, requires its adoption.

The close of the rebellion found those States without lawful State governments. Being without lawful State governments, it became the duty of Congress to provide for organizing such governments. In organizing those governments it was the duty of Congress to see that they were placed in loyal hands. Those governments could not be organized on any principle of loyalty to the General Government without enfranchising the loyal men of all colors and nationalities. Those facts stared Congress in the face, and it had no alternative left but the enfranchisement of the colored man or surrender the rule of those States to persons hostile to the existence of the General Government. Now, no truly patriotic friend of the Union would for one moment desire to see the State governments of ten States in the hands of persons hostile to the continuance of the Union and opposed to the principles of free government. It would be better for the interests of freedom, better for the interests of the white race, better for the interests of the nation, that none but black men should vote or hold office for twenty-five years in those States than that they should be organized in the hands of white rebels opposed to a loyal State government and opposed to educating the masses of the people, as they assuredly would be if loyal black men are not permitted to vote and take part in the elections.

The safety of the Republic must be provided for in the reorganization of the southern State governments; this is of the first importance, and cannot be done except by placing political power in the hands of men who will respect loyalty and protect the loyal sentiment of the country; and that can only be permanently secured by providing for the interests and elevation of the laboring masses. Unless the laboring classes of those States are furnished at public expense with the means of education we have nothing to hope in the future for freedom in those communities. The leading ruling white people who have always governed the people of those sections are now, and always have been, opposed to a system of public education of the laborers, and could not be trusted in the work of reorganization. The black loyalists are all true to the Government, and, whenever they have had an opportunity, have shown themselves favorable to a system of common schools that shall elevate and improve the lower and laboring classes. It becomes really necessary to clothe the black man with political power in order to place the means of education and elevation within the reach of the poor laboring white man of those States. Strange as it may seem, yet it is true that the ignorant colored people of the South are the only friends of popular education, save a very small portion of the white people.

As a means of elevating the white race negro suffrage is a wise provision in the acts of reconstruction. But I am met with the claim that the negro is ignorant and unfit to perform the duties of a voter in a free Republic. I admit he is unlettered in the education of the schools, but he is vastly more intelligent than we give him credit for, yet not intelligence derived from books and received in schools, but gained by observation and contact with the world. In this very essential kind of education the negro excels many who have had great advantages of schools, and we are often astonished at the extent and accuracy of his knowledge of the institutions of our country. But suppose they are ignorant; intelligence or education is not a qualification of voters in this country, and if it was it would very much reduce the number of voters. Besides that, if the colored people are ignorant, it is not their fault. It is the fault of the very rebel whites who now so strenuously object to his voting in the States recently in rebellion. Had he been permitted to do so he would have been educated and better fitted for citizenship.

It is criminal, it is wicked on the part of a Government to hold a people in ignorance against their will and then disfranchise them or deny them the right to vote because they are ignorant. One thing is true of them that is not true of the educated white. They are and have been sensible enough through the recent war to be and remain true to the Government, and it is but an act of simple justice to give them the ballot instead of the white man who tried to destroy the Government. Colored men have made quite as much advancement in education, religion, intelligence, and everything that belongs to a good citizen as we had any right to expect. In my own State, and from what I read and learn from well-informed men from the South, the colored people are making unusual efforts to establish schools, build churches, employ and pay teachers, and fill their pulpits with preachers of their own color, and I undertake to say here in my place in the American Congress that the colored people of our land are manifesting as much interest and zeal in building school-houses and churches, and in encouraging every enterprise that belongs to a well-ordered life, and expending as much money in proportion to their means to accomplish these objects, as are the white people of any community in the nation. And, sir, I say, in the name of all that is just in government and holy in religion, the black population shall be encouraged in their laudable zeal for improvement, until those sections they inhabit shall be dotted with school-houses filled with children, and until their churches shall be built on every prairie, and their altars be erected on every hill-top, from which shall ascend the praises of the zealous hearts of our once slaves. It is already the exception to find a negro in my State that cannot read, and very many read and write, and are quite familiar with subjects of general interest in the country, and talk with much intelligence about matters of legislation. Indeed, I have been surprised to find so many who read the newspapers, and many who are regular subscribers to the popular periodicals of the day.

There is nothing in the reconstruction acts, so far as they confer suffrage upon the negro, that is not justifiable on grounds of public policy and not required as a measure of security against future attempts at rebellion. The qualification of loyalty is more important, if possible, at this time than intelligence, and from the condition of things in the South it is vitally important, and Congress would be criminally negligent in duty did it not make loyalty one of the qualifications for electors in providing State governments for the communities recently in rebellion, otherwise we would only be organizing States in hostility to the General Government, and ready at any time to join hands with its enemies. No one doubts but that the colored population of the country are loyal and true to the Government. Certainly no one can doubt it who has witnessed his devotion and sacrifices during the war; or who has read of the heroism of the colored soldier at Milliken's Bend, Fort Pillow, Port Hudson, Fort Wagner, Drury's Bluff, and Petersburg mine, where they won the praise of the Commander-in-Chief of all the armies; or who has read of the personal daring and bravery of such men as James Reader, Potomac Jim, and a thousand others that might be named? And who has not heard with thrilling interest, as one of a multitude that might be mentioned, the history of Black Tom, who came into our lines on the banks of the Mississippi river. He follows the Army in the long march, a soldier dies by the roadside, Tom picks up the musket, fills his place in the ranks, and does good service for the cause of the Union. Tom gets permission to go through the rebel lines for his wife and children, rescues the loved ones, returns with them, rejoins the Army, fights for the country, and dies in the service. An eye-witness has poetized the dying scene:

"One day Tom was marching with us
Through a forest, as our guide,
When a ball from traitor rifle
Broke his arm and pierced his side.
"On a litter white men bore him
Through a forest drear and damp;
Laid him, dying, where our banners
Brightly fluted o'er our camp.
"Pointing to his wife and children,
While he suffered racking pain,
Said he to our soldiers round him:
Don't let dem be slaves again."

The colored man has ever yielded a faithful allegiance to the Government, paid taxes, and faithfully discharged the duties of citizenship in time of peace. He has rendered gallant service in all the wars of our nation, winning the highest commendation of Washington, Jackson, and Grant. His deeds of heroism and valor are most honorable. They are forever treasured up in the history of our country. They are immortalized by the speech of the orator and the poet's song; and, sir, I do insist that while we require and accept his service in support and defense of the Government it is an act of injustice and cowardice to withhold from him his rights of citizenship that will some day call down upon this nation the scorn and reproach of mankind.

But we are told that this is a white man's Government, and that the Republican party of the country is Africanizing it and turning it over to the rule of another race. Mr. DOOLITTLE, in a recent speech at Concord, New Hampshire, says:

"He impeached the present policy of Congress in regard to the negro as a crime against nature, against the law of civilization, and against the Constitution of the United States. To attempt to give the suffrage to the colored people might, if it were not so grave a matter, be called a parody and burlesque upon republican institutions. He impeached this policy because it was an attempt to trample upon the rights of States and to transfer the franchise to persons utterly incapable of comprehending the duty imposed upon them."

It is strange that the opinion has obtained among so many of our people that this is a white man's Government in such a sense that the colored American never did have and never can have the rights of other persons in the Government. This seemed to be the feeling in my own State when application was first made by Missouri to be admitted into the Union. In the constitution presented to Congress in 1819, and under which she asked for admission into the Union, the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article provided that the Legislature should pass laws to "prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in the State." This question was ably debated at that time in Congress, and Mr. Clay, as chairman of the committee of the House to report on the expediency of admitting Missouri, reported a resolution providing for the admission of Missouri in the Union on an equal footing with the original States, upon the fundamental condition that the provision of the Constitution I have just recited—

"Shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of all the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States."

When it is remembered that at this time the colored man was a citizen in several States then in the Union, and entitled to the rights of citizens, including the right to vote, we must recognize this act of the Congress of 1821, composed, as it was, of many of the ablest statesmen and purest patriots that ever held seats in these Halls, as a clear recognition of the doctrine that the colored man is not excluded from citizenship, and that they are an integral part of the nation, and a denial of the doctrine that this is exclusively a white man's Government.

The word white, in connection with the Constitution and laws of our country, has an early origin in our history, and a brief reference thereto may not be unprofitable, as I trust we are very soon to settle this great question for all time, and place it beyond the reach of political influence and party issues. South Carolina (the home of all political heresy) proposed when the Articles of Confederation were under consideration in Congress to insert the word "white" between the words "free" and "inhabitant" in the fourth article of that instrument and make it read that "The free white inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States." Eleven States voted on the proposition—two for it, eight against it, and one was divided in its vote; so we see as early as 1778, but two years after the Declaration of Independence was signed, our fathers, with a remarkable unanimity, branded the doctrine that this is a white man's Government and that colored men have no rights under it, as unworthy to be received, and gave the weight of their great authority to the doctrine that the colored man is, and may be, a citizen, and that citizenship is confined to no color or nationality. And that is not only the teachings of the fathers of the Republic, but it is the great vital, inspiring American idea which forms the substratum and underlies the whole fabric of republican government in this country. About nine years subsequent to this, or in 1787, the Northwestern Territory, ceded to the Government by Virginia, became the subject of special legislation by the Congress of the Confederation; and the ordinance of 1787 was adopted for its government, which is so often referred to, and has become celebrated as giving expression to the sentiments of the great men of that day upon the question now at issue between the Republican and Democratic parties of the country. The word white is not to be found in that ordinance, and under it colored men claimed the rights of citizenship and exercised all the rights of citizens, including the right to vote. This Congress of the Confederation appointed a Convention to frame a Constitution for the United States to take the place of the Articles of Confederation, which Constitution was adopted on the 17th of September, 1787; and in that Constitution it is required that every person who seeks to vote for a member of the House of Representatives from the State in which he resides "shall have the qualifications required for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature," no more, no less, no distinction on account of color. In no article, line, or word did Washington or his compeers, directly or indirectly, or by any discrimination, deny to any class of our people their rights, but carefully guarded them all.

It is probably known to every member on this floor that when the Constitution of the United States was ratified, free colored men were voters in a majority of all the States then in the Union. They voted in North Carolina, Maryland, Delaware, New York, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania; afterward they were admitted as voters in Maine, Vermont, and Tennessee, and I believe in New York and all the New England States, except Connecticut, they continue to vote to this day. In some of the States intelligence, in others a certain amount of property, in all freedom was considered a prerequisite to the privilege of voting, but in none was color made a condition. In 1817 Connecticut denied to her colored people the right to vote. Maryland changed her law in regard to colored voters in 1810, and deprived them of this privilege. In Tennessee they voted down to 1834. In North Carolina as late as 1835, and in Pennsylvania they changed the law in 1838. Thus we see that colored persons have been voters in more than half the original States of the Union, and some that have been admitted since; hence must fall the position that this is a new doctrine introduced by the Republican party of the country. It is familiar to the Government, has been recognized by all political parties, and is the law of several States of the Union at this time. This great national apostasy on this subject commenced in 1812, in the act passed organizing the Territory of Missouri. In this act, for the first time in the Federal legislation of the country, was distinction made with regard to citizenship on account of color. In the organic acts, organizing ten Territories which had been admitted into the Union up to this time, no distinction was made among their citizens by the General Government on account of color. It seems that upon the territory embraced in my own State the great battle commenced, and that has been one of the main theaters of war ever since, and it is not unfit that there the first great battle should be won, and there we expect it will be won at the next election. Here our national apostasy commenced and reached its culminating point, in the opinion of Justice Taney, delivered in the celebrated Dred Scott case. So great had our national demoralization become that it reached the judiciary, that department of the Government intended to be removed and kept from the contaminating influence of politics. Yet the majority of the Supreme Court in that case, in utter disregard of our history, the opinions of the fathers of the Republic, and the uniform practice of the Government, first announced the false and unwarranted doctrine that colored men were not intended to be included in the word citizen in the Constitution of the United States, and, as a consequence, can claim none of the rights or protection of citizens under the Government of the United States; a doctrine not only in conflict with the history, practice, and philosophy of the Government, but in violation of the higher principles of humanity. And this decision was accepted and indorsed by the Democratic party all over the land; and upon that issue the parties went before the country, and the doctrine was repudiated by the people. And here we see an example of the discriminating justice of the American people, who scarcely ever make a mistake when they carefully examine a question of public policy. Though this monstrous doctrine had the sanction of the highest judicial tribunal of the country and the indorsement of a great political party that had controlled the Government most of the time for a quarter of a century, yet, when the people saw the injustice of such a principle, they repudiated it and defeated the party pledged to its support. But we are not left to conjecture and chance to determine who are entitled to citizenship, as we have already seen. But the true doctrine, the American doctrine on this subject, is clearly laid down by the ablest jurists and writers on law in this country. In the second volume of Kent's Commentaries, he clearly enunciates the principle I am insisting upon. In the able opinion of Justice Gaston, in the case of North Carolina vs. Manuel, and especially in the able dissenting opinions of Justices Curtis and McLean, in the case of Dred Scott, is the same doctrine laid down and insisted upon. In that opinion Justice Curtis says:

"To determine whether any free persons descended from Africans held in slavery were citizens of the States under the Confederation, and consequently at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, it is only necessary to know whether any such persons were citizens of either of the States under the Confederation at the time of the adoption of the Constitution."

It is not necessary to trouble the House by reading further from this opinion, for I have already shown that colored persons, though descended from African slaves, were citizens in several States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and Judge Curtis says this is conclusive on the subject, and when the appeal was made to the American people at the polls the opinion of Justice Curtis was indorsed. I will trouble the House by reading a brief extract touching this question of citizenship from the able opinion of Justice Gaston in the case above referred to, (North Carolina vs. Manuel):

"According to the laws of this State (North Carolina) all human beings within it who are not slaves fall within one of two classes; whatever distinction may have existed in the Roman laws between citizens and free inhabitants, they are unknown to our institutions. Before our Revolution all free persons born within the dominion of the king of Great Britain, whatever their color or complexion, were native-born British subjects; those born out of this allegiance were aliens; slavery did not exist in England, but it did in the British Colonies. Slaves were not in legal parlance persons, but property; the moment the incapacity, the disqualification of slavery, was removed they became persons, and were then either British subjects or not British subjects according as they were or were not born within the allegiance of the British king. Upon the Revolution no other change took place in the laws of North Carolina than was consequent on the transmission from a colony dependent on a European king to a free and sovereign State. Slaves remained slaves; British subjects in North Carolina became North Carolina freemen; foreigners, until made members of the State, remained aliens; slaves manumitted here became freemen, and therefore, if born within North Carolina, are citizens of North Carolina; and all free persons born within the State are born citizens of the State. The constitution extends the elective franchise to every free man who had arrived at the age of twenty-one and paid a public tax; and it is a matter of universal notoriety that under it free persons, without regard to color, claimed and exercised the franchise until it was taken from the freeman of color a few years since by our amended constitution."

Now, it is certainly settled beyond all question, both by authority and precedent, that free colored persons are citizens, and as such have been admitted to and exercised the right to vote. Why, sir, the assumption that persons of color born in this country, though they may be the descendants of slaves, are not capable of being citizens of the United States, is a naked assumption, not authorized by any word of the Declaration of Independence or of the Constitution of the United States; and I have read with more than ordinary interest all that has been written on this subject, and have failed to find an argument that proves that the Constitution or the Articles of Confederation made color a qualification of citizenship. If color is the test of qualification of citizenship, where does qualification begin and where end? Some sections of our country have been so long under Democratic proslavery rule and domination that the most experienced ethnologist could not determine where the African ends and the Caucasian begins. So unreasonable and unnatural is such a test that it has never found advocates of any respectability in any nation but our own, and if we persist in excluding any portion of our people from the rights of citizenship for no other reason than a difference in the complexion of the skin it must call down upon us the scorn and reprobation of every nation of Christendom.

It seems to me so clear from history and authority that persons of color were citizens under the Confederation, and at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, that it does not admit of a doubt; and it is equally clear that they were citizens and voters in a majority of the original States of the Union, and subject only to the qualifications that were required of other persons. If this be true, the charge made on this floor that the Republican party is introducing new and strange doctrines into the Government touching the rights and qualifications of citizens must fall to the ground. The right of colored persons to become citizens and voters is as old as the Government itself, and has the sanction of the ablest statesmen and purest patriots of all parties that adorn the country's history; and the brightest luminaries of the bench have given the weight of their opinion and authority to the same doctrine. And while insisting upon impartial suffrage in the Government as the right of every man of sufficient age, and not disqualified by crime, we are only asking that the original intention of the Government shall be carried out by guarantying to each citizen all the rights, privileges, and immunities that belong to them, according to the spirit and true intent of the founders of the Government.

Sir, we hear a great deal said about conferring the right of suffrage upon classes of citizens. Are we to understand that law-makers are authorized to traffic in principles and franchises? It is no part of the duties and province of this Government to confer the franchise upon any person or persons further than to secure equal rights among all the citizens. This Government was formed to secure the people in the enjoyments of all their inalienable rights, not to deal out privileges as it may suit the pleasure of parties and party leaders. The moment a Government commences the trade of conferring favors upon one class of citizens and refusing them to another it is guilty of usurping powers not properly conferred upon it. It is said the world is governed too much, and this Government is not an exception. The injustice practiced upon the individual citizen or classes of citizens of all Governments every few years yields its legitimate harvest of war and devastation. The only way to prevent such mischief is to enforce the principle of absolute equality of rights among all the citizens, which is the true principle of this Government, and the one that must and will be enforced.

As long as the Government continues to wander from its legitimate sphere, and enfranchise one man and disfranchise another at pleasure, so long will the people be discontented, and at every election we will hear the popular cry about rights withheld or privileges granted. Confine the Government to its proper sphere of securing the people in the enjoyment of natural rights, and the period of wars and bloodshed will have passed away forever. There is not an instance in the history of the nations of the earth of a war that was not caused by unjust discriminations on the part of the Government in favor of one class of citizens and against another. No Government is, in any true sense, a republic that disfranchises one citizen grown up to manhood unless for cause affecting the public safety. The Declaration of Independence declares what is republicanism, and I am satisfied Congress will soon be compelled to enact that Declaration into positive law. That Declaration declares all Governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed. That consent, in this country, can only be given or withheld at the ballot-box, and the whole adult population must have a legal right to participate in that consent. It is all folly to claim that a State has a republican form of government that disfranchises its citizens grown up to manhood for any cause except the commission of crime. If we as a nation desire to travel the only sure pathway to safety and empire in the future, we must see to it that no citizen, however black and humble he may be, is disfranchised for any cause save for crime.

But, sir, the Democratic party must not be permitted to evade any responsibility in this matter of suffrage, nor must they be deprived of any credit they may be entitled to. The Democratic party in most of the States of the Union where colored persons have been permitted to vote have recognized the right and did not question it under the Constitution of the United States. And where the franchise has been taken from the negro it has not been done because they used it to the danger of the State. No such charge has been made, and it has never been claimed but that the colored voter used the ballot with as much good judgment as the white man. And it is not to be forgotten that the Democratic party is on record on the question of colored suffrage. The Democratic party made the negro a citizen and voter in Maine and New Hampshire. They made the negro a citizen and voter on a property qualification in New York, indorsed and approved by leading Democrats of national character and reputation. The Democratic party repealed the laws of Ohio requiring negroes to give bonds and security before settling in that State. Justice Wood, of Ohio, when on the bench, decided that mulattoes were entitled to the franchise.

The Democratic party afterward elected him Governor of Ohio. The Democratic members of the Legislature of Ohio voted to permit negro children to go to the same schools with white children, and yet in these days that party is perpetually whining about colored suffrage and negro equality and charging us with being a negro party. The Democratic party to-day is in spirit committed to negro suffrage as much as any other party, and always has been. Do they not base representation upon the number of people, whatever may be the color; and when they recognize the negro as a person to be counted in the enumeration when they determine how many Representatives shall be selected to act as the people's agents to carry on the Government? When they do that they concede the whole question. For illustration, we may take the most extreme Democratic State; they adopt the doctrine that representation in their Legislature as well as in Congress shall be founded on numbers of people. All are taken into the count; the negro is considered one of the integral parts of the people who are to be represented, and this virtually gives the suffrage to the negro. He is as much represented in these Halls as any other equal number of the population.

The difference between the Democrats and myself on this question is simply that they virtually give him the ballot, but want some white man to deposit it for him. They are willing they shall be counted to make up and increase the number of Representatives, but want to do the voting and representing themselves. While I say he shall be counted and be permitted to take the ballot in his own hands and deposit it in the ballot-box, the Democrat is willing that the negro should be counted in forming the basis of representation in the rebel States, but wants some white rebel to cast the ballot for him, while I say he shall be counted and vote for himself; and he is more worthy to be trusted than the rebel white man. This attempt to obscure the question and blind the people by charging the Republican party with being in favor of negro equality will hardly stand the test of examination by an intelligent and thinking people.

But it may be said that this would include females and children as well as colored persons, and that they are as certainly embraced in the terms used as are the persons of whom I have been speaking, and that it is essential that they should be included in order to a republican form of government. So far as this argument relates to children it is easily answered. They have certain rights which are as inalienable as those of adults, and, so far as their participating in the Government as voters is concerned, all agree that a time must be fixed uniformly when they are supposed to have sufficient judgment to exercise, safely to themselves and the State, the duties of citizens and voters, and to perform the duties of citizens in every respect. Our laws have fixed the age of twenty-one years. I shall not say whether it is too long or too short; but all must admit the wisdom and necessity of fixing an age, whatever it may be. As to females, if the time comes when they shall demand to be admitted to the franchise, myself and those who act with me now will not be found fighting them because we are afraid to measure intellects with them on terms of equality, as are our Democratic friends afraid to raise the negro to a condition of political and legal equality for fear he will outstrip them in the race of education and progress; nor am I prepared to say how soon some change may be necessary to secure the female in her rights of person and property. Yet the fact that woman does not vote is not inconsistent with the theory of a republican government. The first and natural division of human society is into families, so ordained by the God who made us, and this is recognized in all religions and all systems of law; and the same power that established this relation ordained that there should be but one representative head in that family; and this has been observed by the common consent of mankind, and we have no reason to believe that the best interests of society are not subserved by the male representing the family in the affairs of Government. But I only intended to say on this point what I thought necessary to relieve my argument from any imputation of inconsistency, for this question of female suffrage does not enter into this discussion.

In conclusion, I say, there will never again be as favorable a time as the present to settle this great question. Now, while we are readjusting the stones in the great temple of American freedom; while we are relaying the foundations of the Republic; a Republic that, within the lifetime of some now living, will contain a hundred million souls, and be extended over a territory covered by every zone of the earth, limited only by the continent; controlling a trade and commerce compared with which the boasted commerce of Europe or fabled wealth of the ancients will dwindle into insignificance; with a sea-coast equal to all the world besides; with navigable rivers and inland seas more extensive than can be found in all other lands; with a soil yielding every product of the earth, extending from the fisheries of Sitka and Newfoundland to the orange groves and spice-producing regions of the tropics; with such a prospect and destiny it becomes us to dig deep and lay our foundations upon the rock of Eternal Truth, that when the "winds blow and floods come they fall not." Such a people as are to inhabit this country can only be governed by laws that are just to all, high or low, rich or poor, black or white. No burdens imposed on one class not felt by all; no duty required of one not demanded of all. A Government, thus founded in truth and justice, and fortified in the affections of all the people, we may hope will live as long as human government endures on the earth.

SPEECH OF HON. J. K. MOORHEAD,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 28, 1868.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, after every great war it is necessary that there come the solemn seal of legislative or constitutional enactment before the just and proper fruits of the victory can be secured to the victor and those he represents. Especially is this true after our great war, which is, in many respects, without a parallel in history for destructiveness and violence, and which is chiefly distinguished by the fact that its beginning was predicated upon the overthrow of one set of political ideas and its progress uprooted a system of labor which for hundreds of years had molded the opinions and given tone to the thoughts of many millions of the governing race. The victory would have been but half won if the laying down of arms had not been followed by such legislation as would have firmly knit into the very framework of the Government and the very texture of society the great ideas which the war had evolved and to which its close has given immortal life. The details of the struggle, great as it was, protracted as it was, and desperate as it was, may be soon forgotten; but if the principles it has settled be treasured among our national jewels and be kept untarnished, the glorious story of our triumph over treason will prove the richest legacy any people ever left to their children.

We are now in this stage of effort. The Republican party propose to make the nation's victory effective by incorporating its principles into the national Constitution, and thereby making these results coextensive with the nation's limits and as perpetual as the nation's life. The Democratic party, on the other hand, demand that the wrecks of shattered theories and institutions be suffered to lie across the nation's pathway to obstruct its passage, to weaken its power, and ultimately form a shield and bulwark for the nation's enemies. Every consideration combines to bid us resist this negative, timorous, and treacherous policy. The country's salvation in the dark hours of the war depended, under God, upon brave hearts and bold yet just action. So, now, if the rescued nation is to be preserved undefiled from the corruptions of the past and unharmed by the pestilential dangers of the present, it can only be done by freely but wisely applying to the diseased parts the treatment their condition demands.

Immediately upon the close of hostilities the national heart naturally accepted suggestions of conciliation; and the people acquiesced while President Johnson experimented with these southern communities. They remained quiescent until his policy developed the fact that the southern people were unwilling to accept manfully and honestly the results of their defeat, and that the harmonious existence of the two sections was incompatible with the injustice, vengeance, and hatred upon which their reconstructed governments were based. Congress, the immediate representatives of the people, alarmed by the dangers which threatened the national security, disented from this policy, and after patient investigation inaugurated another, which was submitted to the people in the year 1866, and which proposed as a basis for adjustment the incorporation into the Constitution of what is known as the fourteenth amendment. This amendment commanded the assent of overwhelming majorities of the people in the loyal States, and was ratified by the Legislatures of all but Delaware, Maryland, and Kentucky. But it was rejected by the (so-called) Legislature of every rebel State, whose people thereby exposed their unrelenting purpose to resist any restoration to the Union which involved the surrender by them of rights and powers which they believed ought not to be yielded. They thus effectually obstructed reconstruction and forced on the Congress the alternative of either abandoning all claim of guaranties for the future or taking the only adequate means, that of forcing guaranties upon those whom our arms had conquered. Of course, the latter alternative was promptly taken, and the organization of what is known as the congressional scheme was begun. This system necessarily involved the temporary exercise of military power to repress disorder and protect Unionists from rebel hate, and the creation of a new class of voters who, loyal to the nation and willing to accept its terms, could be relied upon to give their influence to the cause of peaceful and loyal reconstruction. This scheme is in the course of accomplishment. State conventions in nearly all those States have prepared constitutions which the people are discussing and adopting. Arkansas will come asking readmission into the national councils within a few days; and in the next two months we may hope to welcome back to their old places Virginia and North Carolina, Georgia and South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi, and Louisiana. Soon loyal governments will be erected over all that region; manhood suffrage will prove to be the happy solvent of a treason-cursed South; that great region, with its unsurpassed resources and capacities, will be restored to more than former prosperity; and a united America—purified by the fires of revolution—will again reappear with a mightier power and a brighter future than ever before.

This auspicious result, which has been delayed by the mad ambition and treacherous conduct of the President, and for which he is now answering at the bar of the Senate, will cheer the heart of every patriot. To my eyes it will be the more grateful, as my congressional life began with the Congress in which the madness of secession was rampant. I saw the seceding delegations depart with scornful brows and hating hearts. How agreeable now, in the closing months of my congressional life, to see those States returning in the persons of Representatives whose hearts beat with affection for our common flag, whose fealty is freely and sincerely offered to our common country, and whose hands are ready to aid us in strengthening our common institutions. Sir, as the victories of peace are greater than those of war, so will my joy be unbounded at this, the complete fruition of all my hopes, the long-anticipated, the wearily-waited-for end of all our labors and sacrifices!

While I thus felicitate the country upon the early close of this long contest over reconstruction, I would not conceal the fact that while this is the greatest need it is not the only one. On the other hand, the condition of the laboring interest demands prompt and effectual relief. During the war, when there were about one million men in the field, who were thereby withdrawn from industrial operations, the Government was a customer and purchaser of nearly everything which our people could manufacture or produce. Prices were high; the demand for labor was in advance of the supply; wages were correspondingly good; manufacturers readily sold their products, and the internal revenue taxes, necessarily enormous, were freely and easily paid. Now, however, all is changed. The Government has in a great measure ceased to be a purchaser, and the demand for the products of labor has greatly fallen off. The million men lately in arms have in considerable part returned to their ordinary pursuits; and the result is that the supply of labor is in advance of the demand, and thousands of our brave soldiers are now unsuccessfully seeking employment with which to earn subsistence for themselves and families. Mills, factories, and workshops, mining operations, and all the usual means of developing wealth are in great measure suspended, and general stagnation prevails. This, Mr. Speaker, is preëminently the case in my district, where the stagnation of business operations is greater now than it has been for a quarter of a century, and this I believe to be the case in most of the mining and manufacturing districts of the country.

It is the duty of Congress to provide the remedy for this state of things. Various plans of relief have been proposed. If "in the multitude of counselors there is wisdom," so in the multitude of schemes there may be confusion. But it is our task to examine all, select what may be good in each, and combine them into a harmonious system which will give employment to our labor, business for our capital, and prosperity for all. If this can be accomplished, our absolute recovery from financial embarrassment will prove to be but a question of time; for with the diversified labor of the country steadily and fittingly employed, each in its proper department, the accumulating wealth of the nation will inevitably raise us above all our difficulties and embarrassments, and secure a higher relative position than we occupied before the war.

In the mean time retrenchment in all public expenditures must be the rule. The machinery of the Government must be run at the lowest possible cost. All appropriations and subsidies to States, corporations, or individuals—no matter how noble the object or how valuable the enterprise—must be postponed. In everything, except pensions and bounties to the suffering and deserving among our defenders, let us find the minimum and adhere to it.

It is also important that the labor of the country should be relieved from the taxation imposed by existing laws upon articles of manufacture. A step in this direction has been wisely taken in the passage of the bill recently reported from the Committee of Ways and Means "to exempt certain manufactures from internal tax," the chief object of which is to relieve those pursuits engaged in producing the necessities of life and to reduce the number of taxable articles, thereby at the same time reducing the expenses of the internal revenue system. This bill and that which will follow from the same committee of which I am a member, will provide such checks upon illicit traffic as will, I hope, enable the officers of the Government to collect the tax. The penalties for violation of law will be increased and all persons committing fraud upon the revenue be subjected to fine and imprisonment. It is a disgrace to the nation that the tax upon whisky, tobacco, and some other articles cannot, under the present law, be collected; but it is lamentably true. The committee have tried faithfully to supply any defects in the law, and hope that by a strict and vigorous enforcement of it and by sending all violators of it to the penitentiary existing fraudulent rings and conspiracies will be broken up. Should we succeed in this the amount realized thereby, added to the duties on imports, will not only pay the expenses of the Government and the interest on the public debt, but also largely reduce the principal. In that event we can afford to relieve other articles of taxation and gradually reduce the business of the country to its former condition; for I do not hold it to be desirable to raise from taxation out of the present generation the amount necessary to pay or greatly reduce the principal of the public debt. The burdens consequent upon the war have fallen upon us with heavy, almost crushing weight. Let those who are to come after us and who are to gather the lasting benefits of the struggle, and whose enlarged wealth and power will readily enable them to meet it, provide for the redemption of the principal in like manner as the successors of the men who waged our previous wars were obliged to cancel the indebtedness therein incurred.

It is believed by many that a return to specie payments is the great specific for the evils which now afflict the country; and it is urged that it is imperative on us to contract the currency until there is but a small volume to redeem. I am as anxious for a return to specie payments as the most radical advocates of that doctrine; but I am not in favor of reaching that result over the shattered fortunes and general bankruptcy of the active business men of the country, the pioneer men whose sagacity, courage, and industry have added untold millions to the national wealth, and whose interests are a valid claim upon the consideration of a just and enlightened Legislature. I do not believe, sir, that the amount of currency now in circulation in the United States is in excess of the necessities of business, nor do I believe it is sufficient for the legitimate wants of trade. While I am not an inflationist, and do not advocate an increase or new issue of "greenbacks," yet I find that the volume of our currency now is not more than equal to what it was before the war, when wheat was one dollar per bushel, iron forty dollars per ton, wages from seventy-five cents to one dollar per day. The rates now are more than double, and some of them are quadruple, these figures. In this condition of affairs a larger capital is required to carry on business, to raise and move crops, to pay for subsistence, &c.; and it appears to me to be a folly to attempt to force specie payments by reducing or contracting the currency.

The true plan is so to legislate as to keep our gold and silver at home and strengthen business channels, instead of weakening them by exporting gold, and then destroying them by contraction in order to restore them to health and activity! We are now producing more gold and silver annually than any nation on the globe, and I believe about as much as all combined. What becomes of it?

I ask the attention of the House to some statistics which appear to me to throw a flood of light upon this subject.

I find that from 1857 to 1867, inclusive—eleven years—we exported of gold and silver $702,945,883; during the same time we imported, of gold and silver coin and bullion, $175,994,108; excess of coin exports $526,951,775. I give the table in full that the movements of the various years may be observed:

dred and fifty millions. If our annual product had remained in the country, even in considerable proportion, it is very certain that we could soon resume specie payments, for the product of a very few years, added to the sum on hand, would form a basis sufficiently deep and broad to float $1,000,000,000 of currency instead of the six or seven hundred millions now in existence, and it would, at least, be abundant for resumption.

HOW CAN GOLD BE KEPT AT HOME?

How can this gold be kept at home? Not by arbitrary enactments forbidding its exportation and affixing penalties therefor; but the true and the traditional plan, taught us by our fathers and by their English ancestry under like circumstances, is for the Government to legislate so as to develop its own resources, encourage and protect its labor, guard the interests of producers against hurtful and unequal competition, increase old products and create new ones, and, by the benefits of a diversified industry, add to the wealth of the nation, swell its exports, and give the country commercial strength and character. It was from this general view that I voted for the repeal of the tax on cotton. I believed that the production of that article might be stimulated and largely increased by the removal of this exceptional and heavy imposition, and that its reappearance among our articles of commerce would be attended with unspeakable benefits to the section producing it, to the carrying trade of the country, to the cotton manufacturing interest, and to the general interests of all classes. This bill, I am glad to say, has become a law; and Congress has established a precedent which may be wisely followed in the future, as circumstances may permit.

During the eleven years referred to—from 1857 to 1867, inclusive—I find, on examining statistics from official sources, that—

The total imports of foreign merchandise were.....	$3,468,234,718
The total exports of domestic merchandise.....	2,680,509,640
Total excess of imports over exports..	$378,725,078

This sum has been contributed by this country, during these eleven years, to the support of European labor, the encouragement of European institutions, and the maintenance of European ideas, to the direct denial of the claims, interests, and prosperity of our own people. The nation has thus been buying an annual average of over thirty million dollars more than it has sold, and has gone in debt to that amount—a course of trade the direct result of unwise legislation, which, if persisted in, will lead necessarily and inevitably to bankruptcy and decay.

PECULIARITIES OF THE AMERICAN MARKET.

The position of our country as a market is peculiar. Under the high prices of labor and subsistence created by the war the cost of all manufacturing, mining, and agriculture has been greatly increased, while prices have been substantially unchanged in Europe. Our market has, therefore, become the best in which to sell, and foreign products are thrown upon us beyond all precedent. Were it not that duties on imports are required to be paid in gold we would be entirely tributary to the manufacturers of the Old World. This, I fear, will yet be the result if specie payments should be reached before we return to our normal condition. The rapid contractionist seeks to hasten this result, forgetting or disregarding the pregnant fact that this result would be reached through the desolation of business, while ours would be reached harmoniously with general prosperity.

A GENERAL SYSTEM PROPOSED.

I would have this Congress so legislate that foreign imports would be reduced to a sum for which our exports, without gold and silver coin or bullion, would be an equivalent. In doing this I would increase the duties upon all articles of luxury which the rich who use them can afford to pay for. On articles, also, manufactured in this country I would increase the duty to the point of protection, so as to reduce the quantity received rather than open freely the flood-gates and be submerged in the flowing tide; but so adjusting the system as not to reduce the revenue below the existing yield, but giving us a smaller quantity of goods with which to glut our market.

This legislation is practicable as a system, and if adopted would inevitably produce results of the highest value to the whole country. Adopt it and our industry will be awakened, the balance of trade will be in our favor, skilled laborers will flock to us for homes and fortunes, manufacturing will spread throughout our borders, producer and consumer will be brought together, and this nation will soon become, as I believe it is her destiny to be, the wealthiest, most prosperous, and most powerful of all nationalities, thus, at the same time, most effectually crushing all propositions, under whatever pretexts, which are aimed at the national credit, or if adopted would tarnish our financial honor.

SPEECH OF HON. H. E. PAINE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 21, 1868,

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the President's annual message.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Chairman, the burdens of taxation beneath which our people now struggle are so oppressive that I for one cannot vote to appropriate $7,000,000 of their money to pay for the Russian possessions in America, unless convinced that as a Representative I am constitutionally, and therefore morally, bound to fulfill the promise which the President and Senate have made. Most of the advocates of this appropriation insist that we cannot withhold it without a breach of solemn duty on our own part and of plighted faith on the part of the nation. With me the only question in the case is that which I now rise to debate, whether we have or have not a constitutional right to grant or refuse, at our discretion, an appropriation of the money promised by the President and Senate to the Russian emperor for his American possessions.

It is provided in the Constitution of the United States that the President—

"Shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."

The treaty power conferred by this provision must assume one of the three following forms, namely:

1. The power to make all engagements recognized as treaties by the law of nations, whether the acts to be performed fall within the scope of the powers delegated by the Constitution to the United States, or within the scope of the powers reserved to the States and to the people.
2. The power to make such, and only such, treaties as can be fulfilled by the exercise of the powers delegated by the Constitution to the United States.
3. The power to make such, and only such, treaties as are not only included within the scope of the powers delegated to the Federal Government, but are also capable of fulfillment without the exercise of any of the powers vested exclusively in the legislative department of that Government.

If we find the last to be the correct interpretation of the Constitution, if it confers upon the President and Senate the power to make only such treaties as fall within the limits of the Federal powers delegated by the Constitution, and can at the same time be fulfilled without the exercise of any of the powers vested exclusively in Congress, then we shall also find it to be both our right and our duty to exercise the freest discretion in deciding whether to grant or withhold the appropriation of the amount stipulated in the recent treaty with Russia. But if either of the other interpretations is correct, I admit that we are bound by the strongest obligations, constitutional and moral, to make the appropriation without stopping to discuss the merits of the treaty.

The first question encountered, then, is whether all the treaty power of sovereignty is conferred by the Constitution upon the Federal Government. Let us decide this question, if we can, before we inquire by what branch of the Government or in what manner this power is to be exercised. The extent of the treaty power vested by the Constitution in the Federal Government would involve comparatively little difficulty if our Government were a simple and not a complex sovereignty; if it were a single, central Government, clothed with all governmental powers, and not, as it is, a compound Government, with one portion of them vested in the Federal Government, and the residue reserved to the States and people. If ours were such a Government, it would not be possible to doubt that the treaty power, conferred by the Constitution upon the Federal Government, was the entire treaty power of sovereignty as known to the law of nations.

But inasmuch as the powers of the Federal Government are limited, and all not delegated by the Constitution to the United States nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people, the question arises whether the President and the Senate in the exercise of the treaty power are excluded from those reserved powers of the States and people, or may, through the device of a treaty, invade them at their discretion; whether the Federal Government, while in the exercise of the treaty power, is restricted to certain subjects and modes, or is absolutely unrestrained; whether the Federal Government can, by means of a treaty, compel a State to perform an act the performance of which is, by the Constitution, left to the discretion of the State; whether the President and Senate can do by treaty that which the whole Government is forbidden to do in any way.

The clauses of the Constitution relating to the treaty power are in the following words: The President—

"Shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."

"No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation." "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign Power."

In 1857 the President, at the request of the Prussian minister, required the opinion of Attorney General Cushing respecting this power of the President and Senate to override State laws by treaty stipulations. Mr. Cushing, in his opinion, holds that the power which the Constitution bestows on the President to make treaties, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is not only general in terms and without any express limitation, but is accompanied with absolute prohibition of the exercise of treaty power by the States; and that, therefore, in the matter of foreign negotiation, the States have conferred the whole of their power, in other words, all the treaty powers of sovereignty, on the United States. He bases his conclusion upon two assumed propositions of fact: first, that the treaty power conferred by the Constitution upon the Federal Government is undefined; and second, that all treaty power is withheld from the States. Granting, for the sake of argument, that these propositions are true, will they sustain his conclusion? Is it reasonable to assume that the framers of the Constitution, which withholds such a large proportion of public acts from the jurisdiction of the Federal Government altogether, intended to authorize that Government, by means of a treaty of the President and Senate, to perform or compel the States or people to perform all of these acts? Is it reasonable to suppose that all the guards thrown around the States and the people by that instrument were intended to be nugatory whenever the President and Senate should, by a resort to the treaty power, attempt to impose upon them an obligation to do that which the Constitution gives them full discretion to do or not to do?

This reasoning of Mr. Cushing involves many fallacies. In the first place, it supposes our Federal Government to occupy, so far as this question is concerned, the attitude of a Government in which all sovereign powers are concentrated. It overlooks the material fact that a large portion of these powers are, by our Constitution, reserved to the people and the States for the specific purpose of security against just such oppressions as would inevitably result from the exercise of this form of the treaty power. If the British Government, the king and Parliament cooperating, make a treaty binding England to the performance of such acts as in this country can only be performed by the States, the obligation may be perfect, because the king and Parliament have all power, and can perform or compel the performance of the stipulated acts; but in this country the central Government has no such omnipotence.

It is not reasonable to say that a power conferred upon this limited Government is absolute and unlimited merely because it is undefined, although it might be reasonable to say that of an undefined grant to such a Government as that of Great Britain. Nor would the fact, if it were the fact, that the Constitution forbids States to stipulate with foreign nations to perform acts which they alone have power to perform, tend to authorize the Federal Government to bind the States to perform such acts. Mr. Cushing's opinion involves the further fallacy that unless the Federal Government can make treaties of this class a portion of the treaty power, well known to the law of nations, cannot be exercised at all. If treaties of this kind are required they can easily be made, without any invasion of the jurisdiction reserved by the Constitution to the States, in the very mode adopted in the northeastern boundary treaty with Great Britain, and proposed by the President in the French treaty of 1853, leaving to the States concerned their constitutional right to do or not to do the acts proposed, and making the consummation of the treaty dependent on the action of such States.

The Government of the United States declared to the British Government, pending the questions respecting our northeastern boundaries, that it had no power to cede any part of the territory claimed by the State of Maine without the consent of that State. Nor did the Federal Government act on the subject until it had provided that commissioners, on the part of Maine and Massachusetts, should be present at the negotiation and assent to the boundary line agreed upon. In the treaty with France of 1853 the President only stipulated to recommend to the several States the enactment of laws to relieve French subjects from disability to hold land in the United States.

But we should not forget that there is a positive provision of the Constitution which preserves this branch of the treaty power the possible loss of which occasions so much apprehension. I refer to the section which permits States, with the consent of Congress, to enter into agreements or compacts with other States or with foreign Powers. Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries, considered the distinction between "treaties," which are absolutely prohibited to the States, and "agreements or compacts," which they are permitted to make with the consent of Congress. He observed that this distinction was nowhere explained, and had never been subjected to any exact judicial or other examination, and stated his own conclusion in the following words, namely:

"The latter clause, compacts and agreements, might then very properly apply to such as regarded what might be deemed mere private rights of sovereignty: such as questions of boundary, interests in land situated in the territory of each other, and other internal regulations for the mutual comfort and convenience of States bordering on each other. In such cases the consent of Congress may be properly required in order to check any infringement of the rights of the national Government; and at the same time a total prohibition to enter into any compact or agreement might be attended with permanent inconvenience or public mischief."

But the consequences of Mr. Cushing's interpretation would be most intolerable. If the Federal Government could by treaty bind the nation or the States to the performance of acts within the exclusive cognizance of the States it could compel the States to enact, enforce, or repeal laws affecting not only the tenure of lands within the States, but also marriage, divorce, guardianship, testaments, administration, incorporations, crimes, and all the other innumerable subjects most wisely left by the Constitution to State legislation. For example, the President and Senate, by a treaty with the Sultan of Turkey, could provide that his subjects resident in the United States should be permitted to bring hither all their wives and practice polygamy in any of the States. By a treaty with the Pope they could compel particular States to make marriage an ecclesiastical ordinance for one portion of the people and a civil contract for another. By treaties they could compel particular States to make divorce the subject of ecclesiastical cognizance in some cases and of judicial cognizance in others, and to grant divorces for one cause to residents of one nationality and for another cause to residents of another.

The first article of the amendments of the Constitution provides that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. But Congress only is prohibited. If, therefore, the treaty-making power of the President and Senate embraces in its scope those subjects which are reserved to the control of the States and people, it may provide for an establishment of religion, or prohibit the exercise thereof, or abridge the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Mr. Cushing relies upon the following judicial authorities: Fairfax vs. Hunter, 7 Cranch, 627; Ware vs. Hylton, 3 Dallas, 199; and People vs. Gerke, 5 Cal., 381.

But what is the precise point decided by the court in the case referred to in 7 Cranch? The opinion was pronounced by Mr. Justice Story, and includes a statement of the facts on which the decision is founded. The ninth article of the treaty of 1794 is in the following words:

"It is agreed that British subjects who now hold lands in the territories of the United States and American citizens who now hold lands in the dominions of his majesty shall continue to hold them, according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates and titles therein, and may grant, sell, or devise the same to whom they please, in like manner as if they were natives; and that neither they nor their heirs or assigns shall, so far as respects the said lands and the legal remedies incident thereto, be considered as aliens."

Lord Fairfax, a citizen and resident of Virginia, died in December, 1781, during the Revolution, seized of certain lands in that State, which, by his last will and testament, he devised to Denny Fairfax, a British subject and alien enemy. The question was whether the lands were vested in the Commonwealth of Virginia or in the devisee. The court held that, by the common law, Denny Fairfax, an alien, could take lands by purchase, though not by descent; that it was immaterial whether the purchase was by grant or devise; that his title could not be divested before office found; that by no public acts of Virginia were the lands ever vested in the Commonwealth, during the war or after the war; and that no act subsequent to the treaty of 1794 could so vest them, because that treaty protected the title of the devisee. The decision was not that the President and Senate could, by treaty, compel a State to permit aliens thereafter to acquire lands and to hold them, but that the State of Virginia had not, since the treaty of 1794, attempted by legislation to appropriate these lands to herself, and could not have done so if she had attempted it. It is obvious that the weight of this authority would be much greater if the court had found subsisting State legislation which it was necessary to override, and had overridden it. But the court expressly declared that no such legislation was in the way, and then, by what amounts to little more than an obiter dictum, declared that if any such obstacle had existed they would have removed it.

In Ware vs. Hylton, the second case referred to by Mr. Cushing, it was held that by our treaty of peace with England, concluded September 3, 1783, the Virginia statute of 1779 confiscating debts due British enemies was annulled. But this treaty was made under the Confederation, four years before the establishment of our Constitution. The case, therefore, has no weight as an authority. While it is true, as Mr. Cushing states, that the supreme court of California, in 1855, in a case involving one of the articles of our Prussian treaty of 1828, did decide that the President and Senate had the power, by treaty, to provide that upon the death of a person holding real estate within one of the States which would, by the law of such State, descend to a Prussian subject, but for the disqualification of alienage, such Prussian subject should be allowed a reasonable time to sell the real estate and withdraw the proceeds. But even this decision was repudiated by the same court in the next year (1856) in the case of Siemssen vs. Bofer, in which Chief Justice Murray said:

"The treaty-making power can only be coeval with the express grant of power to the Federal Government, and can never be extended, by implication, to the reserved powers of the States, or matters which belong to State sovereignty, or the right which appertains to govern her own domestic concerns and establish her own police regulations; neither can the exercise of this power, on the part of the President and Senate, be extended to matters which are the proper subject of congressional legislation."

These considerations, sir, render it perfectly clear to my mind that the treaty power of the President and Senate only extends to such engagements as can be fulfilled by the exercise of the powers delegated to the Federal Government without invading those reserved to the States or people.

The next question is whether the President and Senate can bind the nation by treaties which involve the exercise of all the powers delegated to the Federal Government, or only by such as do not involve the exercise of powers exclusively vested in the legislative department of that Government.

The provisions of the Constitution specially relating to the treaty power have been already cited. That instrument contains also the following provisions:

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." "The Congress shall have power" [to do the acts specified in the seventeen sub-divisions of the eighth section of the first article.] "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in consequence of appropriations made by law."

It is a familiar canon of interpretation that if two provisions are susceptible of different interpretations, that which would destroy one of them is to be rejected, and that which would preserve both is to be accepted.

Let us apply this rule to the constitutional provisions conferring treaty power upon the President and Senate and to those conferring legislative power upon Congress. We shall find that the interpretation which empowers the President and Senate by treaty to bind the United States to the performance of acts which can only be performed by the exercise of powers vested exclusively in the Legislature, and to impose upon Congress the duty of discharging these obligations, virtually annihilates the legislative power of Congress. For under that interpretation the President and Senate could, by treaty, bind the United States to such a system of duties on imports and internal taxes for fifty years, as would for that period prevent the payment of a penny of the interest or principal of the national debt, or to such rates of taxation as would compel us to pay, if possible, half or even the whole of the debt in a single year; and Congress, which under the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution has power to impose taxes and tariffs, would be constitutionally bound to discharge the obligation.

They could in like manner, by treaty with a European Power, bind the United States to take a European loan at such rates, on such terms, for such purposes, and in such amounts, as they might in their discretion determine; and Congress, which alone has power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, would be bound to carry out the treaty stipulation. They could, by commercial treaties with all of the commercial nations of the earth, actually regulate all our foreign commerce, so that Congress, which by the Constitution is vested with exclusive power to regulate our commerce with all foreign nations, would by the act of the President and Senate be divested of the power to regulate it with one of them. They could by treaties with foreign Powers stipulate to adopt certain regulations for our inter-State commerce; and Congress, which has the power to regulate commerce among the several States, would be bound to fulfill the contract, surrendering its own discretion, and recognizing, as its rule of action, not the good of the people or the States, but the letter of the bond held by a foreign Power.

They would have the constitutional power to regulate commerce with every Indian tribe; and thus Congress, which is by the Constitution authorized to regulate commerce with all Indian tribes, would be permitted by the President and Senate to regulate commerce with not one of them. They would have the constitutional power to stipulate with the queen of England or king of Prussia for such modifications of our naturalization laws as would render it permanently impossible for the Irish subjects of the former or the German subjects of the latter to become citizens of our Republic. In truth, they would enjoy the constitutional right of establishing, by means of treaties with foreign Powers, a rule of naturalization applicable to all immigrants, which would make acquired citizenship as cheap or dear as they might see fit to make it, and would leave Congress, which has, under the Constitution, exclusive control of naturalization, absolutely divested of all control over the subject.

They would have the power to provide by treaty for the interests of foreign creditors in cases of bankruptcy; and Congress, though invested by the Constitution with the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, would be bound to carry out their provisions and surrender its own power.

The President and Senate could, by treaties with foreign nations, regulate the entire subject of the coinage, fixing the weight, size, form, and composition of the several pieces, their value as compared with each other and with gold, and their value in the coins of the other nations; and Congress would be bound faithfully to execute the stipulation, although itself exclusively invested by the Constitution with the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins.

They could adopt by treaty a common standard of weights and measures, and Congress, although clothed with the exclusive power to fix the standard of weights and measures, would nevertheless be bound by the Constitution to exercise no power over the subject.

They would have the right, by a treaty with the emperor of China, to fix the punishment to be inflicted upon his subjects resident in California for counterfeiting our coin, and to indicate the tribunal and manner of trial. They might make similar stipulations with the emperor of France for the punishment of counterfeiters of our national bonds. In both cases we should be held by the agreement, although invested by the Constitution with the exclusive power to provide the punishment for counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States.

They could determine by treaty the rates of postage on matter mailed or received by foreigners resident in the United States, and agree to establish routes and offices for their benefit, and we should be bound to fulfill their engagements, whether they secured to foreigners the most valuable advantages or imposed upon them the most oppressive disabilities.

They would have the power to bind the United States to all conceivable modifications of our patent and copyright laws to the advantage or disadvantage of the citizens of, or emigrants from, one or several foreign nations, and we, with plenary power over patents and copyrights in our own hands, would nevertheless be morally bound to discharge the obligation.

They would have the right by treaties to determine the constitution of inferior United States courts for the trial of all cases cognizable by Federal courts, to which immigrants from certain nations should be parties, whether Irishmen, Germans, Englishmen, Scandinavians, Africans, or Chinese; they might even stipulate as to the nationality of judges, jurors, and witnesses; and yet Congress would be bound by their engagements, although clothed with the exclusive power to constitute these tribunals.

They would have the constitutional right to bind the United States by a treaty of alliance with England to declare and prosecute war against Russia, and Congress, which has under the Constitution exclusive power to declare war, would be obliged to carry out the agreement. They would have the same constitutional right, by a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive with the king of Abyssinia, to bind our Government to grant letters of marque and reprisal against England, and to impose the duty of performing the stipulations upon Congress which alone has power to grant letters of marque and reprisal.

And they would have the right to provide by treaty stipulations for disposing of captures made in either of those cases, which stipulations would be obligatory upon us, notwithstanding the exclusive power of Congress to make rules concerning captures on land and water.

They could bind us at their discretion, by a treaty of alliance with France, not only to declare war against Mexico or England, or both, but also to raise and support armies, of whatever size, for operations in Mexico or Canada or elsewhere; and it would be our imperative duty to make the declaration, to raise the armies, and to maintain them during the period covered by the treaty, although Congress alone has power to raise and support armies as well as to declare war. And if, under the clause which ordains that no appropriation of money to raise or support armies shall be for a longer term than two years, it should indeed be impossible for them to dispense with the formality of biennial appropriations, the result would be the same, because we should be bound by the contract to make every stipulated appropriation by a purely perfunctory vote.

By the same treaty, and for the prosecution of the same war, they might bind Congress to provide a navy of any size, and to maintain it for any length of time, and, naval appropriations not being limited by the Constitution, to make at the outset any stipulated appropriation of money for the entire period. By the same treaty, also, they might agree to rules for the government and regulation of the allied armies and navies; and Congress, although it has exclusive power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, would be absolutely bound by such a treaty. They could stipulate with foreign nations that the militia to be called forth to execute the laws, or suppress insurrections, or repel invasions in certain cases, should consist wholly, or in part, or not at all, of alien immigrants from such nations; and Congress, which has power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, would be bound by their stipulations.

The President and Senate could, in a treaty of alliance, fix the number of militia to be called forth in case of invasion, determine what classes of native-born or naturalized citizens or resident aliens should or should not be embodied in such militia, and how they should be organized, armed, disciplined, and governed; and nothing but obedience would remain for Congress, which, under the Constitution, has power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States. They would have the constitutional right, by treaty, to stipulate, to the advantage or disadvantage of immigrants from this or that foreign nation, that the statute laws of the District of Columbia should receive certain modifications affecting the inheritance and purchase of lands by aliens, marriage, divorce, incorporations, guardianship, administration, crimes, the tribunals for the cognizance of civil and criminal cases, and even the elective franchise itself, and we should be in honor and by the Constitution bound to make the promise good, although Congress has power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the district in which is located the seat of government of the United States. And, furthermore, Congress would be bound to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying all these stipulations into execution.

These, sir, are some of the consequences which would inevitably follow if the President and Senate had power to bind the Government by treaty to the performance of acts which Congress only can perform. These results would spring, not from the gross abuse, but from the simple exercise of constitutional power. If the President and Senate are clothed with this power, they have precisely the same right to exercise it, at their discretion, in good faith, and in a patriotic spirit, which they have to exercise any other constitutional power. Indeed, it will be their duty to exercise it whenever, in their judgment, its exercise will promote the public good.

Bear in mind that each of the stipulations which I have supposed falls clearly within the classes of engagements recognized as legitimate treaties by all expounders of the law of nations. And I have considered, in their order, all of the powers, exceeding forty in number, specifically vested in Congress by the well-known eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. I have shown that if the treaty-making power extends to contracts which Congress, and Congress only, can fulfill, then the President and Senate have the power and the right, whenever in their judgment the public good shall warrant it, to prevent, compel, or regulate the exercise by Congress of any of these powers.

HO. OF REPS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Paine.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

But, sir, these are not all of the absurd results of such a construction. The Constitution declares that no person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign State. If, therefore, the President and Senate can constitutionally make any treaty engagements, being legitimate under the law of nations, which Congress, and Congress only, can fulfill, then, by a treaty of alliance with Russia, nay, by this very treaty itself, they might compel us to consent that the emperor should confer upon our Secretary of State the title of baron of Alaska or nabob of all the Walrussias.

Again, the Constitution provides that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with a foreign Power. If, then, the President and Senate have the treaty-making power supposed, they have the right, in a commercial treaty with England, to stipulate that Congress shall consent to the negotiation of an agreement or compact between the British Government and the State of Maine, and our consent must be given and the compact sacredly observed, even though it should involve the most radical changes in our commercial, maritime, and financial legislation. In precisely the same way the President and Senate might be able to enforce the consent of Congress to the levying of imposts and duties upon exports and imports, to the laying of differential duties of tonnage, to the keeping of troops and ships of war in time of peace, and to the waging of war, under compacts or agreements with foreign Powers by one or several States of the Union.

Nay, sir, upon the same principle of construction, the President and Senate would have the constitutional right to provide, in a treaty of alliance, not only what subsidies should be contributed, but also what revenue bills should be originated by the House and enacted by Congress for the payment of such subsidies, and could prescribe the rules and regulations to be made by Congress respecting acquired territory and the terms of admission of new States and oblige Congress to admit such States, and could actually bind Congress to propose specified amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution requires the rule of naturalization established by Congress to be uniform. But if the President and Senate can by treaty touch the subject of naturalization they are not governed by this rule of uniformity. The Constitution, in like manner, requires laws enacted by Congress on the subject of bankruptcy to be uniform throughout the United States. But if the treaty-making power can embrace the subject of bankruptcy it will be governed by no rule of uniformity.

In the ninth section of the first article it was provided that the importation of slaves should not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808. No such prohibition was laid upon the treaty power. But it is hardly possible to conceive of the wrath of the slave power if the President and Senate had, before 1808, by treaty, ventured to terminate our slave trade, as they certainly had a constitutional right to do if our opponents are correct in their views of the obligation of the House to make this appropriation.

Mr. Fisher Ames, in the memorable debate of 1796, insisted that the doctrine which gives the House of Representatives a discretion in treaty appropriations, while ostensibly yielding the treaty power to the President and Senate exclusively, does virtually assert for the House either the right to make treaties or the right to break them. But it might, with equal propriety, be said that the British American Provinces were parties to the reciprocity treaty of 1854, for the reason that it contemplated the enactment of certain laws by the several provincial parliaments. Those stipulations of a treaty made by the President and Senate, which involve the exercise of powers vested exclusively in Congress, while they cannot proprio vigore pledge the faith of the nation, may, nevertheless, be rendered valid in presenti, or of perfect obligation in futuro, by antecedent or subsequent legislation. Stipulations for the present or future performance of acts within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress are not, and cannot be, absolute, whatever they purport to be, unless Congress provides the requisite antecedent or subsequent legislation. In no other way can they become a part of the supreme law of the land. This involves no participation by the House of Representatives in the treaty-making power. This House is no more a party to such a treaty, for the mere reason that it cannot be consummated without our deliberative action, than is an individual a party to a contract for the mere reason that the contract is conditioned upon the performance of certain acts by himself, any more than a railway company is a party to a contract of an express company for the mere reason that the contract can only be fulfilled by using the railway.

It is said that if the House of Representatives may at its discretion withhold this appropriation it may, for the same reason, withhold an appropriation to pay the expenses incident to the negotiation or execution of a treaty admitted to be within the constitutional power of the President and Senate. But this is not true. The House, although it may have the power, has no more constitutional right to withhold an appropriation necessary to defray the expenses of negotiating or executing a treaty which comes within the treaty power, than to withhold the salaries of the President and judges, despite the positive provisions of the Constitution on the subject. In the present case the appropriation is not asked to defray the expense incident to an obligation which the President had a right to make, but to pay the principal of a debt which he had no right to contract.

It is urged that the small States have a right to insist that the President and Senate shall exercise the treaty-making power. But they certainly have no right to insist that they shall exercise the legislative power conferred upon Congress. And the question still remains, what is included in the treaty-making power?

We are assured that it is our duty to make this appropriation because a treaty is the supreme law of the land. But the question again recurs, is this now a treaty in the constitutional sense? If not it is no supreme law, merely because its friends see fit to style it a treaty. But if it is a valid treaty, and therefore the supreme law of the land, it is to be remembered that the very same clause of the Constitution which makes a treaty the supreme law of the land makes something else also the supreme law of the land. This is the language of the clause:

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

The Constitution, then, is the supreme law. So are the statutes. If treaties are the supreme law they are not the only supreme law. Are they supreme over both the Constitution and statutes? I should be glad to know why. Are they supreme over the statutes? I should be glad to know why. Certainly if there is anything in the order of statement in this section to indicate the relative rank of Constitution, statute, and treaties the last are lowest. But, granting that the Constitution is supreme over both the others, we certainly must insist that if statutes are not supreme over treaties so, also, are treaties not supreme over statutes. In my judgment they stand, within their respective spheres, on a footing of equal dignity and authority; and if the Constitution is scrupulously obeyed neither can, by any possibility, be placed in supremacy over the other. On the 4th day of July, 1789, President Washington approved the second act of the First Congress. This act contained a provision that certain teas imported from China in American bottoms should pay specified duties. Now, if President Washington had attempted by treaty to annul or repeal that act he would have failed. Over it his treaty would not have been supreme. By such a treaty the faith of the nation would not have been, in any way, pledged to the Chinese empire. But if that act had provided that these duties should be reduced one half, whenever the Chinese Government should, by treaty, secure to us in return certain advantages for American productions, then such a treaty, duly made, would have been stronger than subsequent legislation, because it would have been a valid contract pledging the faith of the nation.

Assuming that treaties and statutes are of equal dignity, some jurists and statesmen have supposed them to occupy common ground, so that either could repeal the other. Of course a treaty might, by its terms, be made virtually repealable by statute and vice versa; but neither can of its own force repeal the other. Whether equal in dignity or not, they do not stand on common ground. Hence neither can be supreme over the other. Both are subordinate to the Constitution, but both are supreme over State constitutions, and State laws; and are supreme laws, under the Constitution, for all the people of the States.

The doctrine laid down in Jefferson's Manual is in these words:

"By the Constitution of the United States this department of legislation is confided to two branches only of the ordinary legislature; the President originating and the Senate having a negative. To what subjects this power extends has not been defined in detail by the Constitution; nor are we entirely agreed among ourselves. 1. It is admitted that it must concern the foreign nation party to the contract, or it would be a mere nullity, res inter alios acta. 2. By the general power to make treaties, the Constitution must have intended to comprehend only those subjects which are usually regulated by treaty, and cannot be otherwise regulated. 3. It must have meant to except out of these the rights reserved to the States; for surely the President and Senate cannot do by treaty what the whole Government is interdicted from doing in any way. 4. And also to except those subjects of legislation in which it gave a participation to the House of Representatives. This last exception is denied by some on the ground that it would leave very little for the treaty power to work on. The less the better say others. The Constitution thought it wise to restrain the Executive and Senate from entangling and embroiling our affairs with those of Europe. Besides, as the negotiations are carried on by the Executive alone, the subjecting to the ratification of the Representatives, such articles as are within their participation is no more inconvenient than to the Senate. But the ground of this exception is denied as unfounded. For examine, e. g., the treaty of commerce with France, and it will be found that out of thirty-one articles there are not more than small portions of two or three of them which would not still remain as subjects of treaties untouched by these exceptions."

The emperor of Russia is, by the law of nations, bound to take notice where the power to appropriate money resides and how far the treaty power extends under our Constitution. This rests upon a principle of international law too well established to admit of argument.

The claim that the President and Senate may make treaties which involve the exercise of powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress is supported by no judicial authority. The cases in 2, 6, and 7 Peters and 1 Barbour do not touch this question. In 5 McLean, 344, it is expressly denied that Congress is bound without discretion to appropriate money called for by treaty. The language of the court is this:

"And in such a case the Representatives of the people and the States exercise their own judgment in granting or withholding the money. They act upon their own responsibility and not upon the responsibility of the treaty-making power. It cannot bind or control the legislative action in this respect, and every foreign Government may be presumed to know that, so far as the treaty stipulates to pay money, the legislative sanction is required."

The arguments of some of the text-writers in support of the power of the President and Senate to bind the nation by treaty as to matters of exclusive legislative cognizance are characterized by remarkable inaccuracy of statement. Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, states that the House of Representatives, in 1796, declared by a resolution that when a treaty depended for the execution of any of its stipulations on an act of Congress it was the right and duty of the House to deliberate on the expediency or in expediency of carrying such treaty into effect.

He adds that this circumstance could not be mentioned without equal regret and astonishment. And he attempts to avoid the force of this resolution by the following remarkable discolorations of the facts of history. He first asserts that the resolution was a naked abstract claim of right never acted upon, and that Congress shortly after framed a law to carry into effect the very treaty with Great Britain which gave rise to the resolution. Whereas the fact is that the constitutional right of Congress to withhold the legislation required by the treaty and the expediency of withholding it under the circumstances of the particular case were two distinct questions before the House; and ten of the Representatives, who believed in their right to withhold the legislation and voted for the resolution setting forth that right, did also believe in the expediency of the particular treaty, and therefore voted for the law—just as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] proposes to do in the case of the treaty now before the House.

He observes that President Washington, in his message of March 30, 1796, explicitly denied the existence of any such power in Congress. His message, however, was received by the House eight days before the adoption of the resolution. And the authority of the resolution of 1796 is augmented by the circumstance that, notwithstanding such a message from such a source, the vote stood:

Yeas in the House.....	57
Yeas absent.....	6
Nays in the House.....	35
Nays absent.....	1

He concludes with this confident assertion, that the argument in favor of the binding and conclusive efficacy of every treaty made by the President and Senate is so clear and palpable that it has probably carried very general conviction throughout the community, and this might be considered the decided sense of public opinion; and that this was the sense of the House of Representatives in 1816, and the resolution of 1796 would not be repeated. But the fact is that in the case of 1816 referred to by Chancellor Kent, which was the debate and vote upon the bill for carrying into effect the convention of commerce between the United States and Great Britain, every speaker opposed to the House bill, including Calhoun, Pickering, Gaston, and Hopkins, took the ground that the President and Senate had the power to modify duties by treaty, and that confirmatory legislation was superfluous and an invasion of the prerogatives of the President and Senate; whereas all who spoke for the bill, including Randolph, Gholsen, Lowndes, King, and Reynolds, took exactly the opposite ground, and insisted that the treaty required confirmatory legislation to make it valid. And the House bill was passed January 13, 1816, by a vote of 85 to 71. The sense of the House of Representatives in 1816 was exactly the opposite of what Mr. Kent states it to have been. And the resolution of 1796 was rather affirmed than repudiated by that vote. The Senate had three days earlier passed their own bill, enacting that all acts in conflict with the treaty should be deemed and taken to be of no force or effect. This was tantamount to a declaration that the treaty could not, without an act of legislation, alter the duties. And by the statute, passed after conference by both Houses, it was enacted that so much of any act as imposed higher duties on British than on American bottoms, contrary to the treaty, should be deemed and taken to be of no force or effect.

In his letter to Mr. Giles, dated December 31, 1795, Mr. Jefferson expressed the opinion that it was the true theory of our Constitution that when a treaty is made involving matters confided by the Constitution to the three branches of the Legislature conjointly the Representatives are as free as the President and Senate were to consider whether the national interest requires or forbids their giving the forms and force of law to the articles over which they have a power. And in a letter to Mr. Madison, of date March 27, 1796, he said that, while this doctrine was not without its difficulties, they were not so insuperable as those of the opposite theory, which he insisted would in fact annihilate the whole of the powers given by the Constitution to the Legislature.

Of course, if we look to the executive department of the Government for authorities, we shall find many to sustain the broadest possible construction of the treaty power. But it is certainly remarkable that in Mr. Wheaton's treatise the instructions of Mr. Calhoun, Secretary of State in 1844, to Mr. Wheaton, then minister to Prussia, respecting a proposed customs treaty with the Zoll-Verein, in which he asserted the right to change and regulate duties by treaty, and said:

"So well is the practice settled that it is believed it has never before been questioned."

Are cited as authority, when not only had scores of statesmen, from 1796 to 1840, repeatedly and successfully assailed that precise practice, but in 1843 Mr. Upshur, the predecessor of Mr. Calhoun in the office of Secretary of State, had actually instructed Mr. Wheaton, respecting the very same treaty, to bear "always in mind that the sanction of Congress, as well as of the Executive, will be indispensably required;" and this was the precise issue in the great contest of 1816, in which Mr. Calhoun himself was a conspicuous leader and was signally defeated; and, moreover, scores, if not hundreds, of statutes refute the assertion.

Mr. Wheaton declares that—

"Under the Constitution of the United States, by which treaties made and ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, are declared to be 'the supreme law of the land,' it seems to be understood that the Congress is bound to redeem the national faith thus pledged and to pass the laws necessary to carry the treaty into effect."

This statement must have had no little weight, not merely in foreign countries, where there is comparatively little opportunity to verify it, but also in our own country, even upon reflecting minds not specially informed upon this subjects.

Now, Mr. Wheaton was himself a diplomatist for more than twenty years. The ordinary esprit du corps and natural inclination ampliare jurisdictionem, abundantly explain and excuse what only purports to be a mere expression of opinion. But Mr. Lawrence, his annotator, seems to have been betrayed, by devotion to a favorite constitutional theory, into an unfair statement of the legislative and judicial authorities bearing upon the question. He states the results of the contests of 1796 and 1816 to have been exactly the reverse of what they were. He asserts, also, that President Jackson's recommendation of reprisals upon France, in case indemnity should not be made by the French Legislature for spoiliations on our commerce, is an authority for the doctrine that Congress is bound to appropriate money to carry out treaties when made by the President and Senate. Accepting General Jackson as an expounder of the Constitution, for others as well as for himself, we shall find his exposition very different from that indicated by Mr. Lawrence.

For a quarter of a century the French Government had, under circumstances of great aggravation, postponed the payment of claims due to our citizens for the most indefensible wrongs and depredations. At length a treaty was made by which these demands were liquidated. But for two years the French Chamber failed to appropriate money to pay them, and President Jackson, in his annual message of 1834, suggested compulsory measures in the event of further delay. But the gravamen of his charges against France was, not that the Chamber had neglected to appropriate when required by the king's treaty, but that it had neglected to appropriate when called on to discharge a long-deferred and most urgent demand of American citizens. General Jackson stood not upon his bargain, but upon the merits of his claim, which was older than the treaty by twenty-five years. If by the treaty the king had agreed not to pay an old debt, but to pay five million francs for a new island, and the Chambers had declined to appropriate, exercising a right secured to them by the French Constitution, President Jackson's message would have been, not just and patriotic, but barbarous and preposterous.

Mr. Lawrence refers to the fact that the Senate declined to ratify the treaty with the Zoll-Verein of 1844, the Committee on Foreign Relations having reported that it was—

"An innovation on the ancient and uniform practice of the Government to change (by treaty) duties laid by law?"

And that—

"The Constitution in express terms delegates the power to Congress to regulate commerce and to impose duties, and to no other, and that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong without abridgment or participation to Congress."

And he proceeds to say that these objections made to the Zoll-Verein treaty seem no longer to be deemed tenable, inasmuch as the Canadian reciprocity treaty, though materially varying the existing tariff, was at once ratified and a law to carry it into effect passed, as of course, through Congress. But, if he did not know, it was certainly his duty to know that by the express terms of that treaty it was not to take effect at all, unless or until Congress should provide the legislation necessary to carry it out. Congress enacted a law exempting the specified Canadian products from duty, so as to give the treaty validity, and then the President proclaimed the treaty.

Another important fact is to be mentioned. By a joint resolution approved January 18, 1865, Congress directed the President to notify the British Government of the termination of this treaty, and Mr. Seward, in obedience to this resolution, on the same day sent the notice in a dispatch to Mr. Adams, although the treaty in terms authorized the "high contracting parties" to give such notice without specifying Congress at all.

Among the Representatives who in the memorable debate of 1796 took the position that Congress was bound to carry out the treaty were Murray, Smith, Harper, Griswold, Sedgwick, and Buck. These were their arguments:

Mr. Murray was of the opinion that, inasmuch as a treaty, if constitutional, was the supreme law of the land, the House had no right to inquire into its merits.

Mr. Buck said: the executive power is vested in the President, as is also the treaty-making power; and treaties are the supreme law. The House must, therefore, grant appropriations, otherwise it makes treaties. The House might as well withhold appropriations for the salaries of the United States judges.

Mr. Smith reasoned as follows: the President and Senate have the power to make treaties; the Representatives, in common with their fellow-citizens, are bound to do all in their power to carry them into operation, except when clearly unconstitutional. They have no right to inquire into the merits of a treaty. It is the law of the land, and they must carry it out or resist the constituted authorities. A law must be repealed or obeyed or the Government will be dissolved. Can the House repeal a treaty? No; it must therefore obey it. Mr. N. Smith believed that if Congress had a discretion as to appropriations for treaties it virtually had a part of the treaty power; that Representatives had no more right to inquire into the merits of treaties, when called upon to appropriate money to carry them out, than to inquire into the merits of the President or judges when called upon to appropriate for their salaries. He held a treaty to be not merely a law which Congress could not repeal, but a contract; that the House was in duty bound to deal with a treaty as a court is bound to deal with a law: to execute, not discuss it; that the House had a discretion, but that discretion was limited by the Constitution, the treaty, and the law of right and justice, and was bound to fulfill the contract.

HO. OF REPS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Paine.

Mr. Harper's opinion was, that when we are called upon to carry a treaty into effect our discretion permits us to ask, not whether it is good or bad, but whether it is so bad that the public welfare requires it to be broken; and that the same is true of appropriations for the military establishment.

Mr. Griswold's reasoning was this: treaties may repeal laws. For Congress by law declares war; the President by treaty makes peace, and so repeals the law. The people have the same right to repeal statutes through the treaty power which they have to enact them through the legislative power. A treaty is a law with which the House has nothing to do except provide for its execution. It is said that the President and Senate might repeal half the laws. But such is the Constitution. All power is liable to abuse. It has been said that a law can only be repealed by consent of parties. But the House of Representatives is not a party to a law. The people are parties, and may make a law by one set of agents and repeal it by another. There is no check on the treaty power. The duty of Congress to appropriate is the same, whether the debt springs from the Constitution, from a law, or from a treaty. As to appropriations, Congress is merely the treasurer of the United States.

Mr. W. Smith reasoned as follows: Representatives are bound by laws in their legislative as much as in their individual capacity. Treaties are laws. When they prescribe a duty for legislators the latter have not a discretion to perform or not perform, but only as to the mode and circumstances. Thus they have not a discretion to decide whether or not to appropriate money to carry on the Government, but only what fund shall furnish it, and other matters of detail. Upon the application of two thirds of the States Congress is bound to call a convention to amend the Constitution. So treaties may impose duties, and then they must be obeyed. The discretion of Congress is the same in one case as in the other. The fact that military appropriations are limited proves that others are not. Appropriations for the support of the Government and even for pensions are annual, and yet cannot be honestly withheld. The House cannot repeal a law by withholding an appropriation. The power which enacts can alone repeal. A treaty can only be annulled by consent of parties, by breach of faith, or by war. After the embargo act the President released Swedish vessels under a treaty, and thus set aside a law.

These arguments are answered by Gallatin, Madison, Giles, Nicholas, Swanwick, Havens, Page, Findley, Livingston, and S. Smith. The substance of Mr. Gallatin's reasoning was this: A treaty is unconstitutional which provides for doing things forbidden by the Constitution. But a treaty, though not unconstitutional, if it requires legislative action, will not become the supreme law of the land until such legislation is had. The general treaty-making power is limited by certain positive clauses of the Constitution, and checked by certain powers vested in other branches of the Government. It is limited by the section granting all legislative power to Congress and checked by the provision that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in consequence of an appropriation by law. Wherever the powers exercised in making or executing a treaty clash with powers specifically granted to another branch of the Government that branch must assent to render the treaty completely valid. If a treaty is the supreme law so is a statute. Neither can repeal the other. Both must operate, if at all, subject to the Constitution. The opposite doctrine gives to the President and Senate all legislative power. For example, by making use of an Indian tribe the treaty-making power would be able to borrow money, regulate commerce, &c. Congress is not a part of the treaty power, but only a check upon it. A treaty which clashes with the power of Congress is not "made under the authority of the United States," and is not the supreme law. It is over State laws, not Federal laws, that treaties are supreme. As to the salaries of the President and judges the Constitution expressly forbids their diminution and enjoins their payment. Hence Representatives are merely bound to appropriate. No such thing is true of treaties.

Mr. Madison's view of the subject was this: treaties are supreme not over Federal but over State laws. The word "treaty" is not used in the Constitution in an unrestricted sense. If the treaty power can perform one act for which the authority of Congress is required by the Constitution it can perform every such act. If the President and Senate can, by treaty, regulate trade, they can also declare war, raise armies, levy taxes, borrow money, appropriate money, &c. No line can be drawn. By a treaty of alliance with a nation at war they may make the United States a party to the war, stipulate subsidies, borrow money to pay them, furnish troops to be transported to Europe or Asia, and maintain a standing Army. It is no answer to say that they could only pledge the public faith to all this. If we are bound to fulfill their pledges the result is the same. The specific powers conferred upon Congress are subject to certain restrictions imposed by section nine of the first article of the Constitution and by the Amendments. But these powers exercised by the President and Senate will be subject to no such restrictions. The limitation of military appropriations to two years would be defeated if the President and Senate could pledge them for four, whereas the framers of the Constitution intended to enable either branch of the Legislature to discontinue a military establishment at the end of two years. When the Constitution enjoins upon Congress a particular act there is no discretion. But when the act of one department interferes with a power expressly vested in another the latter must be exercised according to its nature. It is claimed that a treaty is paramount because the President and Senate are agents of the people. But so is Congress the agent of the people. It is objected that the treaty power would be absolutely frustrated by these limitations. But the several departments form one Government of our people, who may express their will through one Government, operating under checks, on this as well as any other subject.

Mr. Giles said, in substance, that the supremacy of treaties was over State constitutions and laws; that treaties could not annul, but could be annulled by statutes; that they were always in fact annulled by the war power, never by convention; that if England should fail to ratify the treaty of 1794 our ground of complaint would be a breach, not of treaty promise, but of antecedent obligation. In his opinion there were two restrictions on the treaty power. First, all legislative power is vested in Congress; and second, appropriations must be made by law, not treaty law, but statute law, which is an expression of the legislative will, and cannot be made without discretion. If the President can by treaty—by the aid of a foreign Power—legislate against the right of Congress to legislate, there is an end of all discretion. If he can thus declare what commerce shall not be regulated, what property shall not be sequestered, what shall or shall not be adjudged and punished as piracy, what will prevent an agreement to keep on foot a standing army of ten thousand men?

The view taken by Mr. Nicholas was this: if the power of the President and Senate as to treaties is unqualified, then the House must appropriate. But is that power unqualified? Suppose the Constitution had expressly given Congress the control of money stipulations in treaties, would not that constitute a qualification of the treaty power of the President and Senate? But on this point the Constitution, though not explicit, is clear, if fairly construed. Congress has discretionary power over appropriations, but it is lost if Congress can, by treaty, be forced to make them. The circumstance that appropriations for the Army and for the public debt are specially regulated by constitutional provisions shows that Congress has, in general, a discretion. The President and Senate hold the treaty power with qualifications in matters of money. Unless Congress sees fit to appropriate the money it is so far no treaty.

Mr. Swanwick said, in substance: Article first, section eight, of the Constitution, confers upon Congress not only certain specified legislative powers, but also the general power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into effect both these specified powers and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government or any department or officer thereof. But this implies discretion. The House has the right to originate money bills. What does this amount to if the President and Senate can make a contract which will compel the House to raise money? The Constitution, statutes, and treaties are made the supreme law, and State judges are bound thereby, anything in State laws or constitutions to the contrary notwithstanding. This clause, taken as a whole, shows that treaties are supreme over State, not Federal laws. The gradation is: first, the Constitution; second, the statutes; third, treaties. Can the third override the second? Encroachments are not more likely to come from Congress than from the Executive.

Mr. Havens: The grant of legislative power is in terms as unlimited as the grant of treaty power. If Congress had no right to refuse appropriations then a treaty might embrace an appropriation clause, and, being a supreme law, might dispense with all legislative action. But statutes are as truly supreme as treaties.

Mr. Page: If the President and Senate can regulate commerce with one nation they can with all. What will remain for Congress to regulate?

Mr. Findlay: It is not more extraordinary to give Congress a discretion in the enactment of laws to carry out treaties than to give the President the veto power after conferring all legislative power upon Congress.

Mr. Livingston: It is immaterial whether a treaty can, proprio vigore, appropriate money, or can only compel us to do it. Both doctrines are equally subversive of the principles of our Government. But the latter is more degrading to us. If the framers of the Constitution had intended to make appropriations obligatory upon us they would have said "Congress shall pass laws to carry into effect all treaties." If Congress is to exercise no discretion, why act at all? Why not leave it all to treaty? The Constitution, statutes, and treaties are to have force in the order indicated by the Constitution. He argues at length to show that his view is sustained, first, by the construction prevalent at the time the Constitution was framed; second, by the practice of the Government since; and third, by the public sentiment of his own time.

Permit me to say, sir, in conclusion, that not the least of my objections to this appropriation is the danger that it will be drawn into precedent as an acknowledgment that we have no discretion in the case, but are obliged to vote the money. I know of no advocate of this measure except the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] who does not, in the most positive terms, insist that we are in duty bound to carry out this treaty.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. V. L. PRUYN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported from the Committee on Reconstruction to impeach the President of the United States of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

Mr. PRUYN. Before I proceed to the general views which I wish to present I ask the House to consider the circumstances under which this very important subject comes before it.

On the 27th of January last certain papers and documents in regard to the affairs of the southern States were referred to the Committee on the Reconstruction of those States. On the 21st of this month (Friday last) a letter from Mr. Stanton, communicating his removal from office as Secretary of War, was referred to the same committee. On the next day, after a meeting by the committee of one hour only, and that during the sitting of the House, and without leave, as we have been informed by my colleague, [Mr. BROOKS, a member of the committee,] the chairman [Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania] presented the report now before us. It sets forth the removal of Mr. Stanton by the President without any notice of the documents referred to the committee in January last, and concludes as follows:

"Upon the evidence collected by the committee, which is herewith presented, and in virtue of the powers with which they have been invested by the House, they are of the opinion that Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors."

And thereupon the committee recommended to the House the adoption of the resolution of impeachment which they presented.

That is all there is of this report; and I venture to say that no deliberative assembly in the world was ever called upon to act on a matter of such grave, such vast importance, on so brief a notice, and on so meager a statement. It seems there was no testimony taken, no inquiry made, no explanation sought for, no notice given to the President of the reference to the committee, or even of the time and place of its brief, irregular session. No despatch could have worked more rapidly, nor could the restraints of constitutional government have been more effectually thrown aside; and this course was followed up in the House. The chairman of the committee, in presenting the report, speaking evidently for the political majority of the House, said:

"It is not my intention, in the first instance, to discuss this question; and if there be no desire on the other side to discuss it we are willing that the question should be taken upon the knowledge which the House already has."

And he stated further—and this I understand not only from what the chairman said, but from the remarks of several gentlemen who advocate impeachment, is the gravamen of the charge against the President—to wit, that—

"The fact of removing a man from office while the Senate was in session without the consent of the Senate, if there were nothing else, is of itself, and always has been considered, a high crime and misdemeanor, and was never before practiced."

This brings up in its whole length and breadth, without regard to the tenure-of-office act, the question of the constitutional power of the Executive to remove from office; and I hope to show that in the assertion thus made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania he is entirely mistaken. In the incidental discussion which occurred on Saturday last between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] and myself, and in that, also, which took place this morning, this proposition was again put forward, and on both occasions I promptly controverted it. And as it forms the very groundwork on which the superstructure of impeachment has been raised, I had expected it would have been fairly met, but in this I have been disappointed.

The Constitution of the United States declares that—

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

Such are the exact words of the grant. There it stands in all its length and breadth, to be judged of by its own strong and comprehensive terms. The exercise of the power is, indeed, in some cases, regulated by the Constitution; but where not so regulated it stands in its full, unassailable integrity. A stable government cannot be maintained without ample executive authority to enforce the laws; and the framers of our Constitution clearly intended to vest that power in the President only; and with their great knowledge of the science and principles of Government none knew better than they the necessary and legitimate extent of that power. It may be said it is a great power, and its exercise may be abused. All power, as we well know, may be abused. But when you look at the guards which surround the election of President, the limited term for which he is chosen, his almost direct accountability to the Representatives of the people, the chances of abuse are much less with him than with a Senate composed of a large body of members on whom influences may be exerted in various ways, sometimes without their being aware of it. Indeed, every good appointment to public office made by the President does so much to strengthen and create respect for his administration. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] who addressed the House this morning, briefly referred to a discussion in the First Congress on this subject. That discussion, considering the circumstances which attended it, was one of the most important which has taken place in our constitutional history. At least fifteen of the thirty-nine persons who signed the Constitution were members of that Congress. The debate was so thoroughly exhaustive of the subject that even with our experience at this day scarcely anything of importance can be added to it. And I do not hesitate to say that no member of this House should venture to vote in favor of the proposition to impeach the President until he has studied that discussion. It is unfair to the President, it is unjust to the great interests involved in this question, that gentlemen should act upon it without the views as to constitutional principles which the debate referred to affords. It will be found reported in the first volume of the Annals of Congress, and I shall refer to it very freely.

By the consent of all parties, from the foundation of the Government down, Mr. Madison's views on constitutional questions have been looked to not only with the greatest respect, but, I may almost say, as conclusive on all controverted points. The prominent part he took in the Convention which formed the Constitution, the clearness, the calmness, and, at the same time, the vigor of his views, his active interest in the adoption of that instrument as evinced in the Federalist, which was so largely written by him, and in the councils of his own State, all combined to give him this position.

The debate of 1789 took place on the bill organizing the Department of Foreign Affairs, afterward called the Department of State. The first section of the bill, as reported, provided for the appointment of the officer named; "to be removable from office by the President of the United States;" and this brought up the whole subject of the power of appointment and removal under the Constitution.

Mr. Madison, (at page 481,) after referring to the distribution of the powers of the Government under the Constitution—into the legislative, executive, and judicial—and claiming that this distribution could not be interfered with by Congress, remarked—

"The legislative powers are vested in Congress, and are to be exercised by them uncontrolled by any other department, except the Constitution has qualified it otherwise. The Constitution has qualified the legislative power by authorizing the President to object to any act it may pass, requiring, in this case, two thirds of both Houses to concur in making a law; but still the absolute legislative power is vested in the Congress with this qualification alone. The Constitution affirms that the executive power shall be vested in the President. Are there exceptions to this proposition? Yes, there are. The Constitution says that in appointing to office the Senate shall be associated with the President, unless in the case of inferior officers, when the law shall otherwise direct. Have we a right to extend this exception? I believe not. If the Constitution has invested all executive power in the President I venture to assert that the Legislature has no right to diminish or modify his executive authority."

"The question now resolves itself into this: is the power of displacing an executive power? I conceive that if any power whatever is in its nature executive it is the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws. If the Constitution had not qualified the power of the President in appointing to office by associating the Senate with him in that business, would it not be clear that he would have the right, by virtue of his executive power, to make such appointment? Should we be authorized, in defiance of that clause in the Constitution, 'The executive power shall be vested in a President,' to unite the Senate with the President in the appointment to office? I conceive not. If it is admitted that we should not be authorized to do this I think it may be disputed whether we have a right to associate them in removing persons from office, the one power being as much of an executive nature as the other; and the first only is authorized by being excepted out of the general rule established by the Constitution, in these words, 'The executive power shall be vested in the President.'"

"The judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court; but will gentlemen say the judicial power can be placed elsewhere unless the Constitution has made an exception? The Constitution justifies the Senate in exercising a judiciary power in determining on impeachments; but can the judicial power be further blended with the powers of that body? They cannot. I therefore say it is incontrovertible, if neither the legislative nor judicial powers are subjected to qualifications other than those demanded in the Constitution, that the executive powers are equally unassailable as either of the others; and inasmuch as the power of removal is of an executive nature, and not affected by any constitutional exception, it is beyond the reach of the legislative body."

Again, at page 514:

"However various the opinions which exist upon the point now before us it seems agreed on all sides that it demands a careful investigation and full discussion. I feel the importance of the question, and know that our decision will involve the decision of all similar cases. The decision that is at this time made will become the permanent exposition of the Constitution; and on a permanent exposition of the Constitution will depend the genius and character of the whole Government. It will depend, perhaps, on this decision whether the Government shall retain the equilibrium which the Constitution intended or take a direction toward aristocracy or anarchy among the members of the Government. Hence, how careful ought we to be to give a true direction to a power so critically circumstanced."

Let us look at the views of others of the distinguished members of the First Congress. I will quote the remarks of Mr. Boudinot, of New Jersey, whose memory commands the most profound respect as one of the great men of our early history:

"Let us examine whether it [the power of removal] belongs to the Senate and President. Certainly, sir, there is nothing that gives the Senate this right in express terms; but they are authorized in express words to be concerned in the appointment. And does this necessarily include the power of removal? If the President complains to the Senate of the misconduct of an officer, and desires their advice and consent to the removal, what are the Senate to do? Most certainly they will inquire if the complaint is well founded. To do this they must call the officer before them to answer. Who, then, are the parties? The supreme executive officer against his assistant; and the Senate are to sit as judges to determine whether sufficient cause of removal exists. Does not this set the Senate over the head of the President? But suppose they shall decide in favor of the officer, what a situation is the President then in, surrounded by officers with whom, by his situation, he is compelled to act, but in whom he can have no confidence, reversing the privilege given him by the Constitution; to prevent his having officers imposed upon him who do not meet his approbation. But I have another more solid objection which places the question in a more important point of view. The Constitution has placed the Senate as the only security and barrier between the House of Representatives and the President.

"Suppose the President has desired the Senate to concur in removing an officer, and they have declined, or suppose the House have applied to the President and Senate to remove an officer obnoxious to them, and they determine against the measure, the House can have recourse to nothing but an impeachment, if they suppose the criminality of the officer will warrant such procedure. Will the Senate then be that upright court which they ought to appeal to on this occasion, when they have prejudged your cause? I conceive the Senate will be too much under the control of their former decision to be a proper body for this House to apply to for impartial justice.

"As the Senate are the dernier resort, and the only court of judicature which can determine on cases of impeachment, I am for preserving them free and independent, both on account of the officer and this House. I therefore conceive that it was never the intention of the Constitution to vest the power of removal in the President and Senate; but, as it must exist somewhere, it rests in the President alone."

I may here add the following remark of Mr. Goodhue, (page 555:)

"It moreover appears very clear to me that the Senate, who are a judicial body, ought not to meddle with the business of removal, because they will have prejudged the case if an impeachment should thereafter be made."

Is it not, Mr. Speaker, a most striking comment on the broad and sagacious views of Mr. Bondinot, that he looked into the future with such prophetic clearness? The case of Mr. Stanton is before us almost in name and words, in spirit and substance entirely so. The evils to follow from an act containing the principles of the tenure-of-office act are stated almost as clearly as if the act itself had been before the speaker in written words; and the Senate by the resolutions which they adopted a few days ago, denying the President's right to remove Mr. Stanton, will be placed, should the President be impeached by this House, in the position which it was predicted would be so unfortunate for the cause of "impartial justice." I know it may be said that Senators never could have supposed at the time those resolutions were adopted that this House could be guilty of so great an act of folly as to impeach the President for having removed Mr. Stanton, and I trust that their expectations in this respect will prove to have been well founded. Any other view of the action of the Senate will, I am sure, do injustice to many of the members of that body, if not to all who voted in favor of the resolutions to which I have alluded. The Senators certainly would not have rushed on to judgment in advance could they for a moment have believed that for the act referred to the House would impeach the President.

I add extracts from the remarks of that great man and orator, Fisher Ames, who said;

"The Constitution places all executive power in the hands of the President, and could he personally execute all the laws there would be no occasion for establishing auxiliaries; but the circumscribed powers of human nature in one man demand the aid of others." * * * "He must therefore have assistants. But in order that he may be responsible to his country he must have a choice in selecting his assistants, a control over them with power to remove them when he finds the qualifications which induced their appointment cease to exist." * * *

"The executive powers are delegated to the President with a view to have a responsible officer to superintend, control, inspect, and check the officers necessarily employed in administering the laws. The only bond between him and those he employs is the confidence he has in their integrity and talents; when that confidence ceases the principal ought to have power to remove those whom he can no longer trust with safety. If an officer shall be guilty of neglect or infidelity there can be no doubt but he ought to be removed; yet there may be numerous causes for removal which do not amount to a crime. He may propose to do a mischief, but I believe the mere intention would not be cause of impeachment. He may lose the confidence of the people upon suspicion, in which case it would be improper to retain him in service; he ought to be removed at any time when, instead of doing the greatest possible good, he is likely to do an injury to the public interest by being continued in the administration."

"But why should we connect the Senate in the removal? Their attention is taken up with other important business, and they have no constitutional authority to watch the conduct of the executive officers, and therefore cannot use such authority with advantage. If the President is inclined to shelter himself behind the Senate, with respect to having continued an improper person in office, we lose the responsibility, which is our greatest security; the blame among so many will be lost.

"Another reason occurs to me against blending these powers. An officer who superintends the public revenue will naturally acquire a great influence. If he obtains support in the Senate, upon an attempt of the President to remove him, it will be out of the power of the House, when applied to by the First Magistrate, to impeach him with success; for the very means of proving charges of misconduct against him will be under the power of the officer; all the papers necessary to convict him may be withheld while the person continues in his office.

"Protection may be rendered for protection; and as this officer has such extensive influence it may be exerted to procure the reelection of his friends. These circumstances, in addition to those stated by the gentleman from Jersey, (Mr. Bondinot,) must clearly evince to every gentleman the impropriety of connecting the Senate with the President in removing from office."

I quote what Judge Benson said, (page 525:)

"I will not repeat what has been said to prove that the true construction (of the Constitution) is, that the President alone has the power of removal; but will state a case to show the embarrassment which must arise by a combination of the senatorial and legislative authority in this particular. I will instance the officer to which the bill relates. To him will necessarily be committed negotiations with the ministers of foreign courts. This is a very delicate trust. The supreme executive officer, in superintending this Department, may be entangled with suspicions of a very delicate nature relative to the transactions of the officer, and such as from circumstances would be injurious to name; indeed, he may be so situated that he will not, cannot give the evidence of his suspicion. Now, thus circumstanced, suppose he should propose to the Senate to remove the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, are we to expect the Senate will, without any reason being assigned, implicitly submit to his proposition? They will not. Suppose he should say he suspected the man's fidelity; they would say we must proceed further, and know the reason for this suspicion; they would insist on a full communication. Is it to be supposed that this man will not have a single friend in the Senate who will contend for a fair trial and a full hearing?

"The President then becomes the plaintiff and the secretary the defendant. The Senate are sitting in judgment between the Chief Magistrate of the United States and a subordinate officer. Now, I submit to the candor of the gentlemen whether this looks like good government? Yet in every instance when the President thinks proper to have an officer removed this absurd scene must be displayed. How much better, even on principles of expediency, will it be that the President alone have the power of removal."

Here, again, we have the present condition of things stated with as much clearness as if it had transpired in 1789.

I shall only add what was stated by one of the most eminent of the great men of his day; and you will observe that he, also, was fully aware of the difficulties which would grow out of the power of removal, if it could be exercised by the President only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. Sedgwick said:

"Suppose the President has a Secretary in whom he discovers a great degree of ignorance or a total incapacity to conduct the business he has assigned him; suppose him inimical to the President, or suppose any of the great variety of cases which would be good cause for removal, and impress the propriety of such a measure strongly on the mind of the President, without any other evidence than what exists in his own ideas, from a contemplation of the man's conduct and character day by day, what, let me ask, is to be the consequence if the Senate are to be applied to? If they are to do anything in this business, I presume they are to deliberate, because they are to advise and consent. If they are to deliberate, you put them between the officer and the President. They are then to inquire into the cause of removals; the President must produce his testimony. How is the question to be investigated? Because, I presume, there must be some rational rule for conducting this business. Is the President to be sworn to declare the whole truth and to bring forward facts? Or are they to admit suspicion as testimony? Or is the word of the President to be taken at all events? If so, this check is not of the least efficacy in nature. But if proof be necessary, what is then the consequence? Why, in nine cases out of ten, where the case is very clear to the mind of the President that the man ought to be removed, the effect cannot be produced, because it is absolutely impossible to produce the necessary evidence. Are the Senate to proceed without evidence? Some gentlemen contend not. Then the object will be lost. Shall a man, under these circumstances, be saddled upon the President, who has been appointed for no other purpose but to aid the President in performing certain duties? Shall he be continued, I ask again, against the will of the President? If he is, where is the responsibility? Are you to look for it in the President, who has no control over the officer, no power to remove him if he acts unfeelingly or unfaithfully? Without you make him responsible you weaken and destroy the strength and beauty of your system."

Such were some of the views urged in favor of the executive power of removal from office. They were met with vigor by gentlemen of ability, some of whom claimed that impeachment must be resorted to if an officer had become unfaithful. Others that the President could remove only in the manner he appointed, that is, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The debate, as I have already said, was very thorough and comprehensive, and on what may be considered as the test question it was held that the Constitution conferred the power of removal on the Executive, by a vote of 31 to 19; and on the third reading the bill passed by a vote of 29 to 22. As the Senate then held its sittings with closed doors, we have no reports of the debates in that body, but the bill passed by the casting vote of the Vice President.

Such are the facts which relate to this deeply interesting event in our constitutional history.

Chancellor Kent, speaking of the subject in his Commentaries (the first edition of which appeared forty-two years ago) and of the debate in Congress, to which I have referred, says that the question may be considered "as firmly and definitely settled, and there is good sense and practical utility in the construction."

Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, (the first edition of which appeared thirty-five years since,) considers this matter very fully, gives the arguments on both sides, and concedes that it will be difficult, perhaps impracticable, after forty years' experience, to change the practice which has existed since 1789. But as "inferior officers," which designation includes the great body of public officers, may be appointed in one of several modes prescribed by the Constitution, he considers the remedy for any abuse of power by the President to be within the control of Congress.

This disposition of the matter has at times been questioned by some of our most distinguished statesmen; but I believe that the conclusion was uniformly arrived at that the question had been fairly settled. Mr. Webster, in the Senate some thirty years ago, while censuring the manner in which the power of removal had been exercised, did not question its existence in the President; and a committee of the Senate, as early as 1826, proposed to reach the matter, not by legislation, but by an amendment of the Constitution. Whether the decision of the Congress of 1789 was wise or not, it is clear that the practical construction of the Constitution has been uniform from that time till the passage of the tenure-of-office act in 1867, the long period of seventy-eight years. Seventeen distinguished persons had, in that long period, occupied the presidential office. Thirty-eight Congresses had followed that of 1789; thousands of officers had been removed by the Presidents during that time and appointments made to fill those and other vacancies; in short, the principle had been recognized by every department of the Government in every possible way. And is all this to go for nothing? Six years, by the statute of limitations in almost every State of the Union, as to personal property, and twenty years as to real estate, disposes of claims on which large rights and often the welfare of individuals and families, and even important interests of communities, depend. According to the usual rules of computation, four business generations have nearly passed away since this question was disposed of after most deliberate consideration. Are we now to overturn it? Are decisions on constitutional questions never to be respected? Is the President, who alone, of all the officers of the Government, is bound by his oath of office "to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States," to be judged harshly for seeking to enforce respect to that instrument?

In further answer to the denial that the President ever made removals from office while the Senate was in session, I have to say that he not only uniformly made such removals, but that no other person or body did. The Senate never made them, or gave their "advice and consent" to any removal, and no record of the kind will, I venture to say, be found on the Journals of the Senate.

I will now read copies, from an official source, of messages sent by several of the Presidents to the Senate on making nominations to office. The first will be one of John Adams. It is as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I nominate Hon. John Marshall, esq., of Virginia, to be Secretary of State in the place of Hon. Timothy Pickens, esq., removed.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, May 12, 1800.

Mark the language—"removed," not "to be removed," or "whose removal I recommend"—no separate writ of supersedeas may have actually issued, but the right to do so existed and it might have been issued. It was only a question between the President and the incumbent whether this should be done or whether the new commission should, when presented, operate as the supersedeas. Mr. Webster stated, in the discussion before referred to, that a notice might be given by the President that the removal would take place on a certain day, which is no less a removal than the same act would be on a later or an earlier day.

I give a message by President Taylor, omitting the names:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, December 18, 1849.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate _____ to be marshal of the United States for _____, in place of _____, removed.

Z. TAYLOR.

I give another:

To the Senate of the United States:

I hereby nominate _____ to be deputy postmaster at _____, in place of _____, the present incumbent, removed.

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

WASHINGTON, 13 February, 1856.

One more, and I have done:

WASHINGTON, March 13, 1861.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate _____ to be collector of the customs for the district of _____, in the place of _____, removed.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

These examples might be multiplied almost indefinitely from the files of the Senate, as all the occupants of the presidential office have pursued a uniform course in this respect.

Let me also refer the House to the language of the commissions issued to the heads of Departments, diplomatic and consular officers, attorneys, marshals, and many other officers of Government, from General Washington's day down to the passage of the tenure-of-office act. The party is appointed (to office, and such is the commission Mr. Stanton holds,) "during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being." How could language show more conclusively that the President may at any time remove from office?

There is a strong case on record (and more may, I presume, be found) in which the President made an absolute removal from office during the sitting of the Senate and without even naming any successor till a long time afterward. I refer to the case of a former postmaster at New York. The facts are set forth in Executive Document No. 91 of the House of Representatives, first session of the Thirty-Sixth Congress. The postmaster at New York was believed to be a defaulter, and he was promptly removed by an order, in the nature of a supersedeas, issued by President Buchanan, on the 10th of May, 1859, without any communication with the Senate. The present

Judge Holt was then Postmaster General, and seems to have taken the entire direction of the matter. Congress remained in session till the 25th June, but no nomination to the vacant office was made by the President up to that time. It may be said that the public funds were in jeopardy, and the President was therefore bound to make the removal. But it is clear that this of itself would afford no apology for an act unwarranted by the Constitution. The question was one of power; he either had or had not the power, and the exercise of it, in the case referred to, was of such marked notoriety, that had there been any person in the land disposed to question it the objection would certainly have been made.

Mr. Madison's views on this subject were freely expressed in his later days, and after his long experience of the operations of the Government were entirely in conformity with those he entertained in 1789. They will be found in his letter to John M. Patton, dated March 28, 1834.

In a letter to Mr. Coles, of October 15, 1834, he said, page 464:

"The claim on constitutional ground to a share (by the Senate) in the removal, as well as appointment of officers, is in direct opposition to the uniform practice of the Government from its commencement. It is clear that the innovation would not only vary essentially the existing balance of power, but expose the Executive occasionally to a total inaction, and at all times to delays fatal to the due execution of the laws."

General Jackson's views were given on his protest to the Senate of April 15, 1834. I present brief extracts from this document:

"The whole executive power being vested in the President, who is responsible for its exercise, it is a necessary consequence that he should have a right to employ agents of his own choice to aid him in the performance of his duties and to discharge them when he is no longer willing to be responsible for their acts. In strict accordance with this principle the power of removal, which, like that of appointment, is an original executive power, is left unchecked by the Constitution in relation to all executive officers, for whose conduct the President is responsible, while it is taken from him in relation to judicial officers, for whose acts he is not responsible."

After having referred to the debate in the Congress of 1789, he said:

"Here, then, we have the concurrent authority of President Washington, of the Senate, and the House of Representatives, numbers of whom had taken an active part in the Convention which framed the Constitution, and in the State conventions which adopted it, that the President derived an unqualified power of removal from that instrument itself, which is beyond the reach of legislative authority. Upon this principle the Government has now been steadily administered for about forty-five years, during which there have been numerous removals made by the President, or by his direction, embracing every grade of executive officers from the heads of Departments to the messengers of bureaus."

This question has also been passed upon by the judiciary, and I refer to this very briefly.

In the case of Hennen, reported in 13 Peters' Supreme Court Reports, page 259, the Supreme Court of the United States fully recognized the doctrine established by the Congress of 1789, and we thus have a substantial agreement on this subject between all branches of the Government, for the long period of seventy-eight years, from 1789 to 1867.

I have thus, I think, established the statement made in the outset—that the chairman of the committee, Mr. STEVENS, is entirely wrong in claiming that the President never removed from office during the sitting of the Senate unless with the consent of the Senate—and have shown that the President alone makes removals, the Senate taking no part whatever in them, but only approving or rejecting nominations to fill offices which the President may send to them, and that this will be proved by reference to the Journals of the Senate. If I am wrong in my position it is due to the importance of the subject that the committee should, before this discussion closes, state the facts on which they base their extraordinary statement.

We now come to a change in the policy of Congress by the passage of the tenure-of-office act in 1867. The first clause of that act provided—

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

This act was passed after a long debate in both Houses, especially in the Senate, and was met by a veto message from President Johnson, sent to the Senate on the 2d of March, 1867, in which he reviewed the history of the executive power of removal with great clearness and ability, and contended that the proposed statute would be a violation of the Constitution as it had been understood and acted upon by all the departments of Government since 1789. The bill, notwithstanding the veto, became a law by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress, and it thus stands on the statute-book.

As Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, had been appointed by Mr. Lincoln, and held his office without any new commission having been issued to him by President Johnson, the latter claimed that Mr. Stanton's case was within the very terms of the proviso in the act of 1867, and deeming that the public interests required a change in the War Department he suspended Mr. Stanton from office (after his refusal to resign) on the 12th of August, 1867, and appointed General Grant Secretary of War ad interim.

It has been said that the proviso in the tenure-of-office act does not cover the case of Mr. Stanton, for the alleged reason that Mr. Johnson is serving out the "term" of office of Mr. Lincoln. That this construction does not meet the spirit of the proviso, by which it was clearly intended that the President should always have a Cabinet of his own choice, is so clear to every candid mind that it does not admit of question. It is entirely inconsistent with the discussion had in Congress, where no such forced construction was hinted at. The Constitution says of the President, "he shall hold his office during a term of four years." The office and the term, be it more or less, evidently and of necessity go together. Can it be said of any man that he holds a term of office after death? Or of any person that he holds an office, and that it is the "term" of a person who is dead? That it would have been the term of such other person had he lived is quite true, but death severed his connection with all earthly things. The "term" is no longer his. Whatever was left of it passed to his successor.

If the discussion referred to be carefully examined it will be seen that several Republican Senators stated unhesitatingly that the act was not a party measure; that they desired to respect the office and the rights of the President; that they took it for granted that no person fit to occupy the position of a Cabinet minister would hold the place when his relations were unfriendly and hostile to the President, and also that they considered it important that there should be a cordiality of feeling and an agreement as to matters of State policy between the President and those who are his confidential advisers. (See the remarks in the Congressional Globe of 1866-67, of Senators HOWE, FESSENDEN, EDMUNDS, SHERMAN, WILLIAMS, TRUMBULL, and others. I have no time to read them, and can only refer to them.) The idea that the act could be so construed as to place it beyond the power of President Johnson to remove members of his Cabinet, not appointed by him, is entirely at variance with the views expressed during the discussion, and if we are to believe, as I do, what many honorable Senators said as to their motives, no such thing was thought of or intended.

With a sincere desire, as it seems to me, to avoid any collision or question with Congress, the President submitted to the Senate by his message of the 12th December, 1867, all the papers connected with the removal of Mr. Stanton, and a statement of the reasons which led him to the performance of that duty. In this document the President stated that when the tenure-of-office bill was before him he consulted his Cabinet in regard to it, and that every member of that body advised him that the law was unconstitutional—the condemnation of Mr. Stanton being “the most elaborate and emphatic.” He referred, as the President states, “to all the arguments on the subject, and added the weight of his own deliberate judgment, and advised me that it was my duty to defend the power of the President from usurpation, and to veto the law.” The Senate did not agree with the President as to the sufficiency of his reasons for suspending Mr. Stanton and he was consequently reinstated in office. Having failed to secure Mr. Stanton's removal in this way, and Mr. Stanton not having resigned, as some of his friends expected him to do, the President, treating the tenure-of-office act as unconstitutional, removed him absolutely under his constitutional executive authority, and, under the act of 1795, designated Adjutant General Thomas Secretary of War ad interim, and there the matter now stands, Mr. Stanton having refused to surrender the office to General Thomas. The Senate, having been informed of this action, thereupon adopted the resolutions of disapproval to which I before referred. For this act of removal it is proposed that this House do now impeach the President.

President Johnson stands before you charged with no offense against good morals, with no want of personal or official integrity or capacity, with no inattention to or neglect of duty, but simply with having ventured to differ from Congress as to the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office act, a difference which all the facts show was a conscientious one, and having acted accordingly.

In his construction of this act he is supported, as I hope I have already shown, by the uniform course of all departments of the Government from 1789 to 1867; and in the debate in the Senate on the act of 1867 it was admitted by some of the friends of the bill, and claimed by all its opponents, that its constitutionality would be questioned and disputed. That the President was bound by his oath of office, of such marked significance, to defend his power from usurpation, and to veto the law was particularly urged upon him by Mr. Stanton, who still claims the administration of the War Office.

Is the President of the United States for such a cause and under such circumstances to be impeached? Are we to resort to this extraordinary remedy, one which would draw upon us the comments of the world, because Congress and the President differ as to the constitutionality of a certain statute, when the Supreme Court could in a few weeks hear and finally dispose of the question? What is the world to think of constitutional government, when he who has been specially chosen to maintain it is struck down by the House of Representatives while gallantly standing up in its defense?

Some gentlemen may consider this a very pleasant political episode, and think it will work out well for party purposes. But let me warn them that years hence, this thing, if now accomplished, will return to shame and to plague them. Impeachment, if it now succeed, will become a favorite political remedy for a strong legislative majority in many of our State Legislatures, when the greater part of them happen to differ from their executive on public matters, and once taught how the power is to be used the use will not readily be abandoned. Like some burden once imposed for some alleged temporary purpose, it is easily fastened upon community, while years of effort are necessary to remove it. What is the end to be gained? The decision, if adverse to the President in this case, will not settle the law as to other incumbents of the executive office. The question will still remain to be settled in the future. Should the Senate find the President guilty of a violation of the law, they surely would not undertake to remove him from office for venturing to differ from Congress on a doubtful question of law. This would virtually be claiming infallibility for themselves. I am quite aware that there are persons who look upon this question as more of a political than a judicial question, but I am sure that the large number of gentlemen of high character in the Senate who will try this matter if it reaches them, will act the part of impartial judges, feeling conscious that they are accountable not to any political party, but to the cause of truth and justice here, and hereafter to a higher tribunal whose administrations are infallible.

SPEECH OF HON. H. E. PAINE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 14, 1868.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress—

Mr. PAINE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I propose to occupy the floor only a few minutes; and before proceeding with my remarks wish to say, for the information of the House, that after the close of the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] who will follow me, the chairman of the committee [Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania] will call the previous question at a quarter before three o'clock.

Mr. HIGBY. I wish to inquire what disposition it is proposed to make of this bill, whether it is to be left open for debate.

Mr. PAINE. I presume the gentleman did not hear the remark which I just made. I will state again, for the information of the House, that it is the purpose of the chairman of the committee to demand the previous question at a quarter before three, and as soon as he concludes his remarks, which cannot exceed one hour in length, to ask for a vote.

Mr. HIGBY. I hope that the chairman of the committee, or whoever reports this bill, will leave it open for further debate. I wish to say something on this subject; and I do not wish to be confined to five or ten minutes. This is a very important question.

Mr. PAINE. It will be competent for the gentleman to induce the House, if possible, to vote down the call of the previous question.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House by replying at length to the general and indiscriminate denunciation which you have heard, both from the gentleman who has just taken his seat and from those who have heretofore spoken against the bill. I wish to address myself to certain particular objections which have been urged against this bill elsewhere, as well as on this floor. Most of the objections which have been raised in this House have consisted of loose denunciations of the spirit and policy of the Republican party, and bitter declamation against the action of the people of the States. But the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday referred to and adopted a remonstrance which has been placed before the Committee on Reconstruction, and perhaps laid before the House. This remonstrance is addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and is signed by Wade Hampton, John P. Thomas, Joseph D. Pope, F. W. McMaster, Samuel McGowan, and W. M. Shannon. The name of one of these remonstrants is not altogether unknown to members of this House.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] concludes his comments upon this remonstrance with the following words:

“Mr. Speaker, no man can read the remonstrance from which these extracts are taken and lay his hand on his heart and say that he honestly believes he is doing justice to his country and his race by forcing such a constitution on that people.”

Sir, I purpose to examine this remonstrance of these sorrowful knights of the lost cause. I shall do so not only because it excites such fervent admiration in the breasts of my friends on the other side of the House, but because this remonstrance really presents, in a concise form, all the objections which have been or can be, with any degree of plausibility, urged against this bill. The first objection made by these remonstrants, and repeated by the gentleman from Kentucky, is that—

“Article one, section nineteen, of the Declaration of Rights gives justices of peace jurisdiction of all offenses less than felony, and in which the punishment does not exceed a fine of $100, or imprisonment for thirty days. This is a gross invasion of that boast and bulwark of Anglo-Saxon liberty, the trial by jury. Any one may be arrested and ‘tried summarily,’ before a justice of the peace or other officer authorized by law, on information under oath, without indictment or intervention of a grand jury.”

Let me read the section which so shocks the sensibilities of these liberty-loving patriots. It is in these words:

“Sec. 19. All offenses less than felony, and in which the punishment does not exceed a fine of $100, or imprisonment for thirty days, shall be tried summarily before a justice of the peace, or other officer authorized by law, on information under oath, without indictment or intervention of a grand jury, saving to the defendant the right of appeal; and no person shall be held to answer for any higher crime or offense unless on presentment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land and naval service, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger.”

Now, sir, I hold in my hand the constitution of the State of Iowa, and I see that the eleventh section of the Iowa bill of rights is identical with that which I have just read. Not a single word is found in one of them which is not found also in the other. The corresponding provision in the bill of rights of the State of Maine is in the following words:

“No person shall be held to answer for a capital or infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases of impeachment, or in such cases of offenses as are usually cognizable by a justice of the peace, or in cases arising in the Army or Navy or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger.”

That of New Hampshire is in these words:

“Nor shall the Legislature make any law that shall subject any person to a capital punishment (excepting for the government of the Army and Navy and the militia in actual service) without trial by jury.”

The general, if not universal, practice of the States of the Union is opposed to the assumption that the trial of petty offenses by justices of the peace or police magistrates is an invasion of the right of trial by jury. Even Kentucky provides by her bill of rights for jury trials only in prosecutions by information or indictment.

The next objection is, that—

“Section twenty-four enables the Legislature to authorize and empower any one—a police or military officer—to suspend the laws of the State or the execution of the laws.”

The fact, however, is that section twenty-four is in these words:

“Sec. 24. The power of suspending the laws or the execution of the laws shall never be exercised but by the General Assembly or by authority derived therefrom; to be exercised in such particular cases only as the General Assembly shall expressly provide for.”

And the twentieth article of the bill of rights of Massachusetts is identical with this, substituting the words “ought to” for “shall,” and “Legislature” for “General Assembly.” The sixteenth section of the Kentucky bill of rights is in these words:

“And no power of suspending laws shall be exercised unless by the General Assembly or its authority.”

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Admission of Southern States—Mr. Paine.

Ho. of REPS.

The twelfth section of the bill of rights of Pennsylvania is in the same words. So are the tenth section of the bill of rights of Delaware, the seventh of that of Maryland, and the seventh of that of Virginia.

This provision of the South Carolina constitution is copied literally from the bill of rights of the State of Massachusetts into that of Vermont, and is substantially embraced in the constitutions of nearly all the States, generally in the form which it assumes in the constitution of Kentucky, the State represented in part by the gentleman who urges this objection. The next objection is that section twenty-five authorizes the General Assembly to subject any one to martial law, or to the pains and penalties of martial law, whenever they think proper. On the contrary, section twenty-five provides that—

"No person shall, in any case, be subject to martial law, or to any pains or penalties by virtue of that law, except those employed in the Army or Navy of the United States, and except the militia in actual service, but by authority of the General Assembly."

This provision is copied from the constitution of the State of Massachusetts. It is also found in the thirty-fourth section of the bill of rights of New Hampshire, and is repeated substantially in many of the constitutions of the States of this Union, and is moreover in strict accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which does not withhold from the State Legislatures the right to suspend the writ of habeas corpus when in case of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it. This bill of rights neither authorizes nor attempts to authorize a suspension of the writ in any other case.

The next objection is, that—

"Section twenty-eight clearly and distinctly empowers and authorizes the Legislature to keep, up and maintain a standing army in time of peace."

Now, sir, section twenty-eight is in these words:

"Sec. 28. The people have a right to keep and bear arms for the common defense. As in times of peace armies are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be maintained without the consent of the General Assembly. The military power ought always to be held in an exact subordination to the civil authority, and be governed by it."

This is copied literally from the corresponding provision in the constitution of the State of Massachusetts, which is repeated literally in that of Vermont, and also substantially in that of Kentucky, Pennsylvania, and other States.

The next objection is thus stated:

"Section two of article four provides that the judges of the supreme court shall be elected for six years; and section thirteen of the same article ordains that circuit judges shall hold their office for a term of four years. This destroys the independence of the judiciary, and makes them political partisans, with all the temptations and corruptions of politicians." "Heretofore the judiciary of this State, elected for life, have always been above reproach, and their crime has never been sullied with a stain of suspicion. Henceforth the judiciary of South Carolina will be corrupt and subservient."

These wise men are evidently satisfied that a life tenure is better for the judiciary than a term of years. They may be right in this, but unfortunately for them the weight of authority is against them. The contrary doctrine is generally, if not universally, recognized by our State constitutions, and South Carolina certainly ought to be the last State to assume to teach anything on this or kindred subjects, either by precept or example. I presume no gentleman will consider this a serious objection to the constitution. I doubt not almost every member of the House will consider it a strong recommendation.

The next objection is, that—

"Section twenty-two of article four of the constitution gives justices of the peace jurisdiction in cases of bastardy and all contracts and torts as high as $100."

The first branch of this objection is remarkably suggestive; but I will make no comment upon it.

So far as the provision of the constitution goes which gives justices of the peace jurisdiction of contracts and torts where the amount claimed does not exceed $100, I believe this constitution forms no exception to the general principle which obtains throughout the United States. It is, perhaps, not a universal rule, but it is a general and almost universal rule that justices of the peace should have such jurisdiction up to a maximum amount fixed by the constitution or law.

But these remonstrants are very careful not to state that section twenty-four secures appeals in all such cases.

The next objection is, that—

"Section twenty-six of the constitution denies to the judges the right of charging juries in respect to matters of fact."

This section is to be found on page 13 of the constitution, and is in these words:

"Sec. 26. Judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law."

These gentlemen and their friends on the other side of the House who adopt their remonstrance desire the judges, I suppose, to have the right to find and inform the jury what facts are established by the testimony in all cases; but this constitution only gives them the right to state the testimony and declare the law applicable to it. Certainly South Carolina would seem to be the only spot out of Ireland capable of producing men who could preach such a doctrine and clamor for jury trials all on the same day.

The next objection is, that—

"Section thirty-three takes from the Legislature all discretion as to the adoption of the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution disfranchising the people of South Carolina."

Now, sir, this is the only objection that I can find that has any validity, if, indeed, this has any validity, against the constitution of South Carolina. If any objection to this section is entertained in this House it is not because any gentlemen on this side of the House are opposed to requiring the Legislature of South Carolina to vote for the adoption of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Federal Constitution, for we ourselves by our reconstruction laws require that. All of us believe, as a matter of principle and policy, they ought to be compelled to adopt that amendment before admission, and all of us, so far as this question is concerned, will heartily rejoice that the constitution of South Carolina embraces this provision if it shall be found in conformity with the Constitution of the United States. Now, the Constitution of the United States provides that these constitutional amendments shall be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States as one of the modes of their ratification. If this gives to the Legislatures of the States chosen under the Constitution the exclusive right to pass upon these constitutional amendments, and to the convention, which makes the organic law itself, no such right, then the result is that this provision in the constitution of South Carolina is null and void, and does not fetter the Legislature of the State of South Carolina. But, sir, whether it is nugatory or valid, it would be no excuse for any gentleman upon this side of the House to reject that constitution; that it contains a provision, which if binding, is right and beneficent, and which, if null and void, is harmless.

The next objection is, that—

"Section thirty-four declares null and void all contracts for the purchase of slaves, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

I will make no comment upon an objection of that kind to the constitution of the State of South Carolina, or these other constitutions presented for our approval or disapproval.

The next objection is, that—

"Section two of article eight enfranchises every male negro over the age of twenty-one, whether a convict, felon, or a pauper, and disfranchises every white man who has held office in South Carolina."

Now, sir, the language of that section is this:

"Sec. 2. Every male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, not laboring under the disabilities named in this constitution, without distinction of race, color, or former condition, who shall be a resident of the State at the time of the adoption of this constitution, or who shall thereafter reside in this State one year, and in the county in which he offers to vote, sixty days next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote for all officers that are now or hereafter may be elected by the people, and upon all questions submitted to the electors at any elections."

I have no comment to make on that objection to the constitution of South Carolina.

The next objection is, that—

"Section eight expressly prohibits the Legislature passing any law depriving a convict of larceny of the right of suffrage."

I will read that section:

"Sec. 8. The General Assembly shall never pass any law that will deprive any of the citizens of this State of the right of suffrage, except for treason, murder, robbery, or dueling, whereof the persons shall have been duly tried and convicted."

That is a most righteous and politic provision, made to prevent these patriotic remonstrants from disfranchising or selling into servitude for a period of twenty years or more, as they have already done in repeated instances, men charged with petty offenses, because they happened to be black.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman if that is the clause which specifies the offenses which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] said "gentlemen" were not likely to commit?

Mr. PAINE. I do not know what the gentleman from Kentucky did say on the subject. I did not happen to hear it.

I now read another and the next objection to the constitution:

"Section sixteen provides that no debt contracted by this State in behalf of the late rebellion, in whole or in part, shall ever be paid. Why should the non-property holding negroes, Yankees, and southern renegades in the convention prohibit the property holders from paying these debts if they see proper to do so, and preserve untarnished the honor of their State?"

I make no comment on that. It speaks for itself.

The next objection is this:

"Section three of article ten establishes a uniform system of free public schools throughout the State, and provides for the division of the State into school districts."

What a commentary on the character of the wise men who utter it and of the State which produces such wise men! It certainly behooves the "ancient chivalry" of South Carolina to "remonstrate" vigorously against such calumnies.

The next objection is that—

"Section four makes it compulsory for all children between the ages of six and sixteen to attend school for two years. The compulsory system may suit the genius of a despotic Government like Prussia, but is at war with the spirit of our free institutions."

This, too, is strikingly characteristic of the source from which it emanates. It reminds us of the night of bondage from which these States have just emerged, and into which these remonstrants seek again to force them, and it lifts the veil and reveals to us the future prosperity and advancement and glory of these regenerated States.

The next objection is that—

"Section eight provides for the establishment of State reform schools for juvenile offenders."

I make no comment on a provision so common in constitutions of the United States and so beneficent in its results.

The next objection is this:

"Section five of article eleven forces each county to provide for the support of the aged, infirm, and unfortunate."

This section is in these words:

"Sec. 5. The respective counties of this State shall make such provision as may be determined by law for all those inhabitants who by reason of age and infirmities or misfortunes may have a claim upon the sympathy and aid of society."

This power would exist without special grant in a State Legislature, and is universally exercised. The same provision is made in section three, article ten, of the constitution of Indiana, and I doubt not in the constitutions of many other States.

The next objection is this:

"Heretofore South Carolina has pursued a wise policy in refusing all divorces. The marriage contract is not like that of any other, which the parties may rescind at pleasure, without injury to society. There is a third party—innocent and helpless children—who are deeply interested in all divorces. Moreover, it tends to demoralize every community where it is allowed or tolerated. But section four gives the courts power to grant divorces. This section was intended, perhaps, for the especial benefit of the negroes. It ought also to have legalized polygamy, which has likewise great favor with this class of people."

It seems to be the judgment of the large majority of the American people that courts should be permitted in certain cases to grant divorce. Accordingly in almost all of the States courts are clothed with this power. Of course the wise men of South Carolina think differently and know better. There is nothing novel in this. But that they should express the opinion that polygamy ought to be legalized is certainly surprising when we consider how little concern they have felt heretofore about the legality of such practices.

The next objection is stated in the following words:

"The settlement of a wife's property, provided for in section eight, might have been left to the discretion and wisdom of the Legislature. It is an experiment, and, if found mischievous or unwise, the Legislature ought to have the power of changing or altering the law. But this ordinary act of legislation has been incorporated in the constitution as a fundamental law, not to be repealed."

I will read the section referred to:

"Sec. 8. The real and personal property of a woman, held at the time of her marriage, or that which she may thereafter acquire, either by gift, grant, inheritance, devise, or otherwise, shall not be subject to levy and sale for her husband's debts, but shall be held as her separate property, and may be bequeathed, devised, or alienated by her the same as if she were unmarried: Provided, That no gift or grant from the husband to the wife shall be detrimental to the just claims of his creditors."

I now read the corresponding provision in article fourtgen, section five, of the constitution of Oregon:

"The property and pecuniary rights of every married woman at the time of marriage, or afterward acquired by gift, devise, or inheritance, shall not be subject to the debts or contracts of the husband, and laws shall be passed providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

The fourteenth section of the eleventh article of the constitution of California and the nineteenth section of the seventh article of the old constitution of Texas are both in the following words:

"All property, both real and personal, of the wife owned or claimed by her before marriage, and that acquired afterward by gift, devise, or descent, shall be her separate property; and laws shall be passed more clearly defining the rights of the wife in relation as well to her separate property as that held in common with her husband. Laws shall be passed providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

The next objection requires no comment. It is that a certain ordinance invalidates the rebel State debts.

The next objection also answers itself. It is in these words:

"The ordinance to create a board of land commissioners authorizes the purchase of lands for the purpose of selling them out in small tracts to purchasers on credit."

The next objection is that—

"The principle which pervades that entire instrument is that all taxation, except for a single purpose, shall be imposed upon real estate and upon the income from the sale of merchandise."

To show the real character of this objection I will read all the provisions bearing on this point:

"ARTICLE IX.—Finance and Taxation.

"Sec. 1. The General Assembly shall provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, real, personal, and possessory, except mines and mining claims, the proceeds of which alone shall be taxed; and also excepting such property as may be exempted by law for municipal, educational, literary, scientific, religious, or charitable purposes."

"Sec. 2. The General Assembly may provide annually for a poll-tax, not to exceed one dollar on each poll, which shall be applied exclusively to the public school fund. And no additional poll-tax shall be levied by any municipal corporation."

"Sec. 4. No tax shall be levied except in pursuance of a law, which shall distinctly state the object of the same; to which object such tax shall be applied."

"Sec. 5. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to enact laws for the exemption from taxation of all public schools, colleges, and institutions of learning, all charitable institutions in the nature of asylums for the infirm, deaf and dumb, blind, idiotic, and indigent persons, all public libraries, churches, and burying grounds; but property of associations and societies, although connected with charitable objects, shall not be exempt from State, county, or municipal taxation: Provided, That this exemption shall not extend beyond the buildings and premises actually occupied by such schools, colleges, institutions of learning, asylums, libraries, churches, and burying grounds, although connected with charitable objects."

"Sec. 6. The General Assembly shall provide for the valuation and assessment of all lands and the improvements thereon, prior to the assembling of the General Assembly of 1870, and thereafter on every fifth year."

"Sec. 8. The corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns, and villages may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes; such taxes to be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same. And the General Assembly shall require that all the property, except as heretofore exempted within the limits of municipal corporations, shall be taxed for the payment of debts contracted under authority of law."

The next objection is set forth in the following graphic and characteristic language:

"We have thus suggested to your honorable body some of the prominent objections to your adoption of this constitution. We waive all argument upon the subject of its validity. It is a constitution de facto, and that is the ground upon which we approach your honorable body in the spirit of earnest remonstrance. That constitution was the work of northern adventurers, southern renegades, and ignorant negroes. Not one per cent. of the white population of the State approves it, and not two per cent. of the negroes who voted for its adoption know any more than a dog, horse, or cat what his act of voting implied. That constitution enfranchises every male negro over the age of twenty-one, and disfranchises many of the purest and best white men of the State."

This raises the great question of the enfranchisement of the loyal colored men of the South, which question the American people have, thank God, resolved not to submit to the decision of southern rebels. I will only detain you to hear the modest plan for the solution of this question presented by these remonstrants. I read from their manifesto:

"Resolved, That under the action of the State of South Carolina, heretofore taken, we recognize the colored population of the State as an integral element of the body-politic; and, as such, in person and property, entitled to a full and equal protection under the State constitution and laws. And that, as citizens of South Carolina, we declare our willingness, when we have the power, to grant them, under proper qualifications as to property and intelligence, the right of suffrage."

I have now examined seriatim, in the presence of the House, all the points of this remonstrance, and, if I were given at all to theatrical attitudes, I should be ready, in compliance with the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, to lay my hand upon my heart and declare that this constitution, which no one proposes to force upon the people of South Carolina, as he asserts, but which has been framed by them and adopted by a majority of forty-three thousand votes, is as near faultless as any State constitution now in force in the United States. Is it possible, sir, that the gentleman from Kentucky can lay his hand on his own heart and declare that in all this thin balderdash of Wade Hampton & Co. he can find any decent pretext for denying to these people the constitutions of their choice, which they themselves have by such overwhelming majorities adopted?

Now, Mr. Speaker, these objections really comprise the substance of all the objections that have been urged on this floor against these constitutions. I believe that no member of this House will find here any excuse for rejecting the constitutions presented to this House to-day, and under which these States ask for admission to representation in this and the other branch of Congress.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAINE. I have already transgressed the limits of the time that was allotted to me, and have been expecting to hear the hammer fall. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Internal Tax.

SPEECH OF HON. R. C. SCHENCK,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 1, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes—

Mr. SCHENCK said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: A great deal that I may have to say on this project of a law which we have now placed before the House and the country, I shall reserve for the debate that will necessarily arise on the various amendments that may be offered and points made in the progress of its consideration and discussion. The bill is long—the longest, perhaps, ever submitted to Congress; but gentlemen must not be alarmed on that account. It need not occupy our time in disposing of it at all in proportion to that length. The long and patient labor of the Committee of Ways and Means will be found to have abridged in considerable degree, I think, the labor of this committee.

Gentlemen will please to observe the title of this bill. It tells truly and succinctly the character and extent of our work. It is "a bill to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes."

When the Committee of Ways and Means at this session entered first on the task of considering what legislation might be required in relation to internal taxes, it was with the expectation—an expectation shared in probably by most members around me—that their attention and their labor might be confined to changes of some parts of the law to meet generally the altered condition of things in the country, and particularly to satisfy the reasonable desire of the people for relief to be extended to some of the industrial interests which had been heavily burdened under the necessities of a state of war, but from which a portion at least of those burdens might now be lifted. Added to this was the conviction of an evident need for more ingenious devices, and more vigorous provisions, to prevent or punish the sadly, dreadfully increasing growth and boldness of fraud in the practices of tax-payers and of officials—practices which were threatening, if unchecked, to rob the Government of a large proportion of the revenue legitimately accruing and needed for its uses. It was soon apparent, however, that our work, to be thorough, could not stop with such partial accomplishment.

The present laws relating to internal revenue are embraced in twenty-five different acts, spreading through the statute-book from August, 1861, to the present session. These acts, in succession, enlarge, restrict, modify, repeal, and not unfrequently repeat or contradict, much of what goes before, so that the whole mass of them, if not chaotic, are at least, in many respects, anything but clear and easy to be understood by the people who are to obey or by the officers who are to enforce them. The obscurities are only in a degree removed by interpretations and regulations. I beg to be understood, in speaking thus, as not meaning to imply any disparagement of the work of any former committee or former Congress. Internal taxation was an experiment—a necessity on which we were driven; and it was not to be expected that a new system should be built up and adapted to the business and habits of our country and people hastily and under the pressure of circumstances without its being in many respects imperfect in form, if not crude in substance. So we found it.

I do not for a moment pretend to claim perfection for the bill before you, and by which we have sought to remedy some of these defects and evils in the existing law. But we have done the best we could, with these views of what it was our duty to attempt. The compilation and condensation of the internal revenue laws, prepared at the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, a copy of which I hold here in my hand, contains one hundred and forty-one pages of closely printed matter. The pamphlet edition of the bill we present shows one hundred and twenty-four pages, but, allowing for the difference in the width of the print, the contents are perhaps about the same. This is owing to the fact that while we have codified, and very much compressed and abridged what is now in the law, we have also added a great number of new provisions that seemed necessary for effective legislation. I do not wish to be thought to magnify the labor of the committee, but some idea of the nature of our work may also be obtained by the inspection of this curiously mottled copy of the bill which I now exhibit to you. I will explain what it is. Mr. Bassett, the very intelligent and faithful clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means, has ingeniously prepared for my convenience a copy which shows over all its pages and on the margin by distinctive red and blue pencil marks what sections or portions of each section are new matter, and what parts are reenactments of the existing provisions of law. Gentlemen will observe what a perfect piece of mosaic work he has made of it. For instance, one section on which I now cast my eye I see by the markings and marginal references is made up by selecting here a sentence and there part of a sentence, and there a separate clause, collected from as many as six different places scattered through the present statutes, all on the same subject, and intimately related, but now for the first time brought together in their proper connection.

Having said this much in regard to the general scope of our labor and the spirit in which we have conducted it, I will proceed now, Mr. Chairman, to make some brief explanations and analysis of the bill we are considering, so as to give gentlemen some idea of its structure, and the most material points in which it differs from the present law. The key-note of one great change which we propose, and which pervades and distinguishes our bill throughout, is to be found in the first and immediately succeeding sections. We propose, it will be seen, to make of the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue an independent department. By this I do not mean a department with an officer at its head who is to be expected, under the usage of the Government, to be invited to the Cabinet councils of the President; but one rather like the Department of Agriculture with a chief, styled, not a secretary, but a commissioner. The provisions which follow immediately after this will make our purpose obvious. We desire to give this independent character to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in order not only to mark and secure his own responsibility and accountability for the conduct and management of all affairs in the department, but to enable him, under the Constitution, as "head of a Department," to appoint all his subordinates, for whom and whose conduct also we intend he shall be in the fullest degree responsible.

No one could have studied or observed, even in the most casual way, the working of our internal revenue system without having been forced to the conclusion that the greatest present evil under which we labor, and that which contributes most to defeat the collection of our taxes, is the dishonest character of the officials employed, and when remedies for these are sought the impossibility of finding anybody responsible for the appointment of such agents or for their conduct. In short, there is no head to the establishment; or perhaps it would be more nearly true to say that, worse than that, it is a triple-headed monster. We have the President, Secretary of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to look to—all and each—and yet in fact neither of them acknowledging full responsibility.

What is the consequence? Tax-payers commit frauds, officers connive at them, often they even give active assistance in the stealing that is going on; complaints are made; the Commissioner replies that he has no power over these officers to remove the thieves and appoint honest men, because the selections are made through the Secretary of the Treasury and by the President. The Secretary, if appealed to, explains that he can do nothing but advise the President, and shelters himself in that way. The President interposes both the Secretary and the Commissioner between himself and the people; and the simple result of it all is, that, with the whole country looking on, the stealing is not stopped, but proceeds, growing worse and worse, and the scoundrels bolder and bolder from day to day, until the whole aggregate evil is appalling, and it has become a question who rules this country—whether its proper constituted authorities or gangs of tobacco thieves and a "whisky ring?"

That I do not speak too strongly, in explanation of this first section of the bill upon which I am commenting, I will undertake to show by a brief reference to some facts which may be considered more fully hereafter when we come to debate the particular sections of the bill involving the questions under consideration, the independence of the department.

The New York Evening Post charges that the Committee of Ways and Means, and their chairman, by introducing a bill of the character of that now before you, embracing as one of its distinguishing characteristics the feature to which I am now referring, are assuming to be king-makers. It says that to give such power to a commission or to any officer of this Government, as is provided for by the various sections of this bill, is virtually to confer power equal to royalty. And the writer in that paper illustrates this by reference to one of the sections, section ten, a section which gives to the Commissioner power to change and alter the existing collection districts as may seem to be expedient, or may become necessary in the execution of the law.

Sir, that was an unfortunate illustration, for it so happens that that section ten is one of the sections copied from the existing law, with the single exception of changing the head of the department. It is proposed by this section to confer upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a power before vested in the Secretary of the Treasury and the President. If it be admitted that there must be an individual responsible, a certain head of the department, then you admit the necessity of that among other provisions of the law, and in looking around for some exemplification of the kingly power to be exercised by this head of the department, it was unfortunate that the writer of the article should have stumbled upon that which is virtually now in the law.

Mr. Chairman, I admit that this bill will confer very large powers upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and powers which ought not to be delegated to him or to any officer of the Government, unless made necessary for the due and secure enforcement of the law. The question is not upon the delegation of authority. Everybody will admit that a head of the department must have this power. The true question is, whether this one person clothed with these extraordinary powers, but restrained by a proper accountability or responsibility, will not secure for us, from the general fund of collected taxes, a larger amount for the use of the Government than the present system yields.

The writer in the New York Evening Post seems to have no fear (and perhaps such is the prevailing sentiment in these days) of the President being made a king. But I say that whether it be President, Secretary, or Commissioner, there ought to be no fear in placing the power somewhere and with some officer, who can be distinctly known and who can be distinctly held by the people to the performance of his trusts.

If this House and the Congress should not agree with us in doing what we have thought to be most expedient—to create this department and put at the head of it an officer, saying to him, "There are the powers; here is the revenue to be collected; the whole accountability is thrown upon you; collect these taxes, or neglect to do it at your peril"—if Congress, I say, should not agree to that, then I will at least ask that, refusing to confer this power upon the Commissioner with such instructions, they shall confer it upon the Secretary of the Treasury without the intervention of the commissioner, or upon the President without the intervention of the Commissioner or Secretary; upon somebody, somewhere, so that we may know who to hold to account for that which is done, and for that which is omitted to be done. I am pleading a cause of vital interest to the country, the raising of revenues honestly, fairly, and without fraud and robbery, to the amount of our necessities.

I say there is in fact no head now. How do I prove this? Take a report which came in the shape of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senate on the 14th of February last in answer to a resolution calling for information. If any gentleman will take pains to look at that document he will find that it embodies, among other things, this statement by the Secretary:

"The recommendations of the Commissioner in regard to some fourteen officers are still under advisement, and proper means are being used to ascertain whether or not the incumbents ought to be removed, and whether removals, if considered advisable, are likely to be effected by the confirmation by the Senate of such nominations as may be made by the President."

"It must be obvious to the Senate that the failure of an effort to effect the removal of an inefficient and dishonest officer would prejudice rather than benefit the service, and that, therefore, it is not only necessary that the character of officers should be subjected to proper scrutiny, but that the practicability of changes should receive careful consideration."

And there comes in another element of necessity to be calculated when we are proposing to make this Commissioner not only the single head of the department, but to confer upon him the power of removal and appointment. You have now not only a triple head to the department, responsibility being divided between the President, the Secretary, and the Commissioner, but a fourth body comes in to share in the responsibility, to wit, the Senate; and if the Secretary, the Commissioner, and the President can be agreed as to what shall be done in reference to removals and appointments, then arises the other difficulty. They express a doubt as to whether there can be anything like accord between them and the Senate, so as to procure confirmation of those who may be appointed.

What further does the Secretary say? He claims that all recommendations for removal during the session of the Senate have received prompt and proper attention by the Executive, and complains further that much of the difficulty arises from the restraint under the tenure-of-office law. Now, what are the facts? Here are the names of twenty-seven persons, the list being confined to assessors and collectors alone, the removal of about one half of whom was called for in July last, nearly a year ago, and the removal of the others in December last. Of the whole twenty-seven, how many, think you, have been displaced up to this time? I believe but one.

Let me give you a few items upon these points, obtained by investigation at the Commissioner's office. I find that on the 15th of July, 1867, while the Senate was in session, the Commissioner made recommendations for the removal of four assessors and three collectors; that all of those assessors are still in service; and that one of the three collectors was suspended in September last, but the case has never been disposed of by the Senate; and another of the collectors afterward resigned. So that of these seven recommendations for the removal of officers not a single recommendation has yet been effective. All the assessors are still in office; one of the collectors has resigned, and one only has been suspended. Therefore if it can be claimed that there has been any action upon the recommendations in these cases, it amounts simply to the suspension of one of the seven officers, not one of them having been removed.

Again, on the 30th of December, 1867, eight collectors and two assessors were recommended for removal. One of these collectors, Steadman, afterward resigned; one of the assessors of the first district in Mississippi has been removed; but all the others of the ten are still in service.

On the 15th of January, 1868, three assessors and two collectors were recommended to be removed; the recommendation being made as in all the other cases by the Commissioner. In reference to those no change whatever founded upon these recommendations has been made. A man by the name of Hopkins, in the first district of Georgia, was suspended, although he was not on the list made up by the Commissioner. The Secretary is mistaken in this respect; at least in the Secretary's reply, which contains all the letters of this kind, I find no letter making the recommendation. But this officer was suspended upon a charge of perjury in taking the test-oath at the time of entering on the duties of his collectorship. But it was not until a year after the taking of that oath, nor until immediately after his election to the constitutional convention of Georgia, that the suspension was made; but no successor has been appointed.

In short, of all the removals recommended by the Commissioner it seems that only one has been made. Four suspensions have been made by the President during the recess last summer, and one in January, while the Senate was in session; but neither of these has been acted upon by the Senate. Several recommendations, I find, have been made by the Commissioner since the letter of the Secretary, dated on the 14th of February last, one recommending the removal of the collector of the first South Carolina district, and also of the collector in the first district of Mississippi; but upon neither of these recommendations, so far as I can ascertain, has there been any action by the Secretary or the President. The office of assessor in four districts has been vacant since the 3d of March, 1867; in one district since the 15th of November, 1867; in two districts since December, 1867; and in one since January, 1868.

But I will not detain the committee with further facts of this character. I give them by way of illustration; and what I say is that although a year ago it was manifest to the Commissioner that fraud and peculation and the connivance at fraud were marking the career and course of a great many subordinates in the internal revenue service, and the proper authorities were appealed to as the laws now exist to have these delinquent and scoundrel officers removed, such is the diffusion of responsibility between the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Senate, that little or no regard, you may say almost none at all, has been paid to this or any subsequent recommendation.

What I claim, therefore, is, that it has become apparent to the country, as it has to us while looking into this matter, that if we would have the revenue of the country collected it is time to stop this diffusion of responsibility, existing under the present law to such extent that it seems to rest upon nobody with sufficient weight to procure a certain performance of the duty of seeing that we have good and faithful officers to assess and collect the tax. Look at one of these consequences. Here is the second district in Indiana, where a vacancy occurred on the 3d of March, 1867, nearly fifteen months ago, and yet that district is vacant to this day. In the first New York, tenth Pennsylvania, fourth Wisconsin, in all these districts the vacancy in the assessorship has continued from the 3d of March, the same date, up to this time. In the fourth district of Virginia no assessor since the 15th of September, 1867. In the fourth district of Ohio none since the 20th of December, 1867.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman from Ohio refers to the second district of Indiana. I see that my colleague, [Mr. KERR,] who represents that district, is not now in his seat; and I wish to say that that vacancy continues by reason of the failure of the Senate to confirm such persons as have been nominated. Repeated nominations have failed to be confirmed on account of the disagreement between the Senate and the Executive. I presume in the other cases the difficulty has arisen in the same way.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee will bear me witness that I have not in the course of this argument been laying the responsibility upon any particular branch of the Government. I have said that the law is such that between the President, the Senate, the Secretary, and the Commissioner, there is such division of responsibility that we can get nothing done.

Mr. NIBLACK. I thought it added force to the gentleman's illustration.

Mr. SCHENCK. It does. I am obliged to my colleague on the committee for the suggestion. It proves even if the President were all right, if the Secretary were all right, if the Commissioner were all right, it might yet be that there is another body that would fail to meet the necessity in not acting upon the recommendations made by the proper Department. I do not say it is so. I repeat, from the divided responsibility and the want of accord between them we have no proper officers, I might almost say none, with exceptional cases, to collect the revenue, and the stealing goes on.

But my argument is, at present at least, confined to this point, that whether it be the fault of the President or of the Senate we have no accord between them; or whether the Commissioner has not enough influence with the Secretary, or the Secretary not enough with the President, or whether nominations are not made at all, or if nominations are made, they are so improper that the Senate in the discharge of their duty do not feel they ought to confirm them, wherever the fault be, every one of these facts tends to illustrate the one single proposition, we have an establishment without a responsible head, and the law will never be executed and the tax never collected until we reduce our system to one of concentrated responsibility.

Our method of effecting this is to give to the head of the Department, whoever that head may be, entire power over the subordinates of the Department; to appoint them for sufficient reasons, to fill vacancies when they may occur, and to remove them when, in his judgment, they are not properly qualified to discharge the duties confided to them.

There are three ways in which the responsibility of subordinates might possibly be provided for, and every one of them received, before we came to the conclusion we have embodied in the first sections of the bill, attention and discussion by the committee.

It was thought by some that one mode of getting good officers, as it was vitally necessary to secure intelligence and honesty, would be to adopt for the internal revenue department something like the provisions of the civil service bill, which is now pending in this House, and which has been so admirably presented and firmly insisted on as a cure for these evils in our political system by the accomplished gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES.] But there was a difficulty in legislating differently for this department from other Departments. There was a difficulty in adopting all the machinery of a board of examiners as contained in that bill now pending before you, (and which I intend, for myself, most heartily to support,) and it was thought better not to attempt such special legislation in reference to one particular department, but to apply a cure for the evil now, even if that cure should come hereafter in another shape by a general bill on the subject.

Another proposition, and by some at first insisted upon, was that good officers would be secured if you required that all the inspectors, special agents, storekeepers, and other subordinates should have the confirmation of the Senate superadded to the nomination of the President, and thus, by concurrent action of the President and Senate, the best men might be selected. I think a sufficient answer to that proposition has already been made by the illustration I have given in regard to assessors and collectors. If with a limited number of these officers, two hundred and forty only of each kind, assessors and collectors, we cannot have that coöperation between the President and Senate which is requisite to secure honest men of these classes, how much worse would "confusion be confounded" if we were to throw upon the Senate the burden of considering, examining, and deciding upon the case of each one of the inferior officers?

I concluded then (and others agreed with me) that the proper mode was to concentrate the responsibility in one particular head of department; and confessing that the powers are great, I maintain that the emergency is greater, and to meet this emergency this plan is presented in the full confidence of its success.

The collection of an internal tax must always be accompanied with much that is disagreeable to an officer of the law, and much that makes it odious to the people who are compelled to submit to what are naturally unpleasant requirements. But one reason for that is, if you are to collect the excise at all, if you are to impose an internal tax to meet the necessities of the Government, it is a tax of a nature which requires above all others, perhaps, that there should be a prompt, ready, almost arbitrary power exercised at each stage of collection. Taking for granted, then, that power of this kind must be lodged somewhere and with some officer, and satisfied that if you distribute it the power will not be exercised for the benefit of the country at large, but that those whose duty it is to enforce the law will escape responsibility by division of their accountability to the public, we have settled upon the conclusion that the true way to get the tax collected is to have it done under one officer strongly empowered and armed for the purpose, and to hold him to the strictest account for everything that he shall do under the law, under such circumstances that all public observation and all watchfulness of the law may be concentrated upon him without the possibility of his escaping from that accountability.

Does this House recollect a very remarkable communication made by the Secretary of the Treasury a few months ago touching this subject? It was found during the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, some time before we adjourned, that there had been established or grown up under the authority of the Treasury Department, in the city of New York especially, but also in some of the other cities of the Union, what were called metropolitan boards. As it was a provision for the investment of power in officers not recognized nor provided for in the revenue laws of the country, I myself offered a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the reason for their creation, and the conferring of power upon them outside of the law. You may remember his answer. It is on record. The Secretary of the Treasury, in explaining what he had done, informed us that his action was necessary, because he could not trust the officers of the revenue who were employed in these different cities, but was compelled to create a board to sit perpetually and watch them. We said then it would have been far better for the Secretary of the Treasury to have removed the defaulting and rascally officers; but he threw himself upon that confession before Congress and before the country, and I am very well satisfied that the confession did but disclose the proof that he stood aghast in the center of his cordon of officials, knowing that they were stealing the revenue which it was his duty to see collected, and he had deemed it impossible to correct the evil without setting somebody else to watch the rogues he had in his employ.

Now, then, I want to get rid of that whole necessity, and I end upon this point, as I began, with admitting that this is very great power to be conferred upon a single officer—not much greater, however, by the way, than is exercised under some degree of supervision, it is true, but almost without control, by the collector of customs having an official army under him at the port of New York; but it is great power to be conferred upon any one officer. And yet while this great power is thus conferred, and as I claim necessarily conferred, I hope gentlemen will find as they advance further through the bill and see its different provisions, that we have taken good care to hold this officer himself to the completest account for that which he may be called upon to do. When we come to discuss those sections of the bill it may be that I shall have many more illustrations to give to the House from facts which I have collected by investigations made at the revenue department in relation to the bad working of the present system; but I leave it for the present.

I desire now to ask the attention of the committee to the peculiar features of the law which we propose as it regards the organization of the internal revenue department. I have prepared the following table, which exhibits in brief a statement of the number of officers employed in the department proper or office of internal revenue under the existing law, and the number which we propose by the bill:

It will be seen that under the present law there is one commissioner at a salary of $6,000. We propose to retain him at the same salary. There are three deputy commissioners at salaries of $3,500, $3,000, and $2,000 respectively. Instead of these three deputy commissioners, we propose one assistant commissioner and six deputy commissioners, for reasons which I shall presently explain. Under the present law there are seven heads of divisions, at $2,500 each. We propose to dispense with them altogether. The solicitor we retain. The thirty-four fourth-class clerks we reduce to twenty-five; the thirty-five third-class clerks we make forty; the fifty second-class clerks we reduce to forty; the thirty-seven first-class clerks we reduce to twenty-five; the fifty-five female clerks we reduce to fifty; the five messengers to three messengers; the three assistant messengers we retain; and the fifteen laborers we reduce to ten. Under the present law a number of officers are provided for, with salaries amounting in the aggregate to $350,210. We, although we have the six deputies I have spoken of, have provided only for a number of officers with aggregate salaries amounting to $283,180—a saving of $67,030 per year on salaries in this organization.

There are other officers, however, in the general service of the Department under the present law. During the last month, when the numbers were obtained, I find that there were two hundred and forty collectors and two hundred and forty assessors, and there were three thousand four hundred and forty-four assistant assessors. These three thousand four hundred and forty-four assistant assessors I must, in justice, however, to the Department and its administration, admit have now been reduced by some four or five hundred, mainly under the effect of the law which we passed relieving manufacturers from assessment upon valuation.

There are eleven revenue agents under the existing law, ten under one clause, and one appointed under another; with an aggregate salary of $23,000. There are two hundred and eighty-eight revenue inspectors. There are thirty special agents of one class at five dollars a day, two of another class at six dollars a day, two of another class at seven dollars a day, and one of ten dollars a day, making an aggregate of $67,890 for those inspectors and agents. This gives, however, but a shadow, as it were, of the whole number employed, because I find that in addition to the officers I have named, on the 10th of April last, there were six hundred and thirty-eight general inspectors of spirits, six hundred and ninety-one inspectors of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and one hundred and forty-five inspectors of coal oil. What we propose is a system by which we shall sweep out of existence, as gentlemen will find on reading further in the bill, all this array of inspectors of spirits, coal oil, and tobacco, who are now employed by the Government nominally, but paid by distillers and others, and belong to the distillers or manufacturers. We propose to do away with all these revenue agents and with all special agents of every kind, and to confine ourselves to storekeepers and gangers who, under the direction of the local officers, shall perform the duties of these inspectors, but who shall be paid some proper compensation by the Government.

On comparing the present law with the proposed law, we find that the aggregate cost under the present law for the officers whom I named was $4,362,170, and under the proposed law we provide for $3,672,200, being $689,970 less than the existing law, with this, however, to be considered in that connection: that is, that we shall probably make no reduction of the actual direct expenses on the part of the Government, because in this statement is not included storekeepers. We propose that storekeepers hereafter shall be paid by the Government at the different distilleries and warehouses where they are employed.

That being the case, it will probably take nearly a million of dollars to pay the per diem of all these storekeepers, at four or five dollars; whatever sum may be fixed by the House. We have reported it at five dollars per day. Thus the actual expenditures for all these outside officers in the revenue service may even be some two or three hundred thousand dollars more than under the existing law.

Why are we willing to do that? Because we believe that for that direct expenditure in the payment of these classes of subordinate officers we will be many hundredfold reimbursed by having them depend upon the Government and not upon those to whom they are sent.

How does this thing work now? Probably some gentlemen may have been making the same observations I have, and will confirm what I am about to say. In some country district represented by some gentlemen here upon this floor there is possibly a distillery, and the same is, I suppose, equally true, in some form or other, in regard to distilleries in the cities. An inspector is sent to that distillery to remain there in charge under a law which provides that he shall receive a per diem compensation from the distiller.

What is the consequence? The moment he arrives at the distillery he is taken into the confidence of the distiller, perhaps carried to his house to board, free of all expense, made to feel in every way that he gets his pay and employment from the distiller, and not from the Government he professes to serve; and by a natural process of reasoning and feeling on his part he very soon settles down into a habit of thought conforming to the idea that he belongs not to the Government but to the distiller.

A gentleman near me asks if he will not get pay from both sides if the Government pays him, instead of from one side, as now. We have recommended in our bill, and I will presently refer to it, a system of supervision in the different judicial districts by competent and responsible officers provided for that purpose, with power on the part of those officers and with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue alike to change storekeepers from distillery to distillery and warehouse to warehouse; thus preventing them from growing fixed in their places, like snails and barnacles attached to the particular distillery to which they may have been originally sent, and keeping them going from place to place under the eye of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that the gentleman's time be indefinitely extended.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I thank the committee for this extension. I had no idea that in the explanation I am making I had occupied so much of their time, for I have not been watching the clock.

To resume. We are willing, for the sake of asserting the great principle that each officer must be employed by the Government, and look to the Government, and be responsible entirely to the Government, to adopt a system which shall cost possibly some two or three hundred thousand dollars more in the collection of the taxes, while we shall save, perhaps, more than millions upon millions by changing the system and the practice.

There is another thing to which I have but alluded, but which I will now explain. I have said that we get rid of the whole tribe of revenue and special agents. Under the present law a revenue agent, operating in a certain district, it may be in Illinois, Indiana, or New York, is sent with power to go into any district and make seizures right and left; assume all the functions of the local officers; be accountable to none of those local officers, and in practice, I must confess, scarcely accountable to the central officer here. And yet the collector, as well as the assessor, has certain duties imposed upon him which he is expected and required to perform.

Some stranger, some one of these fellows with a roving commission, goes into a district, elbows aside the collector and assessor, and undertakes to perform the functions of either or both of them, to make seizures, to decide questions, and to do everything connected with the collection of the revenue.

The consequence is that your assessor or collector, finding his jurisdiction thus invaded, if he be dishonest colludes with the agent (who, without much violence I may assume, is generally dishonest,) or else runs a little opposition "ring" against him; or if he be honest, folds his arms, feeling that he is thus thrust aside to make room for another who is sent there to usurp his functions, and lets everything go as it will. We propose to get rid of all that by holding each assessor and each collector to the strictest account for all that takes place within his local jurisdiction, and not to give him the excuse that some man comes in from the outside and exercises independent functions within that jurisdiction.

There is another feature in the present law which we have undertaken to sweep away. It is provided now that a collector of any one district may have a special commission to invade any and every other district within a region of country and perform the duties of collector, assessor, and all other revenue officers within these districts which he visits. There is an example of this going on just at this moment in the State of New York. A Mr. Bailey, who is the collector of the fourth collection district of that State, has a sort of general roving commission under the law to go into all the neighboring districts, to make seizures right and left, and exercise all the functions of the local officers, without either coöperating with them or regarding what may be their particular duties. Now, it may be that it was felt to be very necessary to send one collector to watch other collectors and assessors because one or all were dishonest, and, in the opinion of the Department, "rogues must be set to watch rogues." I mean nothing personal or disrespectful to Mr. Bailey. I am only using this case to illustrate a vicious system and practice. If that is not the reason, then it may be a great refinement upon the idea of responsibility to send one honest collector to look after the various other honest collectors and assessors, and thus make the action under the laws, in the collection of revenue in the different districts, conform to the action here, where responsibility is thus divided.

But in framing this bill, we have set our faces against all division of responsibility. We have provided, in lieu of these special agents, a system of this kind: we propose that in each judicial district, (except in the cases of Florida, Delaware, and like small districts, where an attachment to an adjacent district is suggested,) there shall be a supervisor of internal revenue; but instead of being a wandering officer he is to be a responsible man, properly paid by the Government, having a fixed office. In fact, an officer to whom reference may be made, and whose duty it shall be to supervise and report upon the conduct of all the local revenue officers within his district. But even he is to refer the cases for final action to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Thus a system of responsibility from the head downward is to be maintained. So that if there be anything wrong in the division of an assistant assessor, that assistant assessor shall be held accountable. If there be anything wrong in the collection district, the collector and assessor, according to their particular duties, shall be held responsible for derelictions and omissions of duty. If there be anything wrong in a judicial district, the supervisor of revenue for that district, who is no mere temporary or ambulatory official, but a man of responsibility, with a fixed office, shall be held responsible. And if there be anything wrong in the collection of the revenue of the whole country, in the general conduct of its officers or their particular conduct in any special district, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, standing at the head, is to be held responsible for the whole and for all the particulars. But I have already, I think, detained the committee too long on that point, and I will leave it.

The next explanation I desire to make is in regard to the particular portion of the bill which relates generally to manufactures. The policy of the Committee of Ways and Means, according, as I think, with the general policy expected and desired by the country, was indicated by the act which was passed by the present Congress on the 31st of March. Gentlemen on the Democratic side will excuse me for quoting a good sentiment; no matter whence it comes if they are but fond of that kind of literature; I commend it heartily to their attention. They will find it in the Republican platform adopted the other day at Chicago—a principle and a rule by which the committee seeks to square its action. The fourth resolution in that platform declares—

"That it is due to the labor of the nation that taxation should be equalized and reduced as rapidly as the national faith will permit."

Mr. BURR rose.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will have an opportunity afterward.

This resolution, Mr. Chairman, is but in conformity to the views of the Committee of Ways and Means as declared by them in a resolution familiar to this House, passed by the committee and made public in January last, soon after we entered upon our duties in connection with this subject. We then declared, as the sense of the Committee of Ways and Means, "that while we would endeavor to provide for $150,000,000 as the amount of revenue necessary to be obtained from internal taxes, the same should, as far as practicable, be collected from distilled spirits and fermented liquors, tobacco, and manufactures of tobacco, stamps, special taxes, incomes, dividends, luxuries, and amusements, banks and railroads gross receipts, legacies and successions gross receipts, leaving the least possible sum to be collected from the industrial pursuits, or relieving that class of interests entirely." Entire relief of the industry of the country is not possible; but we thought one step was made toward it when, on the 31st of March, there was matured and passed through both Houses of Congress, and approved by the President, a bill, the main and most important feature of which was the relief of the manufacturers of the country from that heavy ad valorem tax of from two to five per cent. charged upon certain commodities. They were remitted to a small tax on sales of only one fifth of one per cent., and that only when those sales exceeded in amount $5,000 per annum.

We have carried that provision in regard to manufactures into this bill, with one exception, upon which I have no doubt we will hear in due time from our friend from the Northwest, who sits in front of me, [Mr. FERRY.] That exception is the exemption of breadstuffs and unmanufactured lumber. I give my friend notice that in the bill we have presented here we have left out those exceptions, and we have taken the ground that all manufacturers are to be treated, not with reference to the particular thing they produce, but with regard to the capital they employ and what they do with it, and how much they succeed in producing and disposing of. We tax the sales of the great body of these manufacturers equally, and whether any exemption is to be made or any particular manufacture favored will be a matter to be discussed when we reach that point.

Following out the idea contained in the resolution to retain luxuries, if gentlemen will look into this bill as it progresses they will find that while we put only this two tenths or one fifth of one per cent. upon the sales of manufacturers generally, we have given less favor to manufacturers of certain luxuries; as, for instance, the manufacturer of fine confectionery is charged six dollars a thousand, or six tenths of one per cent. on all over $5,000. On ornamental jewelry we have charged one per cent. on all over $5,000. On gold and silver ware and fire-arms we have charged the manufacturers one-half of one per cent. On billiard tables and playing cards we have put one full per cent. Our idea has been that, while we adopt the general system of placing a tax on the sale of manufactured articles of one fifth of one per cent., we might still select certain articles used only or generally by those who are wealthy and put a heavier tax on the sales of such articles. Such a tax will be collected mainly, if not entirely, at last from the consumers; and those consumers will be limited, in number and such as are most able to pay.

Gentlemen will find a portion of the bill devoted to the subject of special taxes. Special taxes are what were formerly known as licenses and permits, for which an annual sum was paid. Gentlemen will recollect that the Supreme Court has decided that a law of Congress could not be sustained which required the payment of money for a privilege to carry on a business in the future. They held, however, that they would recognize the right of Congress to impose special taxes on persons engaged in particular pursuits, the carrying on of the business being a condition incident to the levying of the tax. Conforming to that decision of the Supreme Court, for the last two years these have been called not licenses but special taxes. In the existing law there are fifty-one of these subjects of special taxation. We have increased that number to seventy-one, partly by separating from the general mass of manufactures some which were, as I have said, specially to be regarded as objects of luxury, and partly by extending this special taxation to additional occupations which do not come within the class of manufactures. But we have made other changes as to these special taxes. We not only introduce twenty-one more objects of taxation, but we make alterations in regard to particular subjects of tax as now existing.

The retail dealers of the country are now all subject to special taxes upon sales above $1,000. We propose that small retail dealers in goods, wares, and merchandise shall be subject to no tax whatever, unless their sales amount to $5,000 a year or more. Thus very small establishments for neighborhood convenience, in the villages and at the cross-roads, are relieved from any taxation whatever. We have thought it was not so much an act of favor toward these retailers themselves as it was an advantage to the public to leave dealers in future, below so small a limit, free from any burden on their trading.

Wholesale dealers now pay one tenth of one per cent. on their sales above $50,000. We propose to put them on the footing of manufacturers, and charge them two tenths of one per cent.

Lottery managers now are classed with lottery dealers. We make a distinction in this bill between managers and dealers in lottery tickets. While we continue the present tax of $200 on each lottery dealer we hold them to a strict responsibility, and make the managers give bonds for their observance of the law; and we charge each lottery manager who is not thus distinguished under the existing law, $3,000 as his special tax; and I am glad to know that this class of tax-payers have made up their minds to submit contentedly to this increased demand.

We have taxed places of public amusement, theaters and other institutions of that kind, much more heavily than they are now taxed, classifying them, but taking care in the classification to leave out all exhibitions connected with schools, fairs, benevolent institutions, or churches, in which the people have a general interest.

Hotels we have classified by their yearly rental, in such a manner as to bear lightly upon small taverns and inns, and to gain increased revenue upon the large establishments like the Fifth Avenue, Astor House, or Continental, and, perhaps, without offending anybody, I may say Willards.

There is another class of persons brought into the special tax list never before looked after. These we have denominated foreign commercial brokers. I do not know that I ought to explain that provision here, nor will I do so any further than to say this: there is a class of agents coming from Europe taking rooms at the Astor House or Metropolitan Hotel, or some other place in New York or Philadelphia, having no offices nor goods in store, but by samples which they exhibit negotiating the sales of millions of dollars' worth of property, receiving orders which they transmit to Europe, never paying any tax on their sales or their income, and claiming that no officer has the right to impose any such tax. We have, therefore, provided as a measure of protection toward the regular dealers in our country, that while a commercial broker, known and responsible as such, pays his twenty dollars, one of these foreign brokers or agent of a foreign house who is without any fixed place of business, and escapes payment upon his sales, shall pay for his special tax $5,000, and shall be put in the penitentiary, I may add, if he be found exercising his functions in wandering about the country without having paid that special tax.

I touch now upon a fruitful subject—the tax that we put upon distilled spirits. We have provided in reference to retailers of spirituous liquors, that instead of paying twenty-five dollars each they also shall be classified and each pay according to the amount of the business, $25, $50, $100, $200, or $1,000. And we have defined a retail dealer, not, as in the present law, to be one who sells a certain quantity of liquor, $25,000 worth a year, but any person who sells liquor in quantities less than one quart, or sells it to be drunk at the place where it is sold, thus following the definition in the statute-books of most of the States. Wholesale liquor dealers at this time pay one-tenth of one per cent. upon all sales they make above $50,000. We propose that they shall pay hereafter two and a half per cent.—twenty-five times as much—and shall pay it upon all sales above $2,000 instead of on sales above $50,000. I have made an estimate of what we may reasonably expect to obtain by a tax on sales of retail and wholesale liquor dealers at the rate charged in our bill, even if there should not be a further increase on retail dealers, who, I have always thought, ought to pay, in one way or another, about double as much, if not more, than wholesale dealers. And I believe we can obtain from these sources, and from the special taxes on distillers and taxes on the capacity of distilleries, to which I will presently allude, an aggregate revenue of $24,000,000.

I come, then, to the special tax which we would impose upon the distiller himself. We have made this, as gentlemen will observe, $100, and one dollar upon each barrel produced. And here I beg the committee to bear with me a little, while I diverge from this subject of the special tax to other things connected with the sale and production of distilled spirits, naturally connecting themselves with it. I say we have put a special tax upon distillers of $100, and a further special tax of one dollar on each barrel produced. Proceeding further in the bill, gentlemen will find that we have added to those taxes also a tax upon capacity, and that we provide that there shall be three dollars a day paid upon the capacity of every distillery that mashes and ferments one hundred bushels of grain and less, and an additional three dollars a day for every additional one hundred bushels mashed and fermented.

Now, all this is part of a system; all this is a part of the machinery in relation to a revenue to be derived from distilled spirits, and although found under different heads and in different parts of the bill, it must all be in some degree considered together. We have retained, gentlemen will observe, the tax of two dollars a gallon as a direct tax upon whisky; but I take occasion to say here now that it is not the expectation, I believe, even of the committee, that that amount of direct tax will be retained by the House or by Congress. If we had let it be known four months ago that whisky was to be taxed only a dollar or seventy-five cents or some less sum per gallon, we should have lost about four million dollars of revenue, which, within that time, has been derived from the two-dollar tax, under the impression that the two-dollar tax would be continued. Revenue at the rate of about thirteen million dollars a year, to which it had been reduced during the past year, has continued to come in, and we have obtained within the last four or five months, since this matter has been considered, some four or five million dollars which we would not have obtained at all had it been known, with any degree of certainty, that the tax would be reduced. I do not know whether this Congress will agree to reduce the tax. I for one have come very reluctantly to the conclusion that it must be done. From the very beginning I was inclined, much as General Grant was, "to fight it out on that line." But, Mr. Chairman, I, for one, am now convinced that keeping this tax up to two dollars will certainly tend to continue the rule of too whisky ring, and that it is better to reduce it in order that that ring may be broken. We must not be controlled, we must not be governed by these whisky men, who are even at this very moment, many of them, swarming in this city, especially anxious to know whether or not the tax is going to be kept at such a rate that they can continue their speculative or fraudulent operations.

Step by step, therefore, I have brought myself—and I speak now only in my own behalf—to the conclusion that the direct tax on distilled spirits ought to be brought down to something like seventy-five cents on the gallon. The reason why I would be disposed to agree to seventy-five cents is, that from an examination of many witnesses and an investigation of the whole subject, I believe that is about the rate at which it can be fixed and make it impossible for illicit distillation to be carried on with profit. Distillers, or persons so disposed, cannot make spirits from molasses in concealed places, cellars and garrets, in Chicago and Philadelphia, the two great points at which most of this enormous rascality is now carried on; they cannot do it anywhere with anything like their present profit, or, perhaps, with any profit at all, if we underbid them in the market.

And yet I was unwilling to come down to such a low standard of direct taxation on spirits without having put into this bill machinery by which we could collect a very considerable additional tax from it in other ways. By dividing the points where the temptation is felt, we at least put it upon such footing that nothing can be made to any great extent by defrauding the Government in any one particular. The temptations will not be concentrated so that enough can be made in one direction to justify or make profitable the rascality.

What is that machinery? I have already indicated it. If you put your direct tax down to seventy-five cents per gallon raise your special tax upon distilleries from one hundred to five hundred or a thousand dollars, and on each barrel of whisky from one to three or four dollars. Let your tax upon capacity remain where the committee have fixed it, or increase it; and let your tax upon sales, retail and wholesale, be retained to some such amount as we have proposed. If you do all this and pass this bill with its rigorous and carefully prepared administrative sections, I cannot, from a number of calculations made from time to time, come to any conclusion other than that we shall get at least $70,000,000 out of whisky in the coming year instead of $13,000,000 per annum to which the revenue from that source is now reduced.

So much will probably be said about distilled spirits before we get through this bill, and about the various, and, as some think, too severe restrictions on its manufacture and sale, that I shall reserve very much of what I have to say to the discussion of those points when we come to them. But I thought it was not proper that I should fail to present a general view of the machinery in relation to distilled spirits at the beginning of the consideration of this bill, in order to show how this part of the system hangs upon the rest. We have proposed some other changes, which I will briefly recapitulate.

Banks now pay a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. upon their capital and their deposits, and we propose to continue that tax. But we have increased the tax upon the circulation of banks from one twelfth to one sixth of one per cent., just doubling it; and we have included the national banks in this provision, as they were not before.

Brokers now pay upon all their enormous sales, made upon the street and at the broker's board, of stocks, bonds, gold, &c., one cent for every hundred dollars. We propose to double that, and make it two cents for every hundred dollars. Small as that tax seems, gentlemen perhaps will be astonished at the large results.

In regard to incomes we propose but a slight change. While we have revised the whole law and given it, we hope, much greater clearness and perspicuity, we have not materially affected any of the particulars of the law except upon one point. As the law now stands, those who draw salaries from the United States have the five per cent. income tax deducted from the salary when it is paid. And what is the consequence? Let me illustrate. One of your clerks, it may be, is paid $1,500 a year for his services. When he receives that amount, $1,000 being exempt, he pays five per cent. upon $500, being twenty-five dollars, which is deducted at the time his monthly payments are made to him. He has a wife and family, hires a house, has some few transactions, some bad debts, losses by fire or otherwise. His neighbor, receiving $1,500 a year as the proceeds of his earnings or his business, or income from other sources, is allowed from that amount to deduct his house rent, his expenses, his losses. But the clerk, on receiving his salary, has paid his twenty-five dollars tax and never gets anything back again. And what applies to him applies to the officers of the Army and of the Navy, your postmasters and all other officers, including yourselves. It is unequal and unreasonable. We have therefore made this small change, affecting a very large class of persons, that salaries shall be returned in incomes, like all other profits, receipts, or earnings, and shall, like other incomes, have the benefit of all legitimate deductions.

Gentlemen will find in the bill a change in regard to the taxation of railroads. Street railroads are by the existing law permitted to charge over against their passengers the tax which they pay to the Government. I will not stop now to inquire whether they have or have not very often collected one cent from their passengers while paying but the eighth of one cent to the Government. This will be the subject of a good deal of discussion, I suppose, as it has been here before. The committee present this bill without that present feature. They have taken the ground that railroads must be subject to taxation out of their proceeds in the same manner as other corporations or as individuals are; and if they need relief because of being limited in the amount they are entitled to charge they must seek relief from the State or municipal authorities from which they have derived their charters or with which they have made their contracts. I heartily agree to this decision of my committee and this amendment of the law, because it establishes a principle which I think clearly just, and for which I have always contended.

Mr. BLAINE. Does that apply to horse railroads?

Mr. SCHENCK. Horse railroads particularly are included and affected by it.

It will be observed that we have conformed the tax upon mineral oil to what was determined upon by the House, reducing it from twenty cents to ten cents; and we have introduced all the sections necessary to enforce the collection of the tax at that rate. I do not know whether the Committee of Ways and Means will be sustained in this or not. I am not quite certain whether they ought to be. I do not know but we shall be enabled to show such a condition of the public revenue that we may afford to put mineral oil upon the footing of all other manufactures. But that will be a matter for consideration when we reach that part of the bill. On the part of the committee, I request that the House will either sustain the committee by permitting the law to be as it was made last March, or, if any change be made, not to make again two bites of the cherry, but put mineral oil upon a footing with all other manufactures, and thus dispense with a large amount of machinery relating to the collection of the tax on it and its transportation similar to that which is provided for tobacco and distilled spirits.

As to tobacco, we have made a great many amendments in the law in respect to the manner of securing the collection of the taxes. I will not stop to dwell upon these changes now. We have endeavored to make the law rigorous, to make it certain of execution, to have the collection through the medium of stamps, and we trust we have succeeded in presenting sections which will accomplish in a good degree these objects.

While on this subject I may say that while the country has been astounded at the enormous frauds committed in relation to the tax on whisky, the case has not been much better with tobacco. Whisky somehow or other enters more into the politics, if not the daily life of our people, and is therefore perhaps more closely observed than tobacco is. But really there is not much to choose between them, although possibly I ought to confess that whisky is a little ahead in the race of rascality.

We have not retained the present rates of taxation on tobacco—forty cents, thirty cents, and fifteen cents—but instead of three classes, we have from the testimony submitted to us, and from our investigations of the subject, thought proper to reduce the tax to two rates, and make them respectively forty cents and sixteen cents. We have also provided that smoking and chewing tobacco shall be put up for the most part, if not entirely, in small packages and marked with stamps. Under this system the revenue from this article is, we think, sure of collection, as it could not be if the present system were continued.

The present tax on cigars is five dollars a thousand. The committee submit to the House the question as to the propriety of doubling that tax, but this increase will not perhaps be insisted upon. It seems that if the present high tariff upon cigars is to be maintained, taking this addition to the cost ultimately out of the consumer, as is the case more or less with all these luxuries, we might afford to increase the tax at home. But my own opinion is that we ought to reduce the tariff, as not affording the protection that was intended to the domestic manufacturer, and that in that case we might, perhaps, afford to leave cigars at the present rate of taxation, five dollars a thousand, for the benefit of the cheap classes of cigars, which might otherwise be driven out of the market, and the manufacturer of them broken down.

Have gentlemen remarked the great difference between the internal tax on cigars and the tariff upon imported cigars? The tax is five dollars a thousand upon cigars manufactured in the United States without reference to value, thus giving advantage to the higher classes of cigars, but not overburdening the cheaper sorts, of which immense quantities are manufactured. But the charge upon imported cigars is so high that, as I have already remarked, it defeats itself. The tariff is on the average seventy-six dollars a thousand. It is three dollars per pound, cigars upon the average weighing fourteen pounds to the thousand, and to this is added an ad valorem tax of fifty per cent. Every gentleman familiar with the trade knows that the average cost in gold of cigars in Havana is about forty dollars a thousand. When you take forty dollars per thousand and calculate three dollars per pound on the weight, and fifty per cent. upon the valuation, all in gold, you will find that this tax reduced to its equivalent in currency is seventy-six dollars a thousand. The effect of this great charge has been that by concealment in boxes, under hatchways, in pockets, in trunks, and by all sorts of means usually resorted to for the purpose of bringing in contraband goods, cigars have been smuggled into the country in countless numbers; and instead of the high tariff being as was intended a protection to our cigar manufacturers at home, it has defeated itself. These smuggled cigars, in quantities so enormous as to exceed calculation, have come into competition with the domestic article.

I will not add anything as to the next part of the bill to which we come, as it relates to distilled spirits, which I have already, perhaps sufficiently, considered.

Before closing this very long exposition, which I have been attempting to give in this familiar and conversational way, I desire to submit some facts in regard to the resources of this country and its expenditures; in other words, its financial condition. I am one of those who believe that, however we may dispute in regard to the changing of one form of public security for another, the amount or volume of the currency to be kept up or its contraction to be made—viewing this financial question in all lights as connecting itself with the public debt—there is, after all, but one way in which the debt of this country is to be paid; and that is, it is to be worked out. The industry of the country, the productions of our labor and of our soil, are eventually to pay our debts; and as this is to be done, we have endeavored throughout this whole system of internal taxation to take care, as far as might be, to keep in view the cardinal principle which I stated in the outset, that we must equalize the taxes as far as practicable, and make them bear as lightly as possible upon the industry of the country, while yielding sufficient revenue for the needs of the Government.

What is the condition of our country now at the close of the long and expensive war through which we have passed—a condition which ought to astonish, and I believe does astonish, the world; a condition which will astonish any one who looks carefully into the facts and figures. To make an American admire his great country and wonder at its enormous resources, it is only necessary that he should go through such an investigation as I have attempted in reference to what are now the prospective means of the country to meet the great liabilities and burdens of obligation under which it lies.

While I am speaking, Mr. Chairman, of the extraordinary capabilities of this country as developed through the perils of war (and war, as every one knows, is always a profligate in its expenditures,) I ought also, it seems to me, to pay a passing tribute of admiration to the people of this country, who have unmurmuringly and cheerfully submitted to all the burdens necessary to be imposed upon them in order that their form of government and all that they held so dear might be preserved.

I propose to conclude what I have to say to-day, as I have already remarked, by an exposition in figures of what we find to be our present condition as to resources and estimated expenditures. And I hope if, by this exposition, I shall show that we are capable of sustaining the country through its burdens and advancing its prosperity, this good condition and prosperity will not be made the occasion by anybody here for extravagance in his votes before we separate. It is not only necessary to raise revenue, but there follows a necessity to be economical in the use of these our great resources. And in submitting the statement I am to make I desire to say in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means that we beg of the House that they will enable any future committee, any future Congress, any future representative in any sense of the Treasury of the country, to make as good and better exposition of affairs by adhering to the strictest economy in the appropriations from the Treasury, we may yet be called upon while we are together to make. What I have here prepared I will read to the House knowing, although it is but a dry detail of figures and calculations, it will possibly be interesting to all who hear me; yet, as I give it here it cannot carry all its weight to the minds of the gentlemen who listen to me, and so I beg that when it shall appear in print it may, from its common importance to us all, command your careful consideration and your criticism.

NATIONAL RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING JUNE 30, 1868.

Under this head it is proposed to first consider the necessary and probable expenditures of the Government for the next fiscal year; and secondly, the revenue which may be legitimately anticipated during the same period.

The appropriation bills for the next fiscal year, which have passed, or are now pending, are as follows:

Alaska.....40,500,000 00

Total.....7,200,000 00

Total.....$327,651,445 03

To this aggregate there should also be added

"lapping" appropriations heretofore made that will not be expended until next year, namely, $24,669,184, making a total probable expenditure, during the next fiscal year, for which revenue must be provided, of $352,320,629 03.

REVENUE.

To meet the above estimate for expenditures the following receipts may be estimated:

Customs.....$165,000,000

It is difficult to imagine a contingency which shall, for the present, reduce the customs receipts below the above figures. If the average annual gold value of imports into the United States (exclusive of specie) for the last five years, and the present tariff be maintained, an annual gold revenue from the customs in excess of $165,000,000 is absolutely certain; and if the tariff is reduced, an increase of importations is likely to far more than compensate for any reduction of rate—inasmuch as the duties on some classes of products, formerly of extensive importation, are at present nearly or quite prohibitory.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The receipts of internal revenue for the current fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, will, as already stated, approximate and probably slightly exceed, $190,000,000.

The internal revenue derived from manufactured articles or products on which the taxes have been abated or repealed since the commencement of the last fiscal year (July 1, 1866) yielded for the same fiscal year (ending June 30, 1867) the sum of $87,244,275; of which amount $23,769,080 were derived from the tax on raw cotton. As many of the taxes upon which this sum was raised were repealed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress during the course of the last fiscal year, and have not been operative during the current fiscal year, it would be erroneous to assume that the sum of $87,244,275 represents the reduction of internal revenue likely to be experienced for the next fiscal year in consequence of the repeal by the present Congress of nearly all of the so-called "manufacturers' taxes," and of the tax upon raw cotton. On the contrary, the reduction legitimately to be anticipated will be considerably less; and, as deduced from an examination of the receipts of internal revenue since July 1, 1867, and assuming the passage of the bill as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means without essential modifications, will be substantially as follows: From the act of February 3, 1868, repealing the tax on raw cotton, $23,769,080; from the act of March 31, exempting certain manufactures from internal tax, (including the abatement of taxes on gas and petroleum,) $45,000,000. Total, $68,769,080. The revenue, therefore, from internal taxes for the next fiscal year, assuming all other matters in respect to taxes and administration in this branch of the revenue service to remain unchanged, must necessarily be predicated on the basis of the aggregate receipts of the current fiscal year, less the amount of taxes abated or repealed during the present session of Congress; or $190,000,000—$68,769,080—$121,231,000.

That the present state of affairs is wholly exceptional cannot be doubted; neither does it seem possible that fraud and neglect can again reduce the receipts from those two great sources of revenue—distilled spirits and tobacco—to so small a minimum as the returns of the present fiscal year have exhibited; the estimated receipts from distilled spirits for the current fiscal year being less by fifty per cent. than the amount received during the preceding fiscal year, namely, $29,151,000, in 1867, as compared with (an estimate of) $13,500,000 in 1868.

With the passage of the amended law, a very considerable gain in internal revenue from other sources is also reasonably certain—especially from the tax on the sales of manufactures, and the modification of the other "special taxes."

The estimates of receipts of internal revenue from various sources, as predicated on the passage of the amended law reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, may be stated as follows:

Formed liquors.....	$6,000,000*
Gas and refined petroleum (reduced).....	3,500,000*
Incomes and salaries.....	36,000,000*
Gross receipts.....	7,500,000*
Stamps.....	17,000,000*
Legacies and successions.....	2,000,000*
Bank dividends, circulation, and deposits.....	10,000,000*
Fines and penalties.....	1,460,000*
Miscellaneous, (Schedule A, &c.).....	2,100,000*
Special taxes (exclusive of the special taxes on the sales of distillers and rectifiers, and inclusive of taxes on sales).....	25,000,000
Total.....	$115,560,000

The receipts from distilled spirits during the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, were $29,151,840; and from tobacco and cigars, $19,705,827. With the passage of the amended law it seems impossible, even with the continuance of a defective administration, that the receipts from distilled spirits for the next fiscal year can fall short of $70,000,000, or from tobacco of $25,000,000.

Assuming the correctness of these latter estimates we have then the gross sum of $210,560,000 as the receipts from internal revenue, which may be reasonably anticipated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

On the other hand, if we fail to secure any increase of revenue from distilled spirits and tobacco beyond what was secured during the last fiscal year, the receipts of internal revenue for the next fiscal year cannot well be estimated at less than $164,000,000.

PUBLIC LANDS.

From the sale of public lands the revenue of the current year, namely, $1,169,000, will undoubtedly be continued.

MISCELLANEOUS RECEIPTS.

For the revenue receipts from miscellaneous sources, i. e., premium on gold, sales of property, consular fees, &c., I adopt the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, namely, $30,000,000. The receipts from miscellaneous sources, exclusive of the premium derived from the sales of gold coin, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, were $28,670,008 95. For the first three quarters of the present fiscal year, or from July 1, 1867, to March 31, 1868, the receipts from miscellaneous sources, other than the premium on gold, were $19,415,280 69, or at the rate of $25,887,000 for the entire year. These receipts were in great part derived from the sale of military stores, vessels, and other condemned property, and are certain to be much less in the future. During the last ten months the amount of unexpended requisitions, and sales of property covered into the Treasury from the War Department amounted to $8,912,800.

RECAPITULATION.

A recapitulation of these estimates gives the following as the total anticipated revenue for the next fiscal year.

Customs	$165,000,000
Internal revenue	210,500,000
Public lands	1,000,000
Miscellaneous	30,000,000
Total	$406,500,000

Supposing no increase of receipts from distilled spirits and tobacco over the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, this estimate would be reduced to $360,560,000. Deducting the estimate of expenditures for the next fiscal year, $352,320,629, the balance to account of surplus revenue would be $18,239,371. But with the estimated increase of receipts from spirits and tobacco, this balance would be $54,239,371.

Gentlemen may be astonished at this showing, yet I think it is not an unfair one; for I am of opinion that even if we should exempt petroleum oil from all internal taxation, the revenue from internal taxes other than on tobacco and distilled spirits, would be about the same as during the last fiscal year; and then, if I am right in my estimates concerning the revenue to be derived from distilled spirits and tobacco, we shall be able to present a balance of receipts over expenditures for the next fiscal year far beyond what the most sanguine have anticipated. I am highly gratified that I am able to make this exhibit, for I think there has been a disposition to underestimate our resources, and also, perhaps, the expenditures that are likely to be made during the next fiscal year.

Mr. BROOKS. What will be the expenses of the War Department for the next fiscal year?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman asks in regard to the expenditures of the War Department. I am glad of an opportunity to give him some explanations in that connection.

The expenditures of the War Department for the coming fiscal year were originally estimated by General Grant, as Secretary of War ad interim, at $51,039,134 20. He carefully revised that estimate in December and reduced it to the sum of $37,611,512 20.

Disregarding these estimates made by the competent and responsible head of the War Department, aided by long-experienced and able bureau officers, the Treasury Department assumes that General Grant's estimates are too low and will not meet the expenditure, and that a large deficiency will have to be provided for.

In opposition to this view, and in support of General Grant's reduced estimate, it is to be noted that the war expenditures of the current fiscal year, estimated at $123,000,000, are not a proper measure for the estimates of the coming year for various reasons, of which some of the principal may here be specified.

The expenditures for the year about to expire included large payments consequent upon Indian hostilities and armies employed by department commanders against frontier Indians, the cost of which has been variously estimated at from twenty to thirty millions. No Indian hostilities now exist or are apprehended; no army or large force is now in the field, but the troops are so disposed under the skillful command of General Sheridan that there is no probability of any serious hostilities nor occasion for unusual expense for supplies, transportation, subsistence or other extraordinary military expenditure on the western frontier.

This condition admits, also, of a reduction of troops and consequent transportation and supplies, thus diminishing the expenses of the Quartermaster's Bureau; to which must be also added a reduction in the pay of the Army, consequent on a reduction of the forces. The total reduction under these heads, will, it is estimated, be also about nine million dollars.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to ask the gentleman whose remarks are those? He seemed to be reading.

Mr. SCHENCK. They are my own remarks. I have derived my data from various sources, from the Treasury Department, from General Grant, and from the late Secretary of War; and in all this examination I have been most materially aided by the able and efficient Special Commissioner of Revenue.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me ask the gentleman, who is a reader of the newspapers as well as myself, how he can arrive at the conclusions that the Indian expenditures will be so much less the coming year, when the indications are already on the frontier that the Indians are very troublesome; for example, on the Pacific railroad, which is now running six hundred miles, it is unsafe to run a train without sending a locomotive in advance to look out for the Indians, and when station-guards on the line of the road, in several places, have been killed by the Indians. There seems to be no safety as yet on that great line of road, and I wish to inquire how the gentleman arrives at the conclusion that the expenditures of the Indian department are to be so much less for the coming year than the present fiscal year.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to giving the gentleman and the country not only these facts and conclusions, in which I feel fully sustained by the information I have obtained, but also the sources of my information to the fullest extent. We get the first facts in regard to the actual expenditure during the last year, carefully made up, on application at the Treasury Department. We have consulted the officials at the War Department in regard to the probabilities for the future; and not satisfied with that, we have applied in person—I have done so, and so has the Special Commissioner of the Revenue—to General Grant; and have had a full and free consultation with and advice from him as to what will be, according to the present prospect of things on the frontier, the probable expense arising from Indian difficulties in the coming year.

Mr. BROOKS. These, then, are but surmises, guesses, which more or less all of us will make from our general knowledge of public affairs, and of which we will be as likely to be as well informed as military men—I mean the probability of future hostilities by the Indians.

Mr. SCHENCK. No sir; not guessing. I think the gentleman has not regarded the explanation that I have been giving. When I say that there are no Indian hostilities existing to any great and organized extent now, nor likely to be, I am but stating the actual fact of the day. And I will further illustrate the explanation by adding that during the last fiscal year we not only had Indian hostilities, but active operations conducted by large armies collected in the field to move against them. General Hancock, for instance, thought it advisable to resist Indian hostilities and to seek to crush out any movements on their part by assembling many thousands of men together in a moving army. General Augur was also sent North, I believe, upon the plains, with a large assembled army. There are no such assembled armies upon the frontier now. A disposition has been made of our troops on the frontier, under General

Sheridan, by establishing them at the different posts from which relief may be afforded to different parts of the country, and any hostile demonstrations made at once repelled. And the gentleman needs not to be informed, nor does any one, that it is these large assembled armies, with the enormous cost of transportation and of quartermaster stores, which add so very much to the expense either on the frontier or wherever else military operations are conducted.

Mr. BROOKS. Once more, for information. I am not seeking party objects; but the last news from Oregon brings a report of an Indian fight there and the loss of some lives on our side. And if the gentleman heard the debate the other day respecting the Navajo Indians it would seem to be necessary to keep a large force there. What I mean to say is this: during the last year on the Missouri river, on the Platte, at Denver, and in various parts of the Indian country, it costs as much to support and feed them or more as on the route of the Pacific railroad.

Mr. SCHENCK. I beg pardon. The gentleman seems to know very little of military operations—

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know much, and I never wish to.

Mr. SCHENCK. He knows very little of military operations if he has not observed that an army in motion, with all its enormous demands, especially for transportation, is in a very much more expensive condition than an army in posts or inactive.

But I have been drawn away from the explanation which I was about to give, and which will be open to the criticism of the gentleman, if in any respect he thinks I have been misled or have come to wrong conclusions, when he shall have seen the whole presented together. Unless he desires to interrupt me further, I will proceed with the explanation.

Mr. BROOKS. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is not necessary. I have been glad to explain.

I was speaking at the time I was interrupted of a reduction of expenditures consequent upon a reduction of the pay of the Army. Gentlemen may ask how is this arrived at. Simply thus: upon application to the General of the Army I find that under the system of economy adopted by him, and upon which he based his estimate for $37,000,000 for the War Department a few months ago, was a proposed reduction of the rank and file of the Army to the minimum of the companies and regiments, and in pursuance of that arrangement, soldiers are being discharged at the rate of eight hundred men per month. It is a matter of mathematical calculation, then, how far such reduction will reduce the demand for expenditures on that account.

The Treasury estimate includes also the sum paid for soldiers' bounties under the act of Congress. But this sum is in no sense a regular expenditure of the military establishment. For convenience examinations and payments are made through the pay bureau of the Army; but in every practical sense the bounties are a special expenditure, not chargeable, nor to be provided for as a current expenditure of the War Department; so that it is not properly embraced in the war estimates of that Department. The amount of this expenditure for the current year is estimated by the Treasury Department at an average of $20,700,000 for the ten months past. Striking this bounty item from the regular war estimates, to which it does not belong, would reduce the Treasury estimate for the year about thirty-two million dollars.

Further reduction of the Treasury estimates for the ensuing fiscal year, based on the expenses of the current year, should be made by striking out the payments made on Treasury settlements of State claims for war expenses,

40TH CONG...2D SESS.

Contested-Election Case—Mr. Morgan.

HO. OF REPS.

and Treasury settlements of private claims for war damages. These war claims of the States have heretofore been the occasion of a large expenditure, but are now all, or nearly all, extinguished. The State claims paid during the first ten months of the present fiscal year have amounted to $9,250,693 25, while the private claims settled by the Treasury, and paid by the War Department, during the same time, have amounted to $5,116,300.

These private claims are such as pass through and under the supervision and action for the most part of the Third Auditor of the Treasury. They are claims coming from individual sources on various accounts charged against the Government, and are, of course, not part of the regular expenditures of the War Department from year to year; but yet in looking forward and seeing what will probably be demanded from us as a draft upon our revenue, we must of course take them into the account.

These private claims settled by the Treasury have heretofore been paid out of the general and current appropriations of the military service by the bureau to which it belongs. They should only be paid by some specific appropriation after settlement by the Treasury. Whether a general appropriation be made in advance from year to year, or for the specific claim, the supervision of Congress in either case over this important and dangerous branch of expenditure would be secured as it is not now.

Striking these Treasury settlements from the estimates of regular expenditures of the War Department, in which they are improperly included, makes a further reduction of $14,366,993 25. The reduction of expenditures for the Military Academy, ordnance, and engineer bureaus, forts, arsenals, &c., including also items covered by "lapping" appropriations, may be estimated at about five million dollars. A further reduction should be made by striking out the expenditures for the Freedmen's Bureau. This bureau is merely a temporary organization, the operations of which are daily diminishing, and may soon wholly cease. Its expenditures are made under the general supervision of the Secretary of War, but are in no sense regular current expenses of the military service. The expenditures for this bureau during the first ten months of the present fiscal year amounted to $2,000,000, and that amount should be stricken from the Treasury estimate of war expenditures. No appropriation is asked for on this account for the coming year.

The Indian hostilities and negotiations have compelled the War Department to make advances of subsistence stores at times and places of special emergency, upon the express stipulation of reimbursement by the Indian Bureau which has hitherto been disregarded. This expenditure, during the first ten months of the present fiscal year, amounted to the sum of $277,831 86, and should be stricken from the estimate of war expenditures. This is exclusive of the expense incurred by the War Department in subsisting the Navajoes and other Indians held as prisoners of war, which have created a heavy burden on the War Department, increasing the sum on Indian account to about one million dollars.

It will therefore be seen that by making the proposed reductions in the Treasury estimates—to which the gentleman called my attention—for the War Department, there will be found nothing to impeach the accuracy of the estimates communicated to Congress by General Grant; and furthermore, they are in the main corroborated by the estimates of the Special Commissioner of Revenue, derived from the Treasury Department itself.

I will now recapitulate what I have been saying on these points:

The total expenditures through the War Department for the current fiscal year will be, as before stated..... $123,859,496

Under this head, however, are included the following items, none of which can be classed as among the regular "Army" or "war" expenditures:

Bounties.....	$32,000,000
Reimbursing State war claims.....	9,250,693
Private claims for war damages.....	5,116,300
Freedmen's Bureau.....	2,100,000
Subsistence of Indians and advances on account of Interior Department.....	1,000,000
Total.....	$49,466,993

This leaves $73,382,503 as the aggregate expenditures proper of the War Department for the current year; an aggregate which has been largely augmented by the existence of Indian hostilities on the frontiers during the summer and fall of 1867.

The above expenditure of $73,382,503 will, it is believed, be reduced during the next fiscal year by the following items:

From discontinuance of Indian hostilities.....	$20,000,000
From reduction of pay of Army, (the current reduction of the Army being at the rate of eight hundred men per month.)
reduction of quartermasters' and other expenses.....	9,000,000
Estimated reduction of other expenditures—Military Academy, Ordnance and Engineer Bureaus, &c., including items covered by "lapping" appropriations separately estimated.....	5,000,000
	$34,000,000

Assuming the above estimates as correct, the regular expenditures of the War Department for the next fiscal year may be taken to be about thirty-nine million dollars; which is nearly in accordance with the revised estimates submitted by General Grant, acting as Secretary of War, in December last.

Gentlemen who may have been alarmed lest we might be expected to expend $123,000,000 during the next fiscal year on account of the War Department and the Army may therefore feel relieved. They may feel assured that, making the deduction from what has been spent during the last year of those items which are not likely to be required for the next, and also of the expenditures which, although charged to the War Department, are in no way connected with its regular business, and coming down to the requirements of the War Department proper, we shall find that General Grant's revised estimate cannot vary much more than a million one way or the other from what that branch of the public service will really demand.

I have felt it necessary to enter into a somewhat elaborate and particular explanation in relation to this branch of the public expenditure, at the close of the other general estimates which I have submitted, as it was called for by the gentleman from New York, my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means.

I now go back and repeat my conviction, arrived at with all the care possible and all the exercise of my own judgment, and relying still more upon the detailed and accurate information, as it seemed to me, which has been furnished by the Departments, and by the General commanding, that if we collect, as I trust the passage of this bill will enable us to do, $70,000,000 from the tax on distilled spirits, we shall have an amount of receipts at the end of the next year exceeding by about fifty million dollars all needed expenditures.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in concluding this review of the policy and purposes of the Committee of Ways and Means, as indicated in the bill which we have offered, let me express to gentlemen around me my thanks for the kind attention and patience with which they have so long listened to me. With this submission of our work to their consideration and action our responsibility in some degree ceases, and theirs begins. We shall be well rewarded if any considerable part of what we have done shall meet approval and contribute to the common good.

Contested-Election Case.

SPEECH OF HON. G. W. MORGAN,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 2 and 3, 1868.

The House having under consideration the contested election case of Delano vs. Morgan, from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio—

MR. MORGAN said:

MR. SPEAKER: "Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad." I do not rise Mr. Speaker, to ask a favor, but to demand and insist upon the right of the people of the thirteenth district of Ohio to be represented by the person of their choice. Of the 26,185 voters who cast their ballots in that district at the October election 1866, there are not ten who are not fully satisfied that a majority of the legal votes cast at that election were against the contestant [Mr. Delano] in this case. They witnessed the election; they saw how it was conducted; they knew and know now on which side extraordinary, illegal, and corrupt means were used, and knowing these facts as they do know them, they will not be deceived by the action of this House.

The electors of the thirteenth district further know that at the congressional election of 1860 the counties of Coshocton, Knox, Licking, and Muskingum gave an aggregate Democratic majority of 549, the aggregate vote being 25,122. That at the congressional election of 1862, the first election under the new apportionment, said counties, composing the thirteenth district, gave O'Neil, Democrat, 8,064 majority over Wright, Republican, the aggregate vote being 22,462. That at the congressional election of 1864 in said district, on the "home vote" Follett, Democrat, had 1,222 majority over Delano, Republican, which was overcome by Army certificates sufficient to show a majority for Delano of 239, the aggregate vote being 23,560. That in 1864, on the aggregate home and army vote of said district, Mr. Lincoln had a majority of 10 votes over General McClellan. That at the gubernatorial election of 1865 G. W. Morgan, Democrat, had a majority in said district over J. D. Cox, Republican, of 787, the aggregate vote being 24,251. (H. Mis. Doc. No. 38, part 2, p. 725.) That at the congressional election of 1866 in said district the majority of Morgan over Delano was 271, the aggregate vote being 26,185. That at the gubernatorial election of 1867 in said district the majority of Thurman, Democrat, over Hayes, Republican, was 2,178, the aggregate vote being 27,906.

The gentleman [Mr. SCOFIELD] who has laid upon your desks the remarkable paper called the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections seems to have forgotten that the Constitution of the United States secures to the people of the respective States the right to elect their own Representatives to this House.

MR. MULLINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

MR. MORGAN. No, sir.

MR. MULLINS. Just one question.

MR. MORGAN. Not one.

MR. MULLINS. I only want to ask if the Constitution does not give the right to judge of the election returns and disqualifications of members?

MR. MORGAN. The issue before this House is of very small concern to the people of the country so far as the contestant and the sitting member are concerned as individuals, but the principle involved is vital to the dearest rights of the people. Were the contestant and the sitting member to be blotted out of existence to-day they would not be missed to-morrow. Like two pebbles dropped upon the bosom of the sea, we should at once sink beneath the surface, and only for a few moments would a few circling eddies mark the spots where we had disappeared, and oblivion would cover us forever. And I cannot but congratulate the contestant [Mr. Delano] upon the fact that when he shall have passed from off the stage of action that his name and political misdeeds will be forgotten together. Not so, sir, with the great principle—the right of representation—involved in this case. Not so as to the dangerous precedent to be established by this House, that the citizens of Massachusetts, Vermont, and of other States, can disfranchise the citizens of Ohio, and in contempt of their wishes determine who shall sit in this House as the pretended representative of the people.

Sir, no citizen in the thirteenth district knew better than Mr. Delano that it was Democratic. He knew that he had obtained his seat in the Thirty-Ninth Congress by means of Army certificates pretending to represent votes which in fact were never polled. And knowing that he could not be fairly elected, three days before the election took place he publicly avowed in a speech at Millwood, "I may be beaten, but I won't stay beaten." This, sir, was the estimate he placed upon this House, this was his threat that he would do what he had before done, obtain a seat on this floor as the Representative of the people who had refused to be represented by him.

Sir, the political career of the contestant has indeed been remarkable. The testimony in this case shows that in 1844 he was returned to this House by a majority of only twelve votes but from a democratic district and he was allowed to take and retain his seat without a contest, although no one believed that he was fairly elected. Should it be the pleasure of this body now, in the exercise of a power which in their hands is absolute and from which there is no appeal except to the people, to give to Mr. Delano, that which the people denied to him, it will be the only instance in the history of the country where the same individual has three times occupied a seat in Congress without having been once elected.

The real issue involved in this case, Mr. Speaker, is not between George W. Morgan and Columbus Delano, but between this House of Representatives on the one part, and the people on the other. It is to determine whether in contempt of all, the dominant party on this floor will arrogate to themselves the right to elect each other, and to treat with contempt the will of the people. This question, sir, is of vital moment; it reaches down deep into the very foundations of our Government, and its solution is to determine whether we have a representative government or a despotism; whether the people are masters or slaves.

Sir, were this question purely personal to myself, under the circumstances by which I am surrounded I should not have risen to utter one word in this case. But a sense of duty to the people of my district, whose rights are threatened with outrage, demand that I should resist and expose the great wrong which is about to be committed. So far as the members of the Committee of Elections, who by a strict party report advise the House to commit this wrong are concerned, I have but a word to say. Did I desire vengeance against them, it would be that they should sign the report they have sent to this House, and that it should be left as a heritage for their children to gaze upon after they are dead. But, sir, I desire no such act of cruelty against the innocent, and I leave the members of the majority to the judgment of their own consciences, and the much more certain judgment of the people.

Sir, I do not wish to ascribe evil motives to any one, and the mildest opinion that I can express in regard to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Scofield] is that the report shows that he is totally ignorant of the law and the facts in this case, for to think otherwise would be to ascribe to him motives of a far different character.

Now, sir, to the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Scofield.] It claims for Mr. Delano 81 majority—not 80, but 81—which indicates a nice and conscientious calculation. By what sleight-of-hand has the official majority of 271 for the sitting member been frittered away? We shall see. First, 292 electors, Democrats and Republicans, of Pike township, Knox county, are disfranchised by the entire vote being rejected. But why rejected? Was there fraud on the part of the judges of the election? No; that is not claimed. Was there any fraud of any kind? No; for it is admitted by the report in favor of Mr. Delano that all of the votes in Pike township are legal votes except 11. But there are only 11 illegal votes. Why reject more than them? Because that would not be sufficient to give Mr. Delano the seat refused him by the people.

But upon what ground, upon what pretext is this House asked to disfranchise the electors of Pike township, Republicans and Democrats alike? I will tell you, sir. The true ground is, because that township gave 140 majority against Mr. Delano. That is the real objection to the vote of Pike township. But what is the pretext for disfranchising 292 voters? It is charged in the report of the majority that Salathiel Parrish, one of the judges of the election in that township, failed to report to the draft, and upon this flimsy and contemptible pretext the House is asked to throw out the vote of Pike township. Is the pretext true? No; it is wholly false. What are the facts? David Porch, one of the trustees of that township, testifies that Salathiel Parrish was drafted, but that prior to the draft Parrish, with the aid of other persons, collected a sufficient sum of money to raise recruits to clear that township of the draft. That fourteen recruits were raised and accepted.

Mr. Porch says:

"They [Parrish, Scoles] and others were making an effort before the draft to clear the township by putting in substitutes or recruits, and after the draft, finding that they were going to be successful, they paid no attention to it."

Well, Mr. Speaker, the recruits were raised and accepted; the township was cleared from the draft by the aid of Parrish, and the provost marshal told Porch that as recruits had been put in the men who had been drafted were released, or "would not be troubled." Now, sir, I challenge the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Scofield,] I call upon the contestant, [Mr. Delano,] to produce the testimony of a single witness contradicting the testimony of Mr. Porch. The gentlemen do not answer. Sir, they do not answer because there is no answer to give. And that each member may examine for himself I refer the House to page 276, H. M. D. 48, part 2. But what, sir, is the law as to what constitutes a deserter?

The thirteenth section of the act of March 8, 1863, provides—

"That any person failing to report after due service of notice as herein prescribed, without furnishing a substitute or paying the required sum therefor, shall be deemed a deserter, and shall be arrested by the provost marshal and sent to the nearest military post for trial by court-martial, unless, upon proper showing that he is not liable to do military duty, the board of enrollment shall relieve him from the draft."—United States Statutes-at-Large, vol. 12, p. 731.

Well, sir, by the very terms of the law, Salathiel Parrish was not only not a deserter, but he did more than the law required. He did not wait for the draft, but before it took place he was engaged in raising means to put in recruits. The recruits were obtained, and the township released from the draft. And yet, sir, upon this pretext, at once frivolous, wicked, and false, this House is asked to reject the entire poll of Pike township, and thereby disfranchise 292 citizens. Sir, will this House entertain a proposition so atrocious? Dare the dominant party upon this floor disfranchise the people of an entire township, when no fraud was alleged, when no fraud was proved, when even the contestant does not so much as pretend there was fraud or unfairness of any kind? I am not surprised, sir, at the often-repeated declaration of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Scofield] that he wished this case through, that he never again desired to hear of the case of Delano vs. Morgan. Ah, sir, well may the gentleman desire to still the spirits he has raised; but this case will haunt him like a ghost, and he will ever hear singing in his ears the case of Delano vs. Morgan; and when the indignant cry comes from an outraged people he will learn that he has only commenced to hear the cry of Delano vs. Morgan in connection with this infamous report.

Mr. DAWES. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. MORGAN. As it may be held out of order, I withdraw the word infamous.

It is not my intention to make an elaborate law argument in this case, because the contestant and the committee were at fault wholly as to the facts, even were the law as claimed by them. But, sir, the committee show an utter disregard of the law in reference to the very question involved in reference to Pike township.

The claim of the contestant [Mr. Delano] is this: that Salathiel Parrish failed to report to the draft, and that thereby he ceased to be a citizen of the United States, and consequently could not be an elector of Ohio. I have already proved, sir, that the charge against Salathiel Parrish is false, and that is an end to the whole question. But, sir, suppose that it were true that Salathiel Parrish had been guilty as charged by the contestant, [Mr. Delano.] What then? He was one of the trustees of Pike township, and, by the force of the statute, one of the judges of the election. Hence, even had he been a deserter, (which is false,) he was acting under the color of office, and his acts were lawful so far as third parties (the voters) were concerned. The contestant [Mr. Delano] claims that Parrish could not act as judge of election for the reason that the law requires that there shall be three judges.

It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that this very question has been already determined by the highest tribunal in Ohio; and it has been time and again decided that this House is bound by the laws of a State as construed by its own courts in reference to all questions connected with elections. Well, sir, in February, 1866, there was tried in the Senate of Ohio (being three fifths Republican) the contested election case of Grosvenor vs. Golden. The former a Republican, the latter a Democrat. And one of the grounds of contest was—

"That one Edwin Moore, who was a trustee of Bloom township, Fairfield county, acted as a judge of the election in said township, while he was at the same election a candidate for the office of county commissioner of said county."

A majority of the Committee on Elections reported that—

"As to the second charge above, the committee find that the said Edwin Moore was a trustee of Bloom township, Fairfield county, and as such acted as a judge of the said election, and was at the same time a candidate for commissioner of Fairfield county."

"The committee find this contrary to a provision of the statute. But they further find that he did not act corruptly, but in ignorance of the law. The committee regard said action as irregular, yet they are of opinion, and so find, that all the really essential requisites to constitute a valid election were observed in this case. The election was held at the proper time and place, and by competent authority, (to wit, the township trustees.) That there was no evidence of fraud in conducting the same, and no doubt about the result. In view of these facts, we are unable to assign any satisfactory reason for rejecting this return. The object of the law, as we think, in directing that a candidate shall not act as a judge of election, is to remove an inducement to fraud in his own case. It affords no such inducement in the case of any other candidate. But if it does, that presumption is rebutted in this case. The evidence is clear and decisive that the election was conducted with entire fairness. We are therefore of opinion that we can neither allege want of authority in the election board, fraud in conducting the election, nor any uncertainty about the result."

The supreme court of this State have decided—in the case of Ohio vs. Choate, 11 O. R. 511; Ohio vs. Alby, 12 O. R. 16; Ohio vs. Jacobs, 17 O. R. 151-2—that where an officer acts under color of authority his acts will be binding, although, in point of law and of right, he was no such officer. And if the acts of a person who proceeds by color of authority only will be sustained, there is certainly much greater reason for sustaining the acts of a real officer, although the mode of his action has been irregular."

And the Senate of Ohio, which was strongly Republican, sustained the majority report in favor of Golden, Democrat, against Grosvenor, Republican, by a vote of twenty-three to eleven.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this case of Bloom township is much stronger than the case against Pike township, even were the charge of desertion made by contestant [Mr. Delano] against Mr. Parrish true. A candidate acting as judge of election would have an inducement to commit fraud to secure his own election; but in the case of a man who was a deserter, if not a candidate, no such inducement exists.

This, sir, must be conclusive to every intelligent mind as to Pike township, and if its vote is now rejected the people—that great and higher tribunal, to which this case will be taken on appeal—will reverse this decision in such tones of thunder as will be a warning in the future for the House of Representatives not to tamper with the dearest rights of freemen.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Pike township out of the question, allowing the contestant [Mr. Delano] all that he claims, he is still beaten by a majority of 59, without going into the case of the sitting member against him. But it is far from conceded that the contestant has made out his case in regard to the 26 alleged deserters, exclusive of those charged to Pike township, all of whom were exempted by putting in substitutes. On the contrary, sir, I here declare and stand ready to prove that the contestant [Mr. Delano] has not made out a case against thirty out of the 126 alleged deserters, and I challenge the committee, I challenge the contestant, to grant me the time necessary to take up each case, that I may expose to this House and to the world the character of this whole proceeding. I regret, sir, that my proposition is not accepted, and I am forced to expose the pretended case of the contestant by citing a few examples. It is claimed by the report made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] that William Murray, of Coshocot county, No. 16 on contestant's brief, is a deserter, and his vote is taken from the vote of the sitting member. Now, sir, I assert and defy the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] or the contestant to show to this House one single word of testimony tending to show that William Murray is even charged with desertion. The charge does not even exist. In his brief, contestant cites pages 351, 351, and 355, part first, and there is no further testimony as to William Murray. Pages 351 and 355 show that William Murray is a Democrat, and page 355 that he voted; but there is not a word, not the shadow of a pretense that he was ever charged with desertion.

Now, sir, let us take a few other cases, and they will illustrate the character of the rotten fabric upon which contestant's case rests. Take the case of David Ford, No. 10 on contestant's brief, charged in the report as a deserter, and his vote deducted from the sitting member. Now, sir, I turn to page 366, part second, and there find the following certificate:

We, the subscribers, composing the board of enrollment of the thirteenth district of the State of Ohio, provided for in section eight, act of Congress for enrolling and calling out the national forces, approved March 3, 1863, hereby certify that David Ford, of Franklin township, Coshocot county, State of Ohio, having given satisfactory evidence that he is not properly subject to do military duty as required by said act and the act approved February 24, 1864, by reason of his having furnished an acceptable recruit is exempt from all liability to military duty for the term of the draft.

JOHN A. SIMMETT,

Provost Marshal and President of the Board of Enrollment.ISAAC HADLEY, Member of the Board of Enrollment, Newark, Ohio, this 1st day of November, 1864.

But this is not all, sir. By reference to the testimony of contestant, pages 250, 251, and 253 of contestants own testimony, it will be found that David Ford is not on the Provost Marshal's list of alleged deserters. And yet, sir, the contestant [Mr. Delano] and the majority of the committee have the temerity to set down David Ford as a deserter, and to deduct his vote from the sitting member. The same precise state of facts exist as to Josiah Pepper, No. 12, page 5 of the contestants brief; and he, too, is put down as a deserter, and his vote is deducted from the sitting member. And so, Mr. Speaker, I might go on case by case and show to the satisfaction of every honest man that out of the whole number of 137 alleged deserters, the charge is not made out against thirty of the whole number, and if it was sustained, which cannot be, for the testimony does not exist, there is not evidence that twenty of the entire number voted for the sitting member. Mr. Speaker, I will not occupy further time by going into the case of the contestant, for I have already shown that upon his own case he has no right to a seat on this floor.

The official majority of the sitting member (Morgan) was 271. From which deduct votes due contestant: illegally rejected, 5; Linton township, 48; Monroe township, 20; Minors, 3; non-residents, 32; alleged deserters, 30; total, 133; still leaving Morgan's majority 138. So that were everything granted to the contestant which can be done without rendering this whole proceeding a shameless farce, the sitting member still has a majority of 138, without going into his case against the contestant. Now, Mr. Speaker, you have gazed upon that picture, and I now wish you to look upon this:

MORGAN VS. DELANO.

Uncontradicted testimony shows that there were 120 names on the poll-book of Blue Rock township in 1866 which were not on the poll-book of 1865. That at the October election, 1865, in that township the aggregate vote for Cox and Morgan, opposing candidates for Governor, was 208; and while the sitting member polled 10 more votes in 1866 than he had done in 1865, the contestant [Mr. Delano] polled 206 votes, or within 2 votes of the aggregate Democratic and Republican vote of the previous year; and all this in a county township. Nor is this all. John M. Harlan, who voted for Mr. Delano, testifies that there were 87 more votes polled in Blue Rock township in 1866 than in 1865, while the official vote of 1867 shows that the vote of Blue Rock was 37 less than in 1866, while the vote of every other township was greater than the vote of the previous year. And while Cox only beat Morgan 50 votes in that township in 1865, Delano beat him 117 votes the next year, although the vote of Morgan was 10 greater than in 1865. These facts alone conclusively establish fraudulent and corrupt voting for contestant.

But this is not all. Where did these fraudulent voters come from? The testimony of several witnesses shows that they came from West Virginia, Pennsylvania, New York, and from various districts in Ohio. That in the fall of 1865, a great oil excitement broke out, and that "speculators" came and went "like the crowd going up and down in the streets of Zanesville." They did not even pretend that they went to Blue Rock to make it their residence, and many of them avowed they only remained to vote for Delano; and the witnesses concur in saying "that the oil men (as those people were called) left immediately after the election." Mr. Speaker, by the laws of Ohio, it is made a felony, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary from one to five years for the judge of an election to refuse to administer the required oath to a person whose vote is challenged. And yet, sir, in contempt of the law, and for the purpose of fraud, the judges of that election refused to administer the required oath to the non-residents who presented themselves to vote.

James White says (H. Mis. Doc. 38, part 2, pp. 609-10) he has resided over fifty years in Blue Rock township.

"Q. State what you know relative to the judges of election refusing to swear non-resident oil men when they were challenged.

"A. I thought that, as I was an old man, I had the right to challenge strangers' votes.

"Q. State what was the conduct of the active friends of Mr. Delano toward Democrats while at the polls.

"A. I thought they were a little rougher than I had ever seen them. I have been a voter there all my life, and never saw as much abuse to old citizens; they called them rebels and everything they could lay their tongues to. There were three old Democrats of us went into the house, and thought we would challenge some of their votes; they commenced abusing us till I backed out, and went out of the house and stayed out. They did run two Democrats off; the Democrats came and would go right off again."

Joseph McDonald (H. Mis. Doc. 38, part 2; p. 624) says he has resided in Blue Rock township since 1816.

"Question. State what you know relative to the judges of the October election, 1866, in Blue Rock township, refusing to swear non-resident oil men when they were challenged.

"Answer. They said they fetched them in as stragglers, or Methodist preachers, who had a right to vote wherever they were. There were some few sworn; the balance were not sworn; the judges said it was not worth while.

"Question. Please state who requested the judges of said election to have the non-resident oil men sworn.

"Answer. I did myself, and also heard other persons do so, but do not recollect who. They said they had not time to swear all of them, and they passed the oil men into the class of stragglers, and Methodist preachers. The judges of the election were Republican.

"Question. Were Democrats intimidated from exercising the right of challenge?

"Answer. They were. The non-resident oil men belonged to the Republican party; there were few Democrats."

John Silvey says (H. Mis. Doc. 38, part 2, pp. 633-34) he has resided in Blue Rock township forty-three years.

"Question. State what you know relative to the judges of the election held in Blue Rock township, October, 1866, refusing to swear non-resident oil men when challenged.

"Answer. Mr. McDonald and I went into the polls and requested them to swear the oil men; the reply was that it was not necessary; that Mr. Peyton's reference was enough; that they are the same as a Methodist preacher on a circuit, wherever they were at the time was their residence."

He says that Democrats were intimidated from challenging by the active friends of Mr. Delano. "If a Democrat were to speak, fifteen or twenty would run up and shake their fists at you, and threaten to beat or whip you. As a general thing they (non-resident oil men) acted with the Republican party."

The sitting member attempted to prove who these non-residents were and for whom they voted. But to such an extent were they strangers in the township that no one knew them; it was only known that at the election "they acted with the mob," fighting for the contestant, and that immediately after the election, with carpet-bag in hand, they disappeared like so many shadows.

THE POLLS ILLEGALLY CLOSED.

I have already shown, Mr. Speaker, that the frauds in Blue Rock were so numerous that it was impossible to separate the illegal from the legal votes, and that according to all the precedents in similar cases that the poll of that township must be rejected. But there is another point, sir, to which I desire to call the attention of the House. The officers of the election, all the political friends of contestant, closed the polls in this township during one hour, and carried the ballot-box and poll-books away from the polls, thereby depriving the electors of that precinct from having an opportunity to vote as prescribed by the law. It is clear that if the officers of the election can at their own option close the polls, and stop the election during one hour on the pretext of going to dinner, they have equal right to close the polls at five o'clock p. m. for one hour to go to supper. They would then return at six o'clock, when by law the polls are required to be closed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not ask that the poll of this township should be rejected upon that ground alone; but when it is considered that the action of the judges of the election was grossly corrupt, criminal, and that a large number of the citizens of other States were there allowed to vote, it makes a case of such accumulated wrongs that there can be no doubt that both law and justice demand that the entire vote be rejected. And I now call the attention of the House to the ruling of Justice Brinkerhoff, of the supreme court of Ohio, concurred in by Murdock, Cox, and Force, J. J., (all members of the Republican party,) at the district court for Hamilton county, Ohio:

"It was correctly stated by Mr. Pugh as a universal law governing all elections that, throwing aside mere forms, the only question is, who has received the most legal votes? The point as to the want of the signatures of the judges to the papers touched a mere matter of form. The object was only to authenticate the paper, and it was competent to authenticate by other means as it was by the oath of the recorder. So, also, as to the administration of an oath to the judges. They were sworn as a matter of fact, and acted as judges de facto.

"It was beyond dispute, however, that for about the space of two hours the judges and clerk of election left the polls and took the ballot-box away, returning afterward and resuming the election. There is no pretense that the ballot-box was tampered with, but that the judges rather acted in ignorance of what their duties were.

"The court is of opinion that such conduct on the part of the judges goes to the substance of the election, and renders it void in toto. The statute prescribes that the polls shall be opened at a given hour in the morning and closed at a given hour in the afternoon. It was the express design of the Legislature that all the time between these hours the polls should be kept open for the convenience of any elector who may choose to present his ballot. The court does not agree with counsel that it lies on the party contesting the election to show affirmatively that the closing of the polls influenced the result. The law gives the elector the privilege of consulting his own convenience as to what hour of the day he will visit the polls, and it is a fair presumption that if the polls were temporarily closed for dinner, as was proved, a portion of the electors were deprived of that privilege. The writ was, therefore, well brought against Mr. Ritt, who claimed the majority, but the same state of facts also excludes Mr. Brown, the relator, from the office of mayor.

"Murdock, Cox, and Force, J.J., concurred.

In the case of Burch vs. Van Horn, decided during the present session of Congress, the Committee of Elections, by their unanimous report, say:

"Each of the States of the Union have hitherto regulated suffrage in their own limits for themselves and in such manner as the people of the State deemed most conducive to their own interests and welfare."

Such a remarkable concession on the part of the Committee of Elections is encouraging. But if the State has the right to pass laws regulating elections within the State, it will not be denied that it belongs to the State courts to construe those laws; and the House of Representatives has even professed to be governed in its action as to State laws by the construction given to those laws by the State courts. And now, Mr. Speaker, with these facts before them, I ask the members of this House, whether they are prepared to assume the responsibility of rejecting the vote of Pike township against which no fraud has been even charged; and retain the vote of Blue Rock township, all steeped in fraud, illegality, and corruption as it is? If they are, then they should frankly declare that they reject Pike township, though free from the taint of fraud, because it gave the sitting member 140 majority; and that they retain the vote of Blue Rock, although reeking with corruption, because that township gave a Republican majority of 117 votes, being 60 more votes than there were legal voters in the township. Sir, such action may satisfy the conscience of this House, but it will not satisfy the people, for intelligent men of all parties will feel that in the action of this House, a serious blow has been struck at the right of election by the people.

CLINTON TOWNSHIP.

Among the grounds urged by the contestant why he was entitled to a seat upon this floor, was that the judges of the election in a number of townships had commenced to count out the vote before six o'clock in the evening. He did not charge or attempt to show by proof that any fraud had been committed or even attempted, or that any advantage had been taken by the friends of the sitting member; but, sir, he asked the committee to throw out the entire vote, to disfranchise all the citizens; Republicans and Democrats alike, of the townships of Adams, Crawford, and Oxford, in Goshocton county; of Liberty, in Knox county; of Harrison, in Licking county; and of Muskingum, Perry, and Washington townships, in Muskingum county. Nor did he stop here. He asked to have the vote of Harrison township, Knox county, thrown out, solely because the judges of the election adjourned the counting out of the vote precisely as they were authorized to do by the laws of Ohio. Well, sir, representing the people whose rights were assailed by the contestant; defending the right of the majority to be represented by the person of their choice, in my answer I alleged certain grave illegalities against the vote polled in the city of Mount Vernon and the township of Clinton. And as to the law and the facts relative to the vote of this township, I read from the minority report:

"Within the corporate limits of this township is situated the incorporated city of Mount Vernon, divided into five wards. The constitution of Ohio requires electors to vote in the county, township, and ward in which they reside. The laws of that State require:

"That each township in the several counties shall compose an election district, unless such township is now, or shall hereafter be, divided by law into more districts than one; the election to be held at such place in such township or district as the trustees in each township shall direct; and each ward of any city that is or may be divided into wards shall compose an election district; the elections therein to be held at such places as the members of the city council for their respective wards shall direct; and in all elections held under this act they shall serve as judges, and perform the duties required of township trustees in like cases." (Act of May 3, 1852; 50 Ohio Laws, 311; Swan and Cr., Stat. p. 532, secs. 15, 16.)

"That if either of the trustees, common councilmen, or clerk of any township shall fail to attend at the time and place of holding elections, or if either of them should be a candidate for a State or county office, then it shall be the duty of the electors present to choose viva voce, suitable persons, (as the case may require,) having the qualifications of electors, to act as judges or clerk (as the case may be) of the election. (Act of April 2, 1859; 66 Ohio Laws, 119; 1 Swan and Cr., p. 533, sec. 20.)

"No person shall be permitted to vote at any election unless he shall have been an actual resident of the State for one year next preceding the election, and an actual resident of the county for thirty days next preceding the election, and an actual resident of the township or ward twenty days next preceding the election. (Act of May 1, 1857; 54 Ohio Laws, 136; 1 Swan and Cr., p. 543, sec. 71.)

"Any person who shall willfully vote in any township or ward in which he has not actually resided for twenty days next preceding the election, shall, on conviction thereof, be imprisoned in the jail of the proper county not more than six months nor less than one month." (Act of May 1, 1857; 1 Swan and Cr., p. 544, sec. 85.)

"Nothing in this act contained, so far as the same relates to the length of time required of a voter to reside in the township or ward where he offers to vote, shall be held, taken or construed to apply to any voter who is the head of a family, who shall bona fide remove with his family from one ward into another within the corporate limits of any city within the same county." (Act of May 1, 1857; Swan and Cr., p. 544, sec. 85.)

"That all elections hereafter to be held for" * * * * "Representatives to Congress shall be held and conducted in the manner prescribed by this act."

"In the city of Mount Vernon no election was held according to law. No attempt was made to hold any election in said city as such, or in the respective wards thereof. An election was held within the territorial limits of the fourth ward, but it was held as a township not as a ward election, and was held by the trustees of Clinton township, neither of whom was a councilman or officer of the city. At this election the electors of the township, including the city, voted. The votes of the citizens of the city and those of the citizens of the township outside the city were all deposited in the same ballot-box. The polls were closed by the officers of this election from thirty to sixty minutes between twelve m. and one o'clock p. m., and the ballot-box and poll-books were carried away and kept by the officers, all of whom were the political friends of the contestant. (See the decision of Justice Brinkerhoff, referred to in connection with Blue Rock township.) The workingmen in the foundries and workshops of the city generally voted during their dinner hour, from twelve to one o'clock, and were liable to lose wages if absent to vote at another hour. (Pt. 2, pp. 285, 287, 291, and Pt. 1, pp. 132, 133.) The general elections for Clinton township appear to have been held on this election was during the preceding thirteen or fourteen years, for some unexplained reason ignoring the existence of the city and disregarding the plain letter of the law. One of the officers of the election, John Y. Reeve, refused to administer the oath to many persons challenged by the friends of the contestant, and unlawfully and fraudulently deposited their ballots in utter disregard of the demands of competent challengers, and thus committed felonies punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary of the State. The law says that—

"If any judge" * * * * "shall refuse or sanction the refusal by any other judge of the board to which he shall belong to administer either of the oaths or affirmations prescribed by the thirteenth and fifteenth sections of this act" * * * * "(to be administered to any person whose right to vote is challenged,) he shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary and kept at hard labor for not more than five years nor less than one year."

But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding all these violations of law, notwithstanding the majority of the committee have rejected this vote, as judicially they were bound to do, I do not ask that the vote of Clinton township and of the city of Mount Vernon shall be rejected. For allowing the contestant the entire majority declared for him in that township and city, illegal votes and all, the sitting member still has a majority of 361 over the contestant.

Mr. Speaker, this is probably the first time in the history of our Government that a report of the majority of a committee seeking to give a seat to the contestant, shows in their report that a majority of the legal votes polled at the election were against him. In order to give Mr. Delano 81 majority it became necessary to disfranchise 292 votes; every one of whom, with the exception of the 11 claimed to have not reported under the draft, are acknowledged to be legal voters.

The fact stands thus: while it is admitted that a majority of the legal votes cast at that election in the thirteenth district were against the contestant, and while that fact is undisputed either by the contestant or by the gentleman who represent him; still with that majority acknowledged and reported against him, it is proposed to oust the Representative chosen by the people and place in his stead the candidate rejected by the people.

The facts in regard to Pike township I will very briefly repeat out of consideration to honorable gentlemen whom I now see upon the floor who were not present when I discussed that subject. By the laws of Ohio the three township trustees constitute the judges of election. At the election in Pike township the three trustees did preside as judges of election. No fraud, no illegality of any kind is charged against those judges or any of the electors of that township. But it is simply claimed that one of the judges neglected to report when drafted; and for this reason, and for this alone, it is proposed by the majority of the committee to disfranchise the entire township.

I desire to call the attention of the House to another fact in the case. The law regulating contested elections passed in 1851 requires that the contestant shall serve upon the sitting member a notice, in which he shall particularly specify the grounds of contest. Now, sir, in the notice served upon the sitting member there was no allegation made in regard to the township of Pike. The sitting member received no notice that any question would be made before this body upon any such ground, and he was only made aware of that fact when the brief of the contestant was filed before the Committee of Elections.

Now, I beg leave to correct a statement made by my honorable colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio,] when he stated that there is no instance in the history of Congress in which a defective notice decided the action of the House against the contestant. The honorable gentleman is mistaken. I refer him to the case of Wright vs. Fuller, Barclay's Contested Elections, 152. In that case one of the specifications set forth, as a ground of contest, that there was illegality "in the reception of votes by the officers of both election boards from persons who were not, at the time, qualified electors within the meaning of the statutes of Pennsylvania; the said persons being, at the time, either under the age of twenty-one years, non-residents, foreigners not naturalized, or persons not regularly assessed or returned; neither of which classes of persons are, by the laws of Pennsylvania, entitled to the elective franchise, so as to be legally qualified to vote for a candidate for the office of member of the House of Representatives of the United States." It will be seen that in this notice the contestant undertook to show the facts constituting the illegality complained of. One point held by a majority of the committee was, that it was not necessary to furnish the incumbent with a list of alleged illegal voters; but it was further held "that the intent of the law requiring notice to be given specifying the particular grounds of the contest, was to prevent any surprise being practiced on the sitting member, and to put him upon a proper defense."

In the foregoing case there was a minority report from the committee, (see p. 161.) It was insisted that the contestant's specifications were insufficient, and upon this point the reasoning was as follows:

"The first section of the act of Congress of 19th February, 1851, requires that whenever any person shall intend to contest the election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall, within thirty days after said election, give notice in writing to the member whose seat he intends to contest, and in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds on which he relies in said contest."

The majority of the committee reported a resolution declaring the seat vacated, but the House laid the whole subject on the table, thereby allowing the sitting member to retain his seat.

So, in White vs. Harris (Bartlett's Contested Elections, 257) the majority of the committee held that the election should be treated as a nullity; but the minority objected, among other things, to the want of particularity in several of the allegations of the contestant, and the House laid the whole subject on the table. In their report the minority of the committee say:

"Not only are the allegations of the contestant insufficient in view of the above authorities, but they do not even indicate the class of the voters objected to as illegal, which was held to be the saving point as to the allegations of contestant in the case of Valandigham vs. Campbell, by a portion of the committee in their report upon that case."

Now, in this case the notice was not only insufficient, but there was no notice at all as to Pike township. The sitting member was not put upon his guard; he was not warned of the ground upon which the contestant would come into this House and claim a seat on this floor against the wishes of the majority of the electors of the thirteenth district. I would not make this point did it stand alone; but inasmuch as it is proposed to disfranchise the electors of this township, inasmuch as it is proposed to disfranchise two hundred and ninety-two citizens upon a technicality, I throw myself upon my legal rights and deny that the contestant had a right to introduce any evidence before the committee or before this House upon the subject of Pike township at all.

The testimony of the contestant shows that in the thirteenth district there are charged 774 deserters. Of these 774 deserters it is claimed by the majority report that 186 voted for the sitting member. Now, I ask for whom did the remaining 638 vote? Had they voted the Democratic ticket, the contestant, with all his ingenuity and industry and his large moneyed ability would have established that such was the case. But, it may be said if these 638 alleged deserters were Republicans why did not the contestant show the fact? The answer is a simple one. The sitting member believed, as he believes now, that not one of those 774 persons could be legally regarded as deserters. He did not dream that a body of intelligent men, composed in a large part of lawyers, could for a moment entertain the proposition that a man is to be held guilty of crime because he is accused of crime; that a citizen is to suffer the penalty of crime without the opportunity of defense.

Sir, the doctrine seems to me so atrocious, that I would have deemed myself insulting the intelligence and integrity of this honorable body if I had attempted to present any such claim for consideration.

Now, sir, upon the contestant's own showing, unless this House is ready to disfranchise 292 voters upon the pretext, which is proved to be false, that one of the judges of election had failed to report under the draft, then upon the contestant's own showing the sitting member has a clear majority of 59 votes allowing all else as claimed by contestant.

But I ask the members of this House whether they will, with their responsibility to the people, with their responsibility to their own consciences, undertake to disfranchise the township of Pike and return the vote of the township Blue Rock?

If so, then, sir, I can only conclude, the country will conclude, that if this seat, in violation of the will of the majority of legal voters of the thirteenth district, is to be given to the contestant, it will be done on party grounds, and the right of election will have been taken from the people and usurped by this honorable body. Then, instead of the people of Ohio having the right to choose their own Representatives, the question is to be decided by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Vermont, the honorable gentleman from New York, and honorable gentlemen from other States, instead of by the people of Ohio.

Mr. Speaker, my time is too brief to enter upon a new argument. I will, therefore, only suggest, with great deference to this honorable body, that if it be their good pleasure to deny to the people of the thirteenth district of Ohio the right to be represented by the person of their choice, the resolutions introduced by the gentleman who made the majority report be amended so that they may read thus:

Resolved, That George W. Morgan, being a Democrat, is not entitled to a seat in the Fortieth Congress from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

Resolved, That Columbus Delano, supposed to be a Republican, is entitled to a seat in the Fortieth Congress from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

Mr. Speaker, if it be the pleasure of this honorable body to set aside the election made by the people, and to establish the doctrine of self-election as to members of Congress, conscious of having discharged my full duty to my constituents, I will retire from this Hall without a regret. With confidence I will return to the people, and give to them an account of my stewardship. And in now taking leave of this House, I will not say with Fitz James—

"Twice have I sought Clan-Alpine's glen
In peace; but when I come again,
I come with banner, brand, and bow,
As leader seeks his mortal foe."

No, sir, not with "banner, brand, and bow," but I will be sent back by the majestic voice of an outraged people—not by three hundred, but by ten times three hundred majority.

Representation in Congress.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE VICKERS,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

June 8, 1868.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Florida, and Alabama to representation in Congress—

Mr. VICKERS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The bill before the Senate is one "to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Florida to representation in Congress." The amendment proposed by the committee imposes two conditions upon the admission of these States. The first is, that they shall ratify what is called the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution; and the second is, "that there shall never be in such State any denial or abridgement of the elective franchise to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed." An amendment has also been proposed to insert "Alabama" in connection with these States. I have discovered during my brief experience in the Senate that upon a motion to amend the merits of the bill are generally debated. My object, therefore, will be to discuss a few of the principles involved in the bill, and also of the reconstruction measures upon which it is predicated.

The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution authorizes the admission of new States. It does not, as alleged by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] as I understood him in the discussion of the bill for the admission of Arkansas, authorize Congress to reorganize new States upon republican principles and give to it plenary and absolute power to effect such organizations. I understand the admission of a State to be one with a constitution duly organized by the people of the State before admission is applied for, and the only condition upon which that admission is to be effected is that the constitution in its principles shall be adapted to the political principles of the Government to which application is made, being homogeneous to it and formed by the people of the State. The power to admit presupposes a State duly organized before application is made for that admission, not a power to organize or reorganize States, but only a power to admit them when duly organized, if their constitutions are of such a character as should receive the approbation Congress.

I have looked in vain for any clause in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to organize or reorganize States or to impose conditions upon States that apply for admission. If it is not in the simple power to admit, then I suppose it must be claimed under that to guaranty a republican form of government. But the same difficulty is presented here as in the case of admission, for the power to guaranty presupposes something to be guaranteed. It necessarily implies that the constitution which is to be guaranteed is in full force and existence. If a debt is to be guaranteed, that debt must have a previous existence. The guarantee can apply only to that which has such existence; and so it is in regard to the guarantee of a republican form of government. The forty-third number of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, page 201, after quoting the provision in the Constitution which authorizes the Legislature to guaranty a republican form of government, says:

"In a confederacy founded on republican principles and composed of republican members, the superintending Government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations."

Again, on page 202:

"But the authority extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government, which supposes a preëxisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms they have a right to do so and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is, that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican constitutions; a restriction which, it is presumed, will hardly be considered as a grievance."

Again, in the thirty-ninth number of the Federalist, page 174, speaking of a republican government, Mr. Madison says:

"If we resort, for a criterion, to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or at least may bestow that name on a government when derives all its power directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure, for a limited period, or during good behavior."

I have also an authority from a distinguished member of the Senate, who has been long in public life, who has age, experience, and judgment, and has been associated with some of the most brilliant men in either House of Congress who have shed luster upon the history of the country. I refer to a speech made by Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE, Senator from Ohio, on the 7th of March, 1866, upon the question of the admission of Nebraska into the Union. He said:

"I do not desire to enter into a discussion; but I will say that the committee had before them first the constitution of the State of Nebraska, which they examined and found a very liberal and a very good constitution, analogous to most of the constitutions of the States, indeed almost a copy of the constitutions of many of the western States. There is nothing in it to which any gentleman here would object, except that clause which restricts the franchise to white persons. That question I do not propose to discuss, because no new light can possibly be thrown upon it."—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, page 4207.

Again, in the same speech, he said:

"In the next place, as for the Senator from Massachusetts, he challenges me to show that this constitution is republican in form. Well, sir, it is republican in form, but is not that kind of republicanism that I approve of. If I had my way about it nobody would be excluded from the franchise that was a male citizen of proper age, let his color be what it would. That would be the color of republicanism that I should like the best; but to deny that, under the Constitution of the United States, this constitution is republican in form, is to deny that we have a republic at all, for when the Government was formed I believe there was not more than one State at all events that was republican in form unless this is republican in form. It is republican in form and also in substance, for I do not suppose (and I am informed that there are not) that there are fifty colored persons in the whole Territory; but they ought to vote if there was but one."—Ibid., page 4208.

We have this high authority as to what constitutes a republican government. Here was a constitution presented in 1866 with a restriction confining suffrage to white persons; but the Senator from Ohio said that such a constitution, which prohibited free negroes from exercising the right of suffrage, was a republican constitution; and further, that there was perhaps but one State when the Union was formed whose constitution did not contain alike prohibition. He said further, that that constitution was not only republican in form, but republican in substance, although by it free negroes were excluded from the right of suffrage.

The policy of Congress in the bills which have been submitted to the consideration of the Senate, in regard to the admission of the southern States, must proceed upon the assumption that these States are out of the Union. Then I ask, having once been in the Union, when and how did they get out of it? Was it by the ordinances of secession? Did those ordinances separate or sever them from the Union? I understood the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] while discussing this bill on Saturday—and if I am mistaken in his position he will correct me—to say that the ordinances of secession on the part of these States did forfeit all their political rights.

Mr. HOWARD. Followed by acts of war upon the Government of the United States was the ground upon which I put it.

Mr. VICKERS. Followed by acts of war upon the Government of the United States; and further, that by the conquest of those States all the political rights to which they had previously been entitled were acquired by, and accrued to, the United States, who had the right to impose any conditions they pleased upon them. Was that the honorable Senator's position?

Mr. HOWARD. Not exactly; but I will not interrupt you further.

Mr. VICKERS. The ordinances of secession of themselves certainly did not take these States out of the Union, because they were of a peaceable character; and if by peaceable measures they could become disunited from the Government, then the Government would not have prosecuted the war which they did upon those States; but it was upon the principle that the Union was indissoluble. It could not have been successfully waged upon any other principle. The whole North and the border States fought it out on the principle that the Union was not dissolved. If it had been proclaimed at the beginning of the war that these acts of secession, even if followed by acts of hostility, had taken those States out of the Union, the combat never could have been successfully ended.

If the war was carried on to preserve the Union, not to restore it, it was upon constitutional principles, and the ordinances of secession had no effect in dissolving the connection of these States with the Government of the United States. If it was fought to preserve the Union, I ask how is it possible that the success of our arms could effect that which the contest was prosecuted to prevent? Did the triumph of our arms in that great conflict dissolve the Union? If the ordinances of secession did not, how could the success of our arms produce that result?

But I understood the Senator from Michigan to say that the ordinances of secession, followed by acts of war upon the Government, forfeited all rights on the part of those States. Mr. President, was that the view which Congress took in 1861? In the month of July, 1861, after the first battle of Manassas, did the Congress of the United States entertain the opinion that this Union had been dissolved? No, sir.

There was no declaration of war unless the declaration made by Congress of the objects and principles upon which it was prosecuted be considered such. Why, sir, had not this country a very serious difficulty with the Government of Great Britain because that Government acknowledged the southern States to be belligerents? If they were out of the Union they were a distinct and separate nation, and Great Britain had the right to acknowledge them as belligerents. That difficulty has not yet been fully adjusted. We have denied that they were belligerents or that that Government had any right to recognize them as such.

Then upon what clause of the Constitution was this war prosecuted? Not upon the power to make war, because there was no declaration of it; but upon the power to suppress insurrection, to execute the laws, and to repel invasion. If there is any other portion of the Constitution under which this civil conflict was conducted, I have been unable to discover it. If the Union had been dissolved by the ordinances of secession would the war have been fought to suppress insurrection or to repel invasion or to execute the laws? Does not the fact that insurrection and the execution of the laws negative the idea of a dissolution? The declaration which Congress made on the 24th of July, 1861, and which was proposed by the present President of the United States, then a Senator from the State of Tennessee, after the first battle, was in these words:

"Resolved by the Senate, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States now in arms against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the Capital; that in this national emergency, Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

It was not prosecuted on the part of the United States for conquest or subjugation, not to interfere with any of the established institutions of the southern States, but merely to preserve the Union and the supremacy of the Constitution. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land; and it was to enforce the supremacy of that law that the war was waged. Law is a rule of action. That rule must have been binding upon the southern States when this declaration was issued, or the supremacy of the law could not have been asserted over them. Then it was to assert the supremacy of this Constitution and of this law over those States that this declaration of Congress was made. It was not for the purpose of subjugation, but merely to maintain and enforce the law, a law which bound the southern States, and was supreme because constitutional. It was for the execution of that law by all the power of the Government that the war was prosecuted, and not for the purpose of subjugation or of conquest. Congress did not then consider that the Union was dissolved, or that the southern States had forfeited any rights which they had under the Government. On the contrary, they asserted that whenever the law was practically admitted to be supreme the war should cease; that it was not prosecuted for the purpose of impairing the dignity, equality, and rights of the southern States. It recognized those States as in the Union, and said that as soon as the war ceased they should have the same dignity, the same equality, and the same rights unimpaired that they had when the conflict commenced. That was the declaration Congress made, not only to the southern States, but to the whole nation; a declaration upon which the war was fought; and I say it could not have been successfully fought upon any other principles.

Mr. President, if this bill passes, what becomes of the "dignity" of the southern States? Have they the same dignity that New York, Pennsylvania, or other States have in this Union? When they are commanded before their admission to accept the constitutional amendment, and never to alter or change their organic law; that before they shall be admitted here, they shall be deprived and forever deprived of the right to amend their constitutions, so as to make a distinction in regard to suffrage on the ground of race or color—is that the dignity of which the resolution of Congress spoke? Are those the equal rights which the other States possess, and which were meant by Congress when it passed this resolution? Are these the rights which the southern States possessed when the rebellion commenced and when this proclamation of Congress was made? They are asked to come in not upon equal terms, not having the same dignity, not having equality of rights with the other States.

I heard it said—I think it was by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] when discussing the Arkansas bill—that Arkansas should be admitted because Congress had offered inducements to Arkansas, had made propositions to her. She had complied with all those propositions except one, which had reference to the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution; but that, as Arkansas had done all she could by a compliance with the propositions which Congress had submitted, therefore she ought to be received. Apply that doctrine to the amendment now before the Senate for the admission of Alabama. The amendment proposes to admit that State, not because she has complied with the propositions submitted to her by that body, but because she has not complied with them. Arkansas was to be admitted because she had complied, and Alabama is now to be admitted because she has not complied. The one complied with the requisitions of the law, and the other has not complied with those requisitions.

Then upon what ground can Alabama be admitted? It must be upon the ground of the absolute right of Congress to admit or reject without reference to the law which was submitted to that State as a condition when she held her election. If she can be admitted because a majority of her registered voters have not ratified the constitution where is the necessity of requiring a majority of the votes cast at the elections in the other States to entitle them to admission? If Congress has the power to say to Alabama, "You shall be admitted because a majority of your people have not ratified the constitution," it has the same right to say to South Carolina and the other States that they shall be admitted although their majorities may or may not be in favor of the constitution. The fact that those States gave a majority for the Constitution does not alter the case nor vary the principle. If they had given majorities against the constitution they could be admitted upon the same principle and with the same propriety that it is now proposed to admit Alabama. It resolves itself into a question of power, and not of right.

If the proposition submitted to Arkansas, as argued by the Senator from Ohio, should have force, should not this proposition, also, submitted to the whole country by Congress in 1861, when it declared the purposes for which this war was conducted? If the proposals of Congress to Arkansas should have force, should not these proposals submitted not only to the South, but to the nation, be respected?

I understood the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to say, in his discussion of the Arkansas bill, that a State had a right to enter into a compact to deprive itself of political power; that the States could divest themselves of political power by a compact with the General Government. But can the people of a State surrender the power to regulate suffrage? Can it be possible that a State can make a compact for the surrender of that right which affects the life of the State, which is the life of the State, to the General Government? It was well said by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin that if a State surrenders her power over suffrage she ceases to be republican.

But the provisions in the bill now before the Senate in regard to suffrage apply not only to the election of President and members of the lower House of Congress, but also to the election of a State Legislature. Can it be said that Congress has a right to prescribe terms to a State which are to affect her internal condition, her local affairs, which have no connection with the General Government? Can it be that Congress has a right to say to a State that the qualifications of electors for her Legislature shall be of a certain description? Can a State bind her people in future generations to surrender a right which belongs to them as well as to the present generation? The power over suffrage is inalienable. It is like some other powers which are not the subject of contract, and all compacts in reference to them are nugatory and void.

It was said by the Senator from Vermont, in the discussion of the Arkansas bill, that a State had a right to surrender a portion of her sovereignty in regard to taxation, and also the administration of justice. But could a State government surrender to the General Government the whole power of taxation over her people? It would be impossible. Could she surrender to the General Government all power over descents? These are inalienable powers, with which she cannot part. The cases cited by him relate to partial taxation for benefits received and the titles of individuals to certain property, which do not affect the sovereign character of the State.

It must be recollected that the General Government is one of delegated and limited and defined powers, not a nation as Great Britain or France or Austria or Prussia. It received its existence from the States for the purposes of common defense, general welfare, and the security of liberty, and is hedged in by defined boundaries. It is the creature of the States, made by a surrender of certain of their powers for specific purposes, the proper execution of which was to inure to the mutual benefit of all the States. It can exercise no power nor claim any attributes of sovereignty inconsistent with the independence, dignity, and equality of the States. The idea that the child and creature of the States and the people of the States, created and brought into being by their coöperation, to preserve, protect, and defend the common interests against foreign nations, and to promote the general welfare, should become the master and monster to absorb the powers of the States, take from them their chief attributes of sovereignty, and degrade them, was never before heard of. In the forty-fifth number of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, I find these words:

"The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce, with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

Here is a Government of limited powers, expressed, defined, and bounded by provisions of the Constitution, while the powers remaining in the States are unlimited and indefinite; and now this Government of limited and defined powers seeks to obtrude a constitution upon a State of unlimited and undefined powers. Could it be said that under the Articles of Confederation the Congress of the United States would have such a power as is now claimed by this Congress in regard to imposing restrictions upon a sovereign State? No such power was given to the Confederacy, and no pretense was ever set up that any such had any legal existence. If under the Articles of Confederation no such power existed, does any such exist under the Constitution of the United States? I read again from the forty-fifth number of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison.

"If the new constitution be examined with accuracy and candor, it will be found that the change which it proposes consists much less in the addition of new powers to the Union than in the invigoration of its original powers. The regulation of commerce, it is true, is a new power; but that seems to be an addition which few oppose, and from which no apprehensions are entertained. The powers relating to war and peace, armies and fleets, treaties and finance, with the other more considerable powers, are all vested in the existing Congress by the Articles of Confederation. The proposed changes do not enlarge these powers; it only substitutes a more effectual mode of administering them. The change relating to taxation may be regarded as the most important; and yet the present Congress have as complete authority to require of the States indefinite supplies of money for the common defense and general welfare, as the future Congress will have to require them of individual citizens; and the latter will be no more bound than the States themselves have been to pay the quotas respectively taxed on them."

No such power as that claimed by this Congress existed in Congress under the Articles of Confederation; and if any one will take the trouble to read the preamble to those articles and the preamble to the Constitution they will find them substantially the same, with the addition that the Union was to be formed by the adoption of this Constitution. Here is a Constitution having no new powers but that in reference to the regulation of commerce; a Constitution with no enlarged powers; no additional, except that with reference to commerce; a Constitution which merely gave additional vigor to enforce the powers which were in Congress under the Articles of Confederation; and under this Constitution, with such an interpretation as that, we are now called upon to exercise a power not in the Articles of Confederation, not in the Constitution, but which can be found only by some implication which I cannot make nor understand.

In regard to the rights of the States even after their admission, in the case of Pollard's

Lessee vs. Hagan, in 3 Howard, which was referred to in the discussion of the Arkansas bill, the Supreme Court of the United States say:

"The right of Alabama, and of every other new State, to exercise all the powers of government which belong to and may be exercised by the original States of the Union, must be admitted and remain unquestioned, except so far as they are temporarily deprived of control over the public lands."

"Whenever the United States shall have fully executed these trusts, the municipal sovereignty of the new States will be complete, throughout their respective borders, and they and the original States will be upon an equal footing in all respects whatever. We therefore think the United States hold the public land within the new States by force of the deed of cession and the statutes connected with them, and not by any municipal sovereignty which it may be supposed they possess or have reserved by compact with the new States for that particular purpose. The provision of the Constitution above referred to shows that no such power can be exercised by the United States within a State. Such a power is not only repugnant to the Constitution, but it is inconsistent with the spirit and intention of the deed of cession."

Further, the court say:

"It cannot be admitted that the king of Spain could, by treaty or otherwise, impart to the United States any of his royal prerogatives; and much less can it be admitted that they have capacity to receive or power to exercise them. Every nation acquiring territory by treaty or otherwise, must hold it subject to the constitution and laws of its own Government, and not according to those of the Government ceding it."

The court say that although the king of Spain had this eminent domain, although he had a right to grant the land under the water, yet, when the United States took the territory, they did not take with it such a power over the land covered by the water as that they could patent it; in other words, that they took it in trust for the people of the United States; that they could not take this right which the king of Spain had in the soil; they could not grant it; and that the State of Alabama could not be deprived of her use of the navigable waters by a grant of the land.

The same doctrine was held in Withers vs. Buckley, (20 Howard's Report, page 92,) where the Supreme Court in the opinion say:

"It was contended that the Mississippi river, and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the State of Mississippi as to other citizens of the United States."

In considering this act of Congress of March 1, 1817, it is unnecessary to institute any examination or criticism as to its legitimate meaning, or operation or binding authority, further than to affirm that it could have no effect to restrict the new State in any of its necessary attributes as an independent sovereign government, nor to inhibit or diminish its perfect equality with the other members of the confederacy with which it was to be associated.

These conclusions follow from the very nature and object of the confederacy, from the language of the Constitution adopted by the States, and from the rule of interpretation pronounced by this court in the case of Pollard's Lessee against Hagan, 3 H. p. 779.

Although the State of Mississippi made a compact with the General Government upon her admission, it was held that such was not valid, no such agreement could be entered into, and that the people of Mississippi had the right to the free waters of the State. Before the General Government can acquire power over the right of suffrage in the States there must be a change of the Constitution. It is contrary to the spirit and the genius of our Government that with such limited powers it should have the right to control suffrage or to make a contract for the control of it or its prohibition in any of the States. It has no existing capacity to acquire or use such political power. It could not obtain by treaty the absolute power to control the soil and waters ceded to it so as to make a condition relating to them in the nature of a compact when providing by law for the admission of Alabama and Mississippi, because the exercise of such a power by a Government of limited and specific powers was inconsistent with the nature and rights of State governments as they existed at the time of the formation of the Constitution, and of all such which should be admitted into the Union, and which, of constitutional necessity, must be upon terms of equal dignity and rights. By what authority, express or implied, can it now receive and hold alleged forfeited rights of sovereign States in trust to be dispensed at pleasure on a subsequent recognition of those States? The theory that the General Government can become a trustee of sovereign political State power is a pretension which finds no sanction or color of authority in the letter or spirit of the Constitution, nor in the history of the Government, nor in analogy, nor in any of the discussions of statesmen, commentaries, and written dissertations upon our frame of government, nor in any known traditions or speculations prior to the year 1861.

As a further illustration of the superiority of the State governments in reference to their reserved power and dignity, and of the proper relation of the General Government to the States, I refer to the forty-fifth number of the Federalist, which declares—"That the State governments will have the advantage of the Federal Government, whether we compare them in respect to the immediate dependence of the one on the other; to the weight of personal influence which each side will possess; to the powers respectively vested in them; to the predilection and probable support of the people; to the disposition and faculty of resisting and frustrating the measures of each other. The State governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government; while the latter is nowise essential to the operation or organization of the former. Without the intervention of the State Legislatures the President of the United States cannot be elected at all. They must in all cases have a great share in his appointment, and will, perhaps, in most cases, of themselves determine it. The Senate will be elected absolutely and exclusively by the State Legislatures. Even the House of Representatives, though drawn immediately from the people, will be chosen very much under the influence of that class of men whose influence over the people obtains for themselves an election into the State Legislatures. Thus each of the principal branches of the Federal Government will owe its existence more or less to the favor of the State governments, and must consequently feel a dependence which is much more likely to beget a disposition too obsequious than too overbearing toward them."

We have thus presented to us by the able and enlightened pen of Mr. Madison, who assisted to frame the Constitution, who understood thoroughly the nature and extent of the powers of the State governments, imparted and reserved, and without whose aid and influence the Constitution would probably not have been adopted, a statesman's account of the character, attributes, and relations of the States and General Government, and the dependence of the latter for its continued existence upon the former; and now at this enlightened period we have the extraordinary exhibition of a Government which he foretold would be more likely to become obsequious, arrogating to itself original and sovereign functions and powers over the existence and organic laws of State governments, sitting in judgment upon them, prescribing conditions of a fundamental nature upon their constitutions, and attempting to fasten a perpetual restriction upon the right of the people to alter their form of government!

A pamphlet in reference to the State of South Carolina has been laid upon my table, and as that is one of the States included in the present bill, I beg permission to read some extracts from it. It is signed by Wade Hampton, Joseph Daniel Pope, John P. Thomas, Samuel McGowan, F. W. McMaster, and W. M. Shannon, State Central Executive Committee. These gentlemen say:

"The State is now sadly impoverished. The property which her people had in her slaves has been swept away; it is true, given up by and with the consent of the State; nevertheless, that property no longer represents capital and value. The ravages of war, the marks of the conqueror's torch, are everywhere visible. The labor of the country is passing from one State to another, and is disturbed and demoralized. The flower of the Commonwealth has fallen on the battle-field, and the broken fortunes and disappointed hopes of a proud people weigh heavily upon the energies of at least the old and the less sanguine among us. Yet, under these circumstances, affecting enough to touch the sympathies of every manly nature, and in violation, as we conceive it, of the political inheritances of our forefathers, herein South Carolina was threatened with the onus of a monstrous plan of public spoliation under the guise of an equitable system of taxation. Under the forms of law it is proposed to take away the little that the war has left us. 'Taxation without representation' is combined with 'representation without taxation.' Thus, in South Carolina, it is contemplated to revive the tyranny of the British Parliament in 1776, and to add thereto a new and startling feature."

The Constitution which we are now called upon to recognize, and upon which this State is to be admitted, was framed principally by negroes. I read from the same pamphlet:

"The constitutional convention was composed of—

Whites.....	47
Colored.....	74
	121

Seventy-four colored pay of taxes.....	$117 93
One alone paying.....	85 35

Hence seventy-three colored pay.....	$32 58 or less than fifty cents each.
Forty-seven whites pay.....	761 62
One white (conservative) paying.....	508 85

Hence forty-six whites pay.....	$252 77
or less than six dollars each.

"Of the forty-seven white members, twenty-three pay no tax at all, and of the seventy-four colored members, fifty-nine pay no tax at all. Of the whites, at least one fourth were Government employes and northern adventurers, and of the colored men, a goodly number were from abroad."

I have thus given a description of the component parts of the convention which framed the constitution in South Carolina. Under that constitution they have elected a Legislature thus composed:

"The Legislature elected under the new constitution stands thus, exclusive of the districts of Marion and Lancaster, as the Democratic success in these districts is contested:

Senate.
Whites.....	20
Colored.....	12
Total.....	32

House of Representatives.
Whites.....	37
Colored.....	86
Total.....	123

Recapitulation.
Whites.....	57
Colored.....	98

Whole number..... 155

or nearly two colored to one white.

Ninety-eight colored pay of taxes.....	$143 74
One colored paying.....	83 35

Hence ninety-seven colored pay.....	$60 39 or less than seventy cents each.

Fifty-seven whites pay.....	$491 49
Eleven conservative whites pay.....	194 43

Hence forty-six whites pay.....	$297 06
or less than seven dollars each.

"Of these fifty-seven white members twenty-four pay no taxes at all. Of these ninety-eight colored members sixty-seven pay no taxes at all.

"With regard to the State government: the officers consist of seven whites and one colored; the colored man having the paid office of least profit.

As to taxes:

The Governor pays.....	$00 00
The Secretary of State.....	00 00
The Comptroller General.....	00 00
The Treasurer.....	00 00
The Attorney General.....	00 00
The Superintendent of Education.....	00 00
The Lieutenant Governor.....	15 99
The Adjutant and Inspector General.....	1 00

Making..... $16 99

"Thus the eight members of the State corps of officers pay on an average each $2 11."

Mr. President, I ask if the Senate of the United States will receive a State into this Union on a constitution thus formed and a government thus instituted? It was "taxation without representation" that produced in a great degree the war of our independence; it was one of the great burdens and evils complained of by our fathers that they were taxed without representation; but here in this Government we have not only the people taxed without representation, but we have this grievance doubly intensified by having representation virtually without taxation. Could there be a more flagrant wrong upon any free people than we impose by accepting this constitution and form of government? In these southern States, according to their constitutions, the emancipated slaves are entitled to suffrage. They are more numerous in some than the white population; while in all many of the whites are disfranchised.

If I understood the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON,] he said that intelligence was necessary for self-government as well as for political government. Now, I ask where is the intelligence upon which this constitution of South Carolina is based? Where is the intelligence that elected her Legislature, composed principally of the recently emancipated slaves? I have always been taught to believe that no republican Government could exist unless it was predicated upon the intelligence and virtue of the people. These negroes have had no opportunity to become intelligent. They were born and reared in ignorance, uneducated, unlettered, superstitious, and credulous, and I would almost be inclined to assert that one half of them never heard the word "loyalty" or the word "Union" until they were told when these elections were about to be held. Why, sir, what do they know of the constituents of a republican Government? What about the coordinate departments of Government? the checks and balances that regulate a republic. They comprehend nothing in this respect, and in their present condition are unable to understand even the elementary principles of a republican Government; and yet we are to admit a State founded by ignorance, not by intelligence. I know that "liberty and loyalty" is a favorite theme with some gentlemen here; but are they alone a sufficient foundation for a republic? These people have no intelligence, not sufficient at least to engage in the formation of a constitution or of ordinary legislation. What is our practice when we alter a constitution of one of our State governments? Is it not to elect the most intelligent men in the community, gentlemen of experience and of some political distinction, who have a knowledge of the nature and the workings and operations of government; but here we have a constitution formed by men who could not, perhaps, spell the word "constitution," and who know nothing of the rudiments of a constitution.

To show that these people are ignorant, and known to be so, let me read an extract from a recent number of the New York Tribune:

"Republicans in all the States had better make up their minds at once that there cannot be two policies in the party at once, one for the North and one for the South. We cannot give the ignorant millions of freedmen in the rebel States the ballot, and the same time refuse it to the educated thousands in the North. If we attempt such a jugglery we shall find out that we have not cheated the negro, but ourselves."

I read this for the purpose of showing the opinion of one of the leading editors of this country, publishing, perhaps, one of the most influential papers, that these are "ignorant millions." Is it possible that we are to give to these "ignorant millions" the preponderance over the white race who own the land and other property of the South, and enable them to impose taxes without limitation. The committee from South Carolina, to whom I have alluded, have given in their appeal the items of taxes to be raised in that State. I will not trouble the Senate by going over the details, but will give the aggregate, which is $2,230,950. These gentlemen say:

"The late assessment of real estate throughout the State, city, town, and country, is $7,507,075, on which a tax levied of three per cent, will raise $2,115,212. If real estate owners are to defray the expenses of the State, it will require more than three per cent. to meet them. Formerly it was about one half per cent., and that, too, when lands and real estate in general had not depreciated in value."

Shall we, by the adoption of this bill, commit the whole property of that State, valued at $70,000,000, and the taxes of the State, amounting to $2,000,000, into the hands of these men who pay no taxes comparatively—many of whom pay none absolutely—and who therefore have no interest but to increase taxation and expenditures?

But upon what ground do we give to these people the elective franchise? Is it for their benefit? I have always understood that when a franchise of any sort was bestowed, it was intended for the advantage of the persons upon whom it was conferred. But is the elective franchise conferred upon these negroes who do not understand it, for their benefit and advantage, when they have not the qualifications to exercise it? It cannot be bestowed on them for such a purpose, because they cannot appreciate nor properly enjoy it. But is it conferred on them as a punishment of others? If that be the object of it, I submit whether there is any constitutional power to punish any portion of the people of a State by giving the elective franchise to those who are not worthy of it?

We ought to confine ourselves as closely to the Constitution as we can; and upon that subject I have a very high authority which I will read to the Senate. It is a speech made on the 7th of March, 1860, by the Senator from Ohio who now occupies the Chair, in answer to a speech made by Mr. Toombs of Georgia. The debate was as to the right to carry property into the Territories. The Senator from Ohio said:

"Take another case, one that is, perhaps, likely to occur a little sooner. Suppose Brigham Young should come from the State of Utah and bring with him his forty wives, and the State has a law that a man shall have but one wife. Brigham says 'These are my property; yea, more than my property; yea, they are forty ribs taken out of my body while I slept; I must bring them in here, or the State of Utah will not be on equal footing with the other States of the Union.' Away with such logic. There is no guarantee in the Constitution of the United States for such a position as that. Our safety, Mr. President, consists in keeping close to the Constitution. Whatever we claim let us find the direct warrant for it there, or the necessary implication to carry out some other power that is manifestly granted. The moment we go astray from this we are in the fog; we are in dispute; we endanger the harmony of our action; and it is done in this instance." In this great departure from the early principles of this Government you have involved portions of the nation in almost irretrievable hostility to each other. Let us go back to the Constitution and follow it."

That is the language of a statesman who has had opportunities to acquire a knowledge of the Constitution and its principles, and these are his doctrines: "Keep close to the Constitution." Never was better advice given by any statesman or patriot. The closer we keep to the Constitution the better for the country, for this Government, and for the States. "Whatever we claim, let us find the direct warrant for it there." I ask, where is the "direct warrant" for imposing these conditions on the southern States? Is there any warrant in the power to admit new States or in the clause relative to the guarantee of a republican form of Government? Is there any power anywhere in the Constitution of the United States to authorize such an assumption of authority as prescribing conditions to a free and sovereign State?

"The moment we go astray from this we are in the fog; we are in dispute; we endanger the harmony of our action, and it is done in this instance."

Nothing truer was ever said. The very moment we depart from the Constitution that very moment we are in the fog; the ship of State cannot be steered safely into harbor, but our only safety is in keeping "close to the Constitution."

As I have stated, negroes cannot properly be associated with the whites in the governments of the States or in the General Government. They are of a different race, and their incorporation into government will not produce harmony and concord. Let me read further from the same speech of the Senator from Ohio:

"There is one thing more that I will say before I sit down: but what I am now about to propose is not part and parcel of the Republican platform, that I know of. There is in these United States a race of men who are poor, weak, uninfatuated, incapable of taking care of themselves. I mean the free negroes, who are despised by all, repudiated by all; outcasts upon the face of the earth without any fault of theirs that I know of; but they are the victims of a deep-rooted prejudice, and I do not stand here to argue whether that prejudice be right or wrong. I know such to be the fact. It is there immovable. It is perfectly impossible that these two races can inhabit the same place and be prosperous and happy. I see that this species of population are just as abhorrent to the southern States, and perhaps more so than to the North; many of those States are now, as I think, passing most unjust laws to drive these men off or to subject them to slavery; they are flocking now into the free States, and we have objections to them. Now, the proposition is, that this great Government owes it to justice, owes it to those individuals, owes it to itself and to the free white population of the nation, to provide a means whereby this class of unfortunate men may emigrate to some congenial clime, where they may be maintained, to the mutual benefit of all, both white and black. This will insure a separation of the races. Let them go into the tropics. There, I understand, are vast tracts of the most fertile and inviting lands, in a climate perfectly congenial to that class of men, where the negro will be predominant; where his nature seems to be improved, and all his faculties, both mental and physical, are fully developed, and where the white man degenerates in the same proportion as the black man prospers. Let them go there; let them be separated; it is easy to do it."

That was in 1860, and what was true then is true in 1868. He said that it was "impossible that these two races can inhabit the same place and be prosperous and happy;" that they are "as abhorrent to the southern States, perhaps more so, than to the North;" "they are the victims of a deep-rooted prejudice;" "it is there immovable." If this deep-rooted prejudice exists, if it is ineradicable, if the two races cannot live together prosperously and happily, I ask how they can live together when they participate in the same Government, with the same rights and privileges? If they cannot live together in an inferior state when this prejudice exists how can they live together amicably, prosperously, and happily when they are to have equal power with the white population? Is it not absurd to suppose that they can get along peaceably and harmoniously when enjoying those equal rights and privileges, when there is this deep-rooted prejudice of which the Senator truly spoke?

But I have heard it said that these States are to be admitted because their loyal inhabitants have asked for their admission, that they have complied with the requisitions of Congress by forming constitutions and electing State Legislatures, that these loyal citizens of the South now come and ask for admission. When did the negroes of the South become loyal? Was it during the war? Did they not labor to support not only the armies of the rebellion, but the families of those who were engaged in it? They knew nothing about loyalty except to their owners. They were loyal to them, and labored with industry and fidelity, and by their efforts the armies of the South were partially sustained. How, then, can it be said that these are loyal people now when they were neither loyal nor disloyal during the war; or if they had any loyalty, it was to the South.

Mr. President, a great responsibility devolves upon the Congress of the United States in reference to the matter under consideration. Perhaps no subject ever was presented to any deliberative body of such magnitude and involving such momentous consequences as this. It affects, or may affect the interests, the lives, and the property of millions of persons; and the consequences will be with this Congress. Daniel Webster was once asked what was the greatest thought of which the human mind had ever conceived, and his reply was "individual responsibility." It reaches through the past, comprehends the present, and in its consequences may extend into the future. That responsibility is now upon the Senate of the United States and cannot be avoided; neither can it be divided. It is indivisible in its nature. Every Senator who supports this measure will be answerable for the full and aggregate amount and weight of the responsibility which will grow out of it if it shall prove disastrous and appalling.

In my opinion this subject rises infinitely higher than all party considerations. It is one of such a character that party spirit ought not to approach it. It is a great constitutional question, such as no country ever had to consider. We can get no precedent from the history of other countries and none from the annals of our own; but we are to act upon it according to the lights we have before us and in view of its tremendous import and immensity.

I contend that this bill ought to be postponed, because it cannot be a permanent measure. It is impossible in the nature of things that it can produce peace, harmony, and prosperity in the South. I suppose no Senator who looks at it can fairly conclude that this measure can be permanent in its character and productive of happy and fortunate results. I know the question is a troublesome one to Congress, and I have no doubt they are anxious to dispose of it. I am as anxious as any member of the Senate; but when it is disposed of let it be once and forever. Who will answer for the consequences that may follow if a conflict should ensue between the races if we pass this bill? Senators, it is not a permanent measure; it is not one fraught with good, but it may be laden with evil. I hope it is not. I earnestly hope that it may redound to the interests of my country; but I can see nothing but trouble, strife, and calamity before us if it is forced upon the South. You had better defer it until a more auspicious period.

Deal not harshly with these people. If we attempt to bring them again into political and personal fellowship, let us do it with fraternal affection and interest, and not in a manner calculated to embitter that relation and to keep alive the remembrance of the dreadful conflict through which they have passed. Let us not extend the right arm of friendship and invite them to our embrace, and at the same moment denounce them as rebels and traitors—words which were opprobriously applied to our fathers who won our independence, and which can never be used to promote unity and concord. We have decided by the wager of battle that we cannot be separated, but that we have a common country, Constitution, and destiny; and have been joined together by political ties which can never be broken; should we not resolve to live in unity and peace?

Let us remember that these brethren of the South have passed through ordeals of fire and sword; of blood, havoc, and ruin; their brightest jewels have been destroyed and lost; their fondest hopes blighted and gone; husbands, sons, wives, and daughters involved in a common calamity; that the passions have been lashed by events into the fury of the whirlwind, and hate and anger inflamed by the torch and ravages of war; that want and suffering have succeeded plenty and luxury; poverty, humiliation, and sorrow have entered the households where competency and comfort and happiness held sway. Let the softening hand of time be laid upon that unhappy and desolated country. Let the passions and animosities engendered by the war have time to ebb and subside, and at a season not far distant these people will be able to accommodate themselves to their new condition, and return in peace and unite harmoniously with the Congress of the United States, under constitutions framed by themselves, in that spirit of justice and liberality which the progress and spirit of the age will prompt and justify, and which will place them upon terms of perfect equality and dignity with the other States of the Union.

SENATE.

Representation in Congress—Mr. Willey.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Representation in Congress.

SPEECH OF HON. W. T. WILLEY, OF WEST VIRGINIA,
IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
June 9, 1868.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1053) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress—

Mr. WILLEY said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: It was not without some reluctance that I rose yesterday evening to claim the courtesy of the Senate to make some remarks upon the amendment immediately pending as well as the bill generally. I am aware of the impatience of the Senate, and equally aware of the fact that I shall not be able to throw any new light on the subject; but inasmuch as I do not trouble the Senate very often I thought perhaps I might be allowed to occupy its attention for a few moments, if to accomplish no other purpose, at least to let my constituents know once in a while that I am here in my place.

In regard to the immediate proposition before the Senate, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] proposing to include Alabama in the bill, I have to say that in voting for it I am not at all embarrassed by my previous opinions on the provision in the reconstruction bill requiring a majority of the registered votes to be cast at the election. When that bill was under consideration I took occasion to say, among other things:

"The amendment of the House, it seems to me, settles the question of reconstruction under this bill; that is to say, it settles the question by leaving the States as they are. From what I know of southern sentiment, and what I know of the condition of affairs in the South, I believe most sincerely that the bill in the form in which it comes from the House will result in nothing. I do not believe that you can get a majority of the registered voters in the South upon the adoption of the constitution which will be presented to them to vote upon it either on the one side or the other."

And I concluded my remarks on that subject as follows:

"The bill, if passed as it is, settles the question, not of reconstruction, but of non-reconstruction. You will have no practical relations restored to the government of the southern States under the operations of this bill, in my opinion."

I do not pretend to be a prophet, nor the son of a prophet; but the result has verified my opinion exactly. The only State which undertook to restore its practical relations and to entitle itself to representation in Congress under the operation of that bill as it passed failed in the effort, and Congress, under the teachings of experience, found it necessary to repeal that restrictive law and to allow the rebel States to come back to representation in Congress under the operation of the ordinary principles prevailing in elections. I am not, therefore, embarrassed in voting for the pending amendment by the necessity of any change of opinion, although that would not embarrass me if I thought circumstances required a change.

Now, Mr. President, what was the design of having an election in Alabama upon the constitution? What fact was it proposed to ascertain by submitting the constitution to the vote of the people? It was to ascertain whether the constitution was agreeable to a majority of the people of that State. I might confine the proposition within a more limited application if I were to consult my own sense of propriety as to how that constitution ought to have been submitted. I think all we are required to ascertain, in order to justify ourselves in the action now proposed, is whether a majority of the loyal people in the State of Alabama have given evidence that the constitution which was presented to them is agreeable to them and meets their approbation.

Let us look at the facts surrounding this case with a view of ascertaining the main fact to which I allude; that is, does the constitution, as it was presented a few months ago to the people of Alabama, meet the wishes of the majority of those people? I shall not weary the Senate by entering into the figures and details, and recounting what has been so often recapitulated here; but there is one material fact admitted on all hands, that this election was held under most unfavorable circumstances in respect to the weather at that time. A severe storm had passed over the State; the waters were high; and it was with great difficulty that the people could get to the voting places. That is one fact that must be taken into consideration. There is another fact: that in two counties, I think, no vote at all was taken. There is another fact: in two more counties in which the vote was taken the vote was set aside and not counted.

But there still remains the great fact which I predicted would prevent any election under the act requiring a majority of registered votes to be cast at the time of its passage, and that is, the hostility of a large proportion of the people of Alabama and of the southern States to any constitution, to any reconstruction, to any plan, or to any principle that will bring them back into submission to the Constitution of the United States and into loyal practical relations to the General Government; and the result verified my prediction exactly. I knew very well, when it was required that a majority of the registered votes in Alabama should be cast in order to the ratification of the constitution which should be submitted to them, that the disloyal portion of the people of Alabama, who compose to a large extent the intelligent portion of them, who embrace the controlling social influence of Alabama to a very great extent, would stay away from the polls, and that it would be understood that they should stay away from the polls, and it being thereby known that every man who deposited his ballot was depositing it in favor of reconstruction the men who did so would feel that they were marked by the intellectual and moral influences alluded to the other day by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] and this moral and intellectual influence being brought to bear upon them, thousands upon thousands of honest, loyal, patriotic white men would be deterred from casting their votes. Is not such the fact, sir? Were not thousands who were willing, and who else had been able to cast their votes in favor of the constitution, deterred from doing so by fear, by menace, by this social influence? There can be no question about that. And yet, sir, under all these adverse influences, under the hindrances of the bad weather and the high streams, notwithstanding the fact that several counties did not cast a vote at all and the vote of others were not counted, and notwithstanding the menaces and threats that were brought to bear upon a large proportion of the people of that State, they nevertheless cast a vote in favor of this constitution of sixty-nine thousand.

Now, sir, recurring again to the proposition which I have stated, which was that the principal fact that it was desirable to ascertain on the part of the Senate, was whether a majority of the people of the State of Alabama were in favor of the constitution as presented to them, I demand of any Senator here to answer candidly whether, from all these considerations, it is not perfectly apparent that at the day of the election, and at this day, an overwhelming majority, not only of the loyal people of Alabama, but of all the people, both loyal and disloyal, were in favor, and are in favor of the constitution which was submitted to them. That was the only fact that it was necessary for us to ascertain. It was to ascertain that fact that the constitution was submitted to the people; and if there can be no doubt that such is the fact, that a majority of the people of Alabama are in favor of this constitution, why should we hesitate about including them in the bill admitting all these States to representation in Congress?

It is said it will be acting in bad faith to do this. Bad faith with whom, Mr. President? Bad faith with men who purposely stayed away from the polls; bad faith with men who refused to avail themselves of the privilege and right of voting for or against the constitution; bad faith with men who used their social, moral, and physical influence to deter honest, simple-minded Union men from casting their votes in favor of this constitution? Sir, if there was any obligation of good faith on the part of Congress to those men, we are absolved from it by the bad faith of the other party in attempting to prevent a fair election, which they did prevent, and which every member of the Senate must acknowledge they did prevent. Therefore, I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; and am ready and anxious to recognize Alabama as again entitled to representation here, and to all the rights and privileges of one of the United States.

Now, sir, while I am up, I propose, if the Senate will indulge me, to submit a few remarks in regard to the principle of the bill generally. I am aware that every Senator's opinion is made up upon it, but there have been some objections made to it, and there are some considerations connected with it that I propose to detain the Senate a few moments in noticing.

Mr. President, several Senators have deemed it proper, as they had a right to do, to go back into the records of the past to bring up in judgment against other Senators the opinions and expressions of opinions entertained and made in times past, two or three or five years ago. Sir, there is in one of the inimitable romances of Sir Walter Scott—Guy Mannering I think it is—a most admirable character called the Pedagogue. It so happened that while he had charge of the young child of a Scottish nobleman some smugglers along the coast abducted the child and carried him away, and he was lost among the gypsies, and eventually got over to the East Indies and into the British army. In the arrangements of Providence—the providence of the tale at least—some twenty-five years afterward he found himself in the vicinity of his old home. He was recognized by his friends and the remaining members of the family, and at last by this honest-hearted, simple-minded old pedagogue, who had taught him his letters in his infancy. The manifestation of his joy was a little remarkable. After the truth had gradually revealed itself to him that this stalwart man, this sunburnt soldier from the Indies was the veritable little boy that he used to lead by the hand, he drew him again to his knee, and opening the primer at the very place where he left off twenty-five years previous attempted to teach him his lesson as of old.

And now, sir, after the revolution of the past few years, we have a good many pedagogues. The foundations of society as they existed six years ago have been utterly broken up, and there is a new surface of political affairs, requiring new adaptations of our policies; and it would be just as foolish and as ludicrous to attempt to apply now policies that were proper and right five years ago as it was for that simple-minded schoolmaster to attempt to teach the young man of thirty years his a b abs. Sir, we must have new policies. There must be a new adaptation of things. There is great wisdom in the old maxim that "circumstances alter cases;" and what was proper a year ago is highly improper now, highly impolitic now, and it would be unwise to embarrass ourselves by a foolish sense of consistency in adhering to obsolete and impracticable ideas, when in point of fact we would only be inconsistent if we did so under the different state of circumstances that surround us.

The debate for a few days past, the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. VICKERS] yesterday, and the remarks of my friend from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY], have revived the questions of the constitutional authority and propriety of the reconstruction bills upon which the pending bill is predicated. I shall not enter into an argument on those questions, but I desire to submit a few facts as illustrative of the state of the case in reference to them, if not for the Senate, at least for the country.

Mr. President, the issue to-day involved in this bill and dividing the Senate is between the reconstruction policy of the President of the United States and that of Congress. That is the real antagonism of this debate. Let us look at the facts surrounding the case. I suppose, though I do not know whether I should not err in the supposition, that there is hardly a Senator here who would say that the confederate governments in the southern States existing at the time of Lee's surrender and of the overthrow of the rebellion had any legal validity; and yet I doubt whether Senators can make their arguments thoroughly logical unless they trace them back to the acknowledgment of the fact that these governments existing at the time of the collapse of the rebellion were in some form or sort legal governments, to be recognized at least as de facto. To such Senators who are disposed to follow the lead of Mr. Johnson a few facts from his record ought to settle that question, and I shall read them without any commentary. I refer first to an executive order, dated "Executive Chamber, Washington city, May 9, 1865." It will give the Senate and the country the views which the Executive at that time entertained of the validity of these southern State governments:

"Ordered, 1. That all acts and proceedings of the political, military, and civil organizations which have been in a state of insurrection and rebellion, within the State of Virginia, against the authority and laws of the United States, and of which Jefferson Davis, John Letcher, and William Smith were late the respective chiefs, are declared null and void," &c

So much for Virginia.

And again, carrying out the same views, we have the following dispatch from Major General Canby to Major General Warren, commanding the department of Mississippi, dated May 21, 1865:

"By direction of the President, you will not recognize any officer of the confederate or State government, within the limits of your command, as authorized to exercise in any manner whatever the functions of their late offices. You will prevent, by force, if necessary, any attempt of any of the Legislatures of the States in insurrection to assemble for legislative purposes, and will imprison any members or other persons who may attempt to exercise these functions in opposition to your orders."

Here is a complete repudiation of the legal validity of all the confederate State authorities existing at that time. But, sir, as I said just now, the real question at issue is between Mr. Johnson's system of reconstruction in the southern States and the congressional plan of reconstruction; and the congressional policy is objected to by Senators because they believe, as I suppose, that the existing State governments in the South as reorganized by Mr. Johnson are constitutional and valid, and that these governments in the southern States as thus organized through the Executive being so valid, legal, and constitutional, Congress has, therefore, no right to set them aside and institute others in their stead. Let us see how that is in the opinion of the President himself. I need hardly refer the Senate to dispatches which have been so often repeated here; but perhaps it will do no harm to recount them very briefly. I assert, therefore, that at the time of the institution of these governments in the southern States by the present Executive he had no idea that they were to be binding, valid, perpetual, legal governments; that at the time he instituted them he did so with the express understanding and reservation that they were to be submitted to the judgment of Congress and to the approval of Congress, in evidence of which fact you have the dispatch to W. L. Sharkey and the dispatch to William Marvin. Governor Sharkey having requested, under date of July 24, 1865, that military interference with the civil tribunals of that State might be prohibited, the President replied:

"The government of the State will be provisional only until the civil authorities shall be restored, with the approval of Congress. Meanwhile military authority cannot be withdrawn."

The dispatch to Governor Marvin was in these words:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, September 12, 1865.

SIR: Your excellency's letter of the 29th ultimo, with the accompanying proclamation, has been received and submitted to the President. The steps to which it refers, toward reorganizing the government of Florida, seem to be in the main judicious, and good results from them may be hoped for. The presumption to which the proclamation refers, however, in favor of insurgents who may wish to vote, and who may have applied for, but not received, their pardons, is not entirely approved. All applications for pardons will be duly considered, and will be disposed of as soon as may be practicable. It must, however, be distinctly understood that the restoration to which your proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress.

I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

His Excellency WILLIAM MARVIN.

But there are some other facts that have a bearing upon this aspect of the subject. I allude to the manner in which the President has regarded these States after they were thus instituted by him, to show that by his own action he repudiated their authority, their binding force, and their validity as State governments independent of Executive control or of congressional control. I refer you to an instance, perhaps forgotten by Senators; when General Terry, then in command at the city of Richmond, set aside an act of the Virginia Legislature, called "the vagrant act." General Terry undertook, upon his military authority, to set that act aside. From his order in the premises an appeal was made, and a delegation was sent to Washington, and an interview was had with the President. The order of General Terry was in these words:

"It is, therefore, ordered that no magistrate, civil officer, or other person, shall, in any way or manner, apply or attempt to apply the provisions of said statute to any colored person in this department."

This was in contravention of an act of the Legislature of Virginia passed under the reconstruction policy of Mr. Johnson, and when the matter was laid before Mr. Johnson he overruled the petitioners' application and allowed General Terry's order to stand.

Again, we all know that when the pirate Semmes was elected a probate judge at Mobile, and the matter was brought to the notice of the Executive at Washington, he immediately telegraphed orders that Semmes should be ousted from office, and designated a military officer, to act as judge of probate in Mobile in his stead.

Why, sir, the history of the past few years is full of instances corroborating the same fact. As late as July, 1866, General Grant, then under authority of the President, his Commander-in-Chief, issued the following sweeping order in reference to the authority of these State governments in all the southern States:

[General Orders, No. 44.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE.

WASHINGTON, July 6, 1866.

Department, district, and post commanders in the States lately in rebellion, are hereby directed to arrest all persons who have been or may hereafter be charged with the commission of crimes and offenses against officers, agents, citizens, and inhabitants of the United States, irrespective of color, in cases where the civil authorities have failed, neglected, or are unable to arrest and bring such parties to trial, and to detain them in military confinement until such time as a proper judicial tribunal may be ready and willing to try them.

A strict and prompt enforcement of this order is required.

By command of Lieutenant General Grant:
F. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Such was the manner in which the President of the United States regarded the authority of these State governments which he set up in the South; and which he and Senators who sustain him now desire us to recognize as legal and as beyond the reach and control of congressional legislation.

But there is another objection alleged to this bill now pending that I may notice in passing. My friend sitting by my side [Mr. SAULSBURY] claims these southern States being States in the Union, we have no authority to impose upon them any fundamental conditions in the restoration of representation; in fact, denied that we had any authority in the premises to impose any conditions whatsoever, as I understood him. Now, what kind of a record does his leader, the President of the United States, exhibit in the premises? The plan of the President is the antagonistic plan.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. WILLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. When I am to be the follower of any man, Mr. President, I beg leave to say to my honorable friend, I wish to have some voice in the choice of my leader. I cannot consent that the Republican party, of which the Senator is a member, shall select a leader for me. Four years ago the party to which he belongs, with his hearty approval, took the present President of the United States as its second great leader, and commended him to the people of the United States. I did not accept him as a leader then; I do not choose to have him imposed upon me as a leader now by the honorable gentleman. But I will say that when he seeks to do injustice to his own leader, believing his leader to be honest in his present policy and in the course which he is pursuing, a sense of justice prompts me to vindicate the character of that distinguished leader of the gentleman against his own assaults.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, in assigning my friend to a position under the leadership of Mr. Johnson, I merely designed to designate the fact, which I do not understand him to deny, that he is following in his footsteps; that he is a friend of his policy—especially of his policy in regard to what is called the reconstruction of the late rebellious States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. One word more, and I will not interrupt the Senator again. As to being the friend of the President of the United States, I was his personal friend before he was President; I am his personal friend still. I believe him to be an honest man, a patriot, and acting with an eye single to the good of his country. But if the Senator will observe the speech which I made on this floor this winter on the subject of reconstruction, I dissented from the policy of the President or the basis of authority which he claimed for his plan of reconstruction, while also dissenting from the plan or the basis of authority of the plan of the Congress of the United States. I hold, as I held then, that the guaranty clause of the Constitution gave no authority to the President of the United States or to Congress to intervene in regard to these southern States; that they were States in the Union before what you call the rebellion; that they were States in the Union during that rebellion; that they were States in the Union subsequent to that rebellion; that the constitutions which they had previous to the rebellion were valid constitutions; that the constitutions under which they lived during the rebellion were valid, subsisting constitutions of a government de facto, to which the people owed obedience, and by which they could be punished in case of disobedience; and that the governments which they formed subsequent to the termination of the war were valid and subsisting governments; in other words, that they never have been, since they have been in the Union, without valid, subsisting, obligatory governments upon them, to which their obedience was due; and I cited authorities, both from English and American law, to show that such had been the recognized doctrine for hundreds of years past.

Mr. WILLEY. I understand the Senator, then, to say that the State governments to which Mr. Johnson, in his proclamation which I read of May 9, 1865, in which he said—

"That all acts and proceedings of the political, military, and civil organizations which have been in a state of insurrection and rebellion, within the State of Virginia, against the authority and laws of the United States, and of which Jefferson Davis, John Letcher, and William Smith were late the respective chiefs, are declared null and void."

I understand the Senator to say that those governments are not null and void, but that to-day they are the State governments on the basis of which Congress should recognize them, and they are the governments on the basis of which we should restore their practical relations to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do say that while those State governments were in existence, in so far as they were not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, they were valid and subsisting governments; that they regulated all the title to property and gave all the security to life and to person; that they were valid subsisting de facto governments so far as they were not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WILLEY. Why, Mr. President, they were set up from the beginning to the end as utterly repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, as in utter defiance of the Constitution of the United States; and these men referred to by the President, who were at their head, Jefferson Davis and Governor Smith, whom the logic of the Senator would recognize as the legal, proper officers of the valid and subsisting governments, were the men who had sworn to support the governmental organizations set up to overthrow that of the United States. If that be the view of the Senator, I leave him to entertain it, and to answer to the country for it. I shall not detain the Senate by pausing to controvert a proposition so monstrous; a proposition which thousands upon thousands of our fellow-citizens laid down their lives on many a battle-field to denounce and to deny. It is nothing less than a recognition of the rebellion, and a setting up here to-day, two or three years after the standard of the rebellion has fallen, that that standard was a legal standard and ought to be recognized by the Senators of the United States here in their places. Sir, the people of this country will tolerate no such doctrine. It is abhorrent to every sentiment of the loyal heart. The blood of the Senator's own fellow-citizens, shed in defense of the contrary doctrine, cries this day from the ground against a proposition so monstrous and so abhorrent to the feelings of every patriotic heart.

But, sir, this is going aside from the line of remark which I was following. I only intended to invite the attention of Senators who deny the authority to impose the conditions on which the bill under discussion proposes to admit representatives from the States mentioned in it, and who, nevertheless, are the champions and defenders of the State governments now existing in said States, as organized by Mr. Johnson, to some very prominent facts which I think are worthy of their consideration. Let us see how these States were reorganized by Mr. Johnson. Now, let us see what Mr. Johnson himself did about imposing fundamental conditions. One of the objections to this bill is that it undertakes to impose fundamental conditions upon the States; that they shall not be restored to representation except on certain conditions prescribed in the act itself. Sir, is it possible that Congress has no right to impose conditions, and yet that the President, who has no legislative power, and, as I think, had no authority whatever in law to set up these southern State governments, has the power to impose fundamental conditions. Let us see what the President did in the premises. Here is a dispatch to Mr. Johnson, provisional governor of Georgia, dated Washington, October 28, 1865, to which I ask the attention of Senators:

Provisional Governor of Georgia:

Your several telegrams have been received. The President of the United States cannot recognize the people of any State as having resumed the relations of loyalty to the Union that admits as legal obligations contracted or debts created in their name to promote the war of the rebellion.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

WASHINGTON, October 28, 1865.

He imposed this condition. He did not call it a fundamental condition, but the terms in which he proposed it made it fundamental. It is a condition without a compliance with which he told them plainly the State could not come back into practical relations with the Government, and be restored again to its condition as a State. But, sir, that was not all. In his communication to Governor Marvin, under date of September 12, 1865, he concluded his dispatch, as follows:

"It must, however, be distinctly understood that the restoration to which this proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress."

He makes our approval a fundamental condition. Then again, in a dispatch to Governor Perry, under date of November 6, 1865, among other things, he says:

"The President considers the acceptance of the amendment by South Carolina as indispensable to a restoration of her relations with the other States of the Union."

That was the thirteenth constitutional amendment. This bill has been denounced by Senators on this floor because it requires these States, before they shall be entitled to representation on this floor to adopt the fourteenth constitutional amendment; and this objection comes from the apologists of the President and the men who declare that his system of reconstruction is valid and right and legal to-day and ought not to be overthrown; and yet Mr. Johnson himself made the very condition which this bill makes, requiring the rebel States to adopt as a fundamental condition to his favor and acceptance the thirteenth constitutional amendment.

But, sir, I have been carried off at much greater length into these matters than I intended. My main object in rising was to notice some objections urged against the bill under consideration, which I will now proceed to do in a very brief manner.

One of the objections to the congressional plan of reconstruction, and to this bill, which is the capstone and completion of that plan, is that it disfranchises a part of the white men of the southern States, and thus punishes them by an ex post facto law, and that such a punishment under the circumstances is cruel in the extreme and in opposition to the genius of our institutions and the spirit of our Constitution. It strikes me that this is a total misapprehension of the purpose of this disfranchisement. Its purpose is not punishment. It does not look to the past. It has reference alone to the future. It is true it may be punitive in its effect; it may hurt. If my hand were lacerated and it became necessary to amputate it that my life might be saved, and if a surgeon were to say so, and perform the operation, it would not be for the purpose of hurting me, for the purpose of punishment, although it would be a severe punishment; it would hurt me severely; the object would be to save my life. That is the sole object of this restriction; that is the sole object of this disfranchisement. Here are men proposed to be temporarily disfranchised who have shown themselves faithless in the past; here are men who went out of these Halls with the oath of fidelity to the Constitution of the United States warm on the altar of their hearts, and the breath hardly dry from their lips on the Bible, to lift up the arms of rebellion against the Government that had nurtured and cherished them; and these men are seeking a reintroduction into the body-politic. If they perjured themselves to destroy the Government in times past, ought they to be trusted without restriction in the future? Does not every motive of expediency, to say nothing of every principle of justice, require that the custodians of the liberties of this country should look well to it that there should be some guaranties that will protect the country from the treachery of these men by introducing them again into the body-politic, into the political power of the country? Sir, we are required by every principle of expediency not to punish these men for what they have done—that is not the object of this restriction and disfranchisement, but to take care that they shall not have the opportunity to betray us again by abusing political power that might be intrusted to their hands.

Then there is another objection relied on, to which I beg leave to allude for a moment; and that is the objection of negro suffrage. I am not here to say that there are not difficulties connected with this question; I do not pretend to say that there are not; and especially difficulties connected with universal, unlimited negro suffrage. I appreciate those difficulties; but, sir, let us look at the surrounding facts. The negroes are here in this country, and we cannot prevent it. They are free, and we cannot prevent it; and I hope there is no Senator who would desire to prevent it if he could. What is to be done? They must be either enfranchised or not. There may be difficulties connected with their enfranchisement. But these are not the only difficulties. Now, what is the part of wisdom? What should be done in view of all the surroundings? You say there will be danger in enfranchising them. You say, among other things, that the result will be a conflict of races, which must necessarily ensue. Is there not more danger from their being unenfranchised? Will there not more likely be collision because they are not enfranchised? Will there not be more danger from three or four million men, increasing yearly in our country, under the light of our institutions, under the liberalizing influences of our laws, reading daily that there ought to be no taxation without representation, reading our bills, reading our laws, reading our political textbooks, associating with freemen, drinking in the spirit of liberty, existing in our midst deprived of the franchise, than there will be in extending it to them, at least in some prudent manner? Sir, this will be the danger of collision if there is any collision in this country.

But why should there be a collision? Who is to bring about this collision? Is it the negro? Who ever heard of a race in any country so inferior as the negroes are, numerically and in every other way, being the aggressors? No, sir; the fact is that if we have a conflict it will be a conflict brought on by the proud, overbearing Anglo-Saxon seeking to trample the weaker race under his feet. The conflict will come from the white men if it come at all. The negro, at least, has discretion and sense enough to know that in such a conflict, brought on by himself, the white man must triumph. We have these difficulties to meet on either hand. But between the two kinds of difficulties which shall we select? I have indicated that, in my opinion, we would be more likely to encounter less danger by enfranchising the negro; and I am the more led to this conclusion because enfranchisement is more consistent with the spirit of our institutions, and with the spirit of human liberty and eternal justice and equity. A policy extending equality of political rights to a race ought to be less dangerous than a policy withholding it. Is the principle than all just government is founded on the consent of the governed less applicable to the black man than to the white man?

Mr. President, look at the matter. Here, for instance, are two men—I am now speaking not figuratively, because I have the men in my mind. Here is a farmer; he has one hundred acres of land; he is an industrious, sober citizen; he works on the highways; he pays his tax; he yields a ready obedience to all the laws of his country. He sent some of his sons to aid in suppressing the late rebellion, one of whom remains sleeping in death on the field of battle. Here is another man, also a farmer, in about similar circumstances. He has not quite so much land; he had no son to send to the field, but he is an obedient citizen; he renders obedience to all the laws of his country; he submits himself to all the obligations society imposes upon him. He is a white man; the other is a black man. Why should the white man have a vote and the black man not have a vote? They are equally intelligent, equally obedient to the laws, equally contribute to the welfare of the country, except that the black man contributes the life of a son to its defense and the white man contributes none. Why should one vote and not the other? In the name of common justice, in the name of liberty, in the name of all that is right, why should the extension of the right of suffrage to the black man necessarily bring on a bloody conflict between the races in this country?

I propose to notice another objection which has been mentioned to this bill; and that is the question of negro supremacy.

Mr. President, that is the cry; we hear it on the Senate floor; we hear it on the mountain sides; we hear it in the villages; we hear it in the cities, "negro supremacy." I am sorry to say that we hear it even from the lips of some Senators. "Negro supremacy!" What does that mean? Here we are the white race, thirty millions strong, having wealth and intelligence and the social and moral position. Here are a parcel of poor negroes with their arms still bearing the marks of the manacles of their bondage, just emancipated, comparatively ignorant, helpless, three or four millions strong; and the clamor is "negro supremacy;" "will you make the negro superior to the white man?" "Will you place the white man under the domination and government of the negro?" That is the cry. Why, sir; it is a senseless clamor. There is no propriety in it. It is an appeal to the passions of the unthinking multitude. It ought not to be addressed to an intelligent man. That is not the purpose of it. It is the clamor of the demagogue and nothing else. Negro supremacy in this country! It is utterly impossible that the thing should be. It never can be possible.

But, sir, I am happy to say that I have before me the argument of my honorable friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] the other day, fresh in our memory, who takes such a proper, statesmanlike, and national view of this subject that I propose to read it, that it may be incorporated in my remarks, and that it may go to my constituents, that the opinion of one of the leaders of the Democratic party in the Senate may be known, who is ashamed to reëcho the demagogue cry of "negro supremacy," and who boldly, manfully in his place in the Senate, tells the people of the United States what will be the probable result of negro enfranchisement in the southern States. Here it is:

"Mr. President, it is not upon any party ground or party considerations that I am opposed to the present bill; for, sir, were the bill to pass and become a law, and the people of the southern States—I refer to the intelligent white people of the southern States—should find themselves placed in a position where it would be necessary for them to exercise their intellectual and moral power, not only among their own race, but among the colored people of the South, I have no doubt what the result would be in the large majority of the southern States. That the intellect and moral power of the South will rule all races there when you come to the struggle is just as certain as the revolutions of the earth, as that water will find its level. The moral power and intellectual power which the white people possess in the South, my honorable friend from Massachusetts will find, will control the half-civilized negro element whenever they desire to do it. And there is a very noted case arising in the last election in the State of Georgia, in the most numerous negro district in that State, where the majority of the negroes was about seven thousand."

That, I think, is about the correct view of the case that I imagine will inevitably be the result to a considerable extent. Thus is dissipated by the judicious, philosophical, and very proper remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin—this idle apprehension of negro supremacy.

But, then, there is another objection made even more ridiculous than this; and that is the plan of social equality. Why, Mr. President, that is the silliest of all pretensions, the silliest of all objections. Social equality is not a matter to be adjusted by law. It is a matter of taste; it is a matter of choice; it cannot be enforced by any legislation; it always regulates itself. But then, sir, I have in my hand here the remarks of a negro bishop who recently went from this city as a delegate from the conference, then sitting here, of the Methodist Episcopal Zion church to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church recently convened in Chicago, with a message of fraternal regards, and with a proposition for a union of these two religious bodies; and I desire to commend to the Senate and to the country, on this question of the social relations of the races, the very appropriate and intelligent remarks of this black bishop, which ought to put to shame the men who are trying to excite popular prejudice by the constant cry of "social equality!" This black man said:

"I am here, therefore, for the purpose of ascertaining whether we can live together again. We have found no difficulty in living together as masters and slaves; let us hope in God's name that we shall find none in living together as freemen and as Christians. We ask for equality because, as members of the Christian church, as partakers of the Divine nature, we dare not, for the dignity of our Christian principles, ask anything less than equality. By that equality, we mean not, Mr. Chairman, to thrust ourselves upon you, nor to have you thrust yourselves upon us. We propose, sir, to walk into your parlors and sit down there as men when you invite us to do so, and we do not propose that you shall walk into our parlors and sit down there as men until we invite you."

Sir, that is worthy of our common manhood, and I hope it will be considered worthy of our approbation upon this floor.

Mr. President, to bring my remarks to a conclusion, because I had not intended to protract them to such length, why all this hostility to the negro; because after all it is hostility to the negro which constitutes the main objection to this bill and to all these reconstruction measures? What has he done to merit this perpetual denunciation? Is it his presence on this continent? Is that the reason of our hostility? Sir, he is not accountable for that; he came not here by his own consent, but was brought hither in chains, snatched from his own native shore by the guilty hand of our fathers. His emancipation is not his own act. If there were any guilt in that he is not accountable for it. The chains of slavery were struck from his limbs by our own act; by our own free act, not altogether free either, Mr. President, because we were rather constrained to do it that we might bring him to our aid in defending the Republic.

Is he ignorant? Is that a reason why we should denounce him? Why is he ignorant? How became he ignorant? Do we not know that almost every code in the southern States, (the provisions now, thank God, are obsolete,) until within a very few years past, contained inhibitions and penalties of the severest character for teaching the negro even his letters, for teaching him to read even the very record of his salvation? Do we not know that his ignorance is attributable to the white man who has held him in bondage and sold him as a beast in the shambles? Sir, his ignorance is not his reproach, but our shame. Is he humble? Is he helpless? Is he defenseless? Is that a reason why a magnanimous race should trample upon his rights? Should it not rather appeal to our magnanimity and our manhood? When the spirit of more enlightened civilization shall have dissipated these mists of error and prejudices of education the inexorable hand of history will write a terrible judgment against men who are disposed to trample upon the race simply because it is helpless and defenseless.

It strikes me, Mr. President, that instead of this unseemly vilification, this constant derision of the negro because he has crisp hair, because he has long heels, because he has a black skin, because he is in a degraded condition, the result of our own oppression, every principle of justice and every sentiment of honor and charity should impel us to give him all the aid we can in lifting him from his degraded condition, and giving him every support and encouragement, moral and intellectual, within our power. Why, sir, how was it a few years ago, when the issue of the life or death of this nation hung trembling in the balance? Was he then the despised being that gentlemen would represent him to be now? No, sir. Then one hundred and eighty thousand strong he rallied to the rescue of the Republic, and on a hundred fields of blood more than thirty thousand of this race yielded up their lives in battle or perished from disease in the hospitals in defense of the Republic. And how much we owe to the negro, whether in fact it was not the case that it was his additional aid that saved this nation, no man living can tell.

We hear often from the Senator from Wisconsin about the imbruted character of the negro, about his ignorance. Sir, let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin how long it has been since his own fellow-citizens, soldiers in the Army of the Republic, escaping from Salisbury and Andersonville and Libby, and a hundred prison dens in the South, dens of death, famishing soldiers of the Union, were eating the divided crust with the negro of the South, sleeping in his cabin while he stood sentinel at his door, piloted by him through the morasses, and guided around the sentinels of the enemy that they might escape to their homes or rejoin their regiments, and were sent on their way rejoicing by these black benefactors? And yet these are the men the Senator denounces and reviles and traduces here day after day as not entitled to the franchise, and not worthy of the confidence of the American people. Sir, there is another kind of slavery than that which degraded the negro; it is the slavery of passion, the slavery of education, the slavery of prejudice. Thank God, that slavery, too, is passing away; and the time is not far distant when, discarding these foolish ideas about negro supremacy and social equality, the American people will recognize the common, genuine manhood of the human brotherhood, and each of the races will take its proper position in the body-politic, and all will be well.

Mr. President, one other remark, and I have done, asking pardon of the Senate for having detained them thus long. We need the reconstruction of these States forthwith. Society in those southern States is disorganized. The industrial interests of the South are all perishing. The common prosperity of the Union, to say nothing of the South, demands a speedy restoration of these States to practical relations with the General Government. This may not be the best plan; but it is the plan presented. It is a plan which has been accepted by a majority of the people in the South. Why should we hesitate to receive them? Why this resistance, especially on the side of the Chamber that has been denouncing us for two years past because we have been keeping these States out of the Union? Now, when we present a plan which a majority of the people themselves in these States have accepted, why should these objections be raised in opposition? Sir, the peace of the whole country, the prosperity of the southern States and of the whole country demands a speedy restoration of these people to their ancient practical relations to this Government.

In conclusion let me say, Mr. President, in the language of a distinguished personage now attracting so much of public confidence and consideration, "Let us have peace"—the peace which this measure only can secure.

Internal Tax.

SPEECH OF HON. M. C. HUNTER,
OF INDIANA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 3, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes—

Mr. HUNTER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The tax bill presented by the Committee of Ways and Means regulating the internal revenue I regard of the highest importance, and its provisions should receive the most careful consideration from every member of this House. There is no subject in which our constituents are so much interested as in the subject of internal taxation, for revenues derived from that source must pay at least one half of all the expenses of this Government, and in the end liquidate a large portion of our public debt; and these revenues must be derived in a great measure from the luxuries of the country or they must come from the honest toil of the people. The question is from which shall they come; and for the answer we give to this question we shall each be held to a strict accountability. I for one answer from the luxuries, because when derived from that source their burden is not felt by the laboring men of this country; but when you have to go directly to the necessities of life, and place upon them taxes sufficient to raise the amount of internal revenue that will be required toward the support of this Government and the payment of our debt, you place upon the laboring men a burden that they are unable to bear, and one that will forever keep them ground to the earth.

Our present internal revenue law, as well as the system presented by this bill, I regard as vitally defective, for the reason that they proceed, in the main, upon the principle of preventing the whisky frauds by throwing guards and restrictions around its manufacture which are so cumbersome in their machinery and so difficult of execution that I fear all honest men will be deterred from engaging in the business; and even if they did, the system of identification of liquors is so defective that liquors upon which the tax has not been paid could be continually thrown upon the market without the proper means of detection, which would enable scoundrels who thus evade the law to undersell the honest manufacturer and break him down in his business, and the result would be a depleted Treasury and dishonest men made wealthy at the expense of the labor of the country.

What we want, then, to prevent these frauds and to collect our taxes upon whisky and tobacco, even under an honest administration—which I hope and believe our next will be—is a law so plain and simple in detail and so easy of execution that an honest man can manufacture and sell under it without fear of harm, and at the same time be so certain and severe in its punishment that even a thief will not dare to violate it. Such a law, in my judgment, can be made, and certainly the necessities of the times, as well as the interests of the laboring men of this country, require it, in order to save them from taxes that will otherwise have to be paid by them.

Not having time to discuss the provisions of this bill and point out what I regard as its defects, on account of its great length, I will only detain the committee by giving a brief outline of the kind of law we need, and one that, in my judgment, will collect the taxes we levy, unless the Executive should hinder and prevent its execution.

1. Every person or persons desiring to engage in the business of manufacturing liquors should be required to make an application in writing to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for that purpose, in which should be stated the kind of business proposed to be followed—whether distilling, redistilling, rectifying, fermenting, or brewing—accurately describing the premises on which such business is to be done, and stating about the amount of business to be done each year, in all cases the person or persons making the application to own in fee simple the premises described therein. If the application be approved by the Commissioner—which it should be, unless he is satisfied that the statements in the same are untrue—such person or persons named therein, before doing any business thereunder, should execute a bond, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of such Commissioner, in the penal sum of not less than $500 nor more than $50,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of all the duties required of him or them by law; which sureties should in all cases own in their own right unincumbered lands in the county where such place of business is situate of the full value of such bond, which bond should immediately be recorded, at the expense of such applicant or applicants, in the recorder's office in such county; and it should, from the date of its record, be a preference lien on all the lands in such county owned by the persons executing the same, such lands to be released by such Commissioner upon other and similar bond being executed, or when the business named in such application is discontinued, upon condition that such business had been honestly and fairly conducted, and not otherwise. Such approval, after the execution and recording of such bond, should authorize such person or persons making such application to carry on the business specified on the premises therein stated to the fullest extent asked for, providing the same be done according to law. The object of requiring the application to be made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is this: it enables the Commissioner to keep a record of all the authorized manufacturers of the various kinds of liquors, and insures to the Government good men to engage in the business, for rascals could not easily give such bond.

2. Such person or persons named in such application should at the close of each day be required to make out in triplicate written statements of the amount of liquors distilled, redistilled, rectified, fermented, or brewed that day; and at the close of each week, unless oftener required by such Commissioner, to deliver such daily statements to such inspector as such Commissioner should direct, to the correctness of which statements such person or persons should be sworn by such inspector, who should have power to administer oaths in such cases; and such person or persons should at the same time deliver to such inspector all of the liquors named in such daily statements, neatly put up in barrels or casks, each barrel or cask numbered, commencing with one and continuing regularly, as one, two, three, &c., as long as he or they should manufacture, so that no two should have the same number, and be neatly marked in plain letters and figures, as follows: first, the name of the manufacturer or manufacturers; second, the place and date of such manufacture; third, the kind, quality, and quantity of liquor contained in each. If such inspector should find the statements correct in form, and agreeing in every respect with the marks and brands on such casks or barrels, he should inspect the liquors and put such marks or brands on each barrel or cask as such Commissioner should require, and then make out his inspection report in triplicate, under seal such as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue should require, one copy of which inspection report he should deliver to such manufacturer or manufacturers; one copy, together with one copy of each of such daily reports he should on same day mail or deliver to the assistant assessor of such county or district where such liquors were made, and the other copy of his report, together with one copy of each of such daily statements he should upon the same day mail to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the other copies of such daily statements he should preserve, and record his own report in a book to be kept by him for that purpose.

3. Such liquors after their inspection should be safely stored on the premises where manufactured, or in a bonded warehouse to be provided by such manufacturer or manufacturers convenient thereto. And the collector of such district where such liquors are stored should be responsible for the tax on the same from and after their inspection, and for that reason the same should be kept under his charge, or the charge of such revenue storekeeper as he might designate, until the tax thereon should be paid or the same should otherwise be disposed of according to law; such liquors to be sold in the same packages in which they were inspected, the tax in all cases to be paid before removal, and the same to be removed within twenty-four hours after sale. In all cases of such sales bills of sale should be made out in triplicate by such storekeeper, and sealed with such seal as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue should require; such bills of sale should state the place and date of sale, the name of the person or persons to whom sold, and his or their place of residence, each article sold and price paid therefor, with an exact copy of all the marks and brands placed upon each by such manufacturer and inspector as required by law; one copy of which bill of sale should be delivered to the purchaser, one copy on same day mailed or delivered to the assistant assessor for such county or district where such liquors are stored, and the other copy on same day mailed to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Such liquors in no case to be sold by such collector or storekeeper who may have charge of the same except at the request of such manufacturer, and all money received for such liquors over and above the tax thereon should be paid to such manufacturer without any charges of any kind. No liquors to be placed in bond except by manufacturers, and the tax in all cases to be paid thereon before removal therefrom, except removals by manufacturers. The manner in which that shall be done I will next explain.

4. In case such manufacturer should desire to remove such liquors to any other bonded warehouse within the United States for sale before the tax should be paid thereon, he should first procure a permit therefor from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which permit should state each barrel or package to be removed, giving an exact copy of all the marks or brands on each, as in case of bill of sale, the bonded warehouse to which the same should be shipped, and the time within which the removal should be made. Such removal should not release the collector charged with the tax on such liquors until the same should be delivered in the bonded warehouse named in such permit and the proper collector of such district where such bonded warehouse is situate properly charged with the tax thereon by the assessor of such district. But such collector charged with the tax on liquors, which the manufacturer desires to remove without paying the tax thereon, as aforesaid, should have power before such removal to require bond of such manufacturer in double the amount of the tax on such liquors, with good freehold security, for the purpose of securing such collector in the amount of such tax in case such manufacturer failed to deliver such liquors in such bonded warehouse named in such permit within the time specified therein, and have the proper collector charged with the tax thereon.

5. All persons engaging in the business of selling liquors should be known as wholesale or retail liquor dealers; but the same person, firm, or company should not be both at the same time. Each, before engaging in business, should be required to make written application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for permission so to do, and to execute bond, and have the same recorded in like manner as manufacturers of liquors, which bond should in like manner be a lien and the lands be released therefrom, as provided in the case of manufacturers. No person but a wholesale dealer in liquors should be permitted to break a package of liquors and place the same in other packages for the purpose of sale; and in all cases where he should break any package and put the same in bottles, cans, jugs, kegs, or any other kind of vessel or package, he should on the same day remove all such liquors from such package so broken, and immediately thereafter by letter notify the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the assistant assessor of the county or collection district in which his place of business is situate of the fact of his having broken such package, and in what kind of vessels he had placed the same. And such wholesale dealer should place upon the outside of each of such bottles or other package in which such liquors were by him put a label securely attached thereto, on which label should be stated in plain letters and figures the number of the barrel or cask from which the same was taken, the name of the manufacturer, and the place where and date when manufactured, the quality and quantity therein, and the name of the wholesale dealer who did it.

In case such liquors should be put in bottles, they should hold at least one pint each; and all other packages in which such liquors should be placed should hold at least one gallon each. And such bottles, before sale, should be, by such wholesale dealer, put up in boxes or baskets of not less than one dozen in each. And upon the outside of such box or basket a label should be securely attached, upon which label should be stated, in plain figures and letters, the number of the barrel or cask from which such liquors were taken, the name of the manufacturer, the place where and the time when manufactured, the number of bottles contained within, and the quality and quantity of liquor in each bottle, and the name of the wholesale dealer who broke the original package. No wholesale dealer in liquors should ever sell, at one time, of bottled liquors less than one of such boxes or baskets, and in no case should he ever sell any other kind of package of liquors containing less than one gallon. And at each sale he should make out bills of sale in triplicate, under seal, such as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue should require. Such bills should state the place and date of sale, the name of the purchaser in full, and the place of his residence, the articles sold, and the price paid therefor; and opposite each article should be stated in full, all the marks, brands, figures, and letters thereon, as required to be placed there by law; and the same should then be signed by such wholesale dealer; one copy of which bill of sale should be delivered to the purchaser, one copy, on same day, should be by such wholesale dealer mailed to the assistant assessor of such county or district where his place of business is situate, and the other copy should be by him mailed to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Such wholesale dealer should, at the close of each month, make out an invoice in duplicate, under oath, of all the liquors he then had on hand, giving an exact copy of all the marks and brands upon each package, as required to be placed there by law; one copy of which invoice he should, so soon as completed, mail to the assistant assessor of the county or district in which his place of business is situate, and the other copy he should mail to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. No retail liquor dealer should ever be allowed to sell more than one quart of liquor at any one sale, neither should he be permitted to sell to any one person more than two quarts of liquor upon the same day.

6. Every place where liquors are manufactured or sold there should be painted in large letters, on the most conspicuous place on the building, the kind of business done there, whether manufacturing or selling of liquors, under which should be the words, "Authorized by the United States."

7. All liquors brought into any county or collection district, which were not manufactured therein, either for sale or storage, the person so owning or claiming the same should, within forty-eight hours thereafter, and before sale or storage of them, file with the assistant assessor of such county or collection district into which the same should be brought, an invoice in duplicate of all such liquors, which invoice should state in full all marks and brands on each package required to be placed there by law, which invoice should be signed by such person owning or claiming such liquors; one copy of which invoice should be by such assistant assessor preserved in his office, and the other copy he should mail to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Marks and brands placed upon barrels or other packages containing liquors, should not in any case be sufficient evidence that the liquors contained therein were legally manufactured or that the tax thereon had been paid, but if the claimant of them possessed a bill of sale, made out in full compliance with the law, and such bill accurately described each package and gave all the marks and brands thereon, then such marks and brands in connection with such bill of sale should be prima facie evidence that the liquors were legally manufactured and that the tax thereon had been paid. And in all controversies about the tax not having been paid on such liquor the burden of proof should be upon the party other than the claimant.

8. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue should be required to open an account with each distiller, redistiller, rectifier, fermenter, and brewer in the United States; and he should keep an accurate account of each barrel or cask of liquor made by such persons; and should from day to day, as he is informed, note in such record the names and residences of the various persons into whose hands each barrel or cask passed until the same should be consumed or broken, and in case it should be broken he should trace its contents in same manner to its consumption; and in every case where he should discover persons in possession of any of such liquors, and his books did not show that they were legally entitled to the same, or he should find any discrepancy in amount of liquors, or find any persons in possession of liquors that he had no record of their manufacture or sale, he should in all such cases immediately institute inquiry into the matter, and ascertain who was in fault, and in case he should discover any willful violations of law he should at once have the proper proceedings commenced to correct the error and punish the offender. And for the purpose of keeping an accurate account of all liquors legally manufactured and sold, and of detecting frauds, such Commissioner of Internal Revenue and such assistant assessors should carefully preserve all papers required by law to be sent or given to them, and such as are sent or given to such assistant assessors they should keep them conveniently arranged and open for inspection each week day during office hours.

9. In cases where manufacturers should desire to ship any of their liquors to foreign countries, warehouses should be provided at convenient ports for the reception and safe keeping of such liquors until ready for shipment. In all such cases such manufacturer, before shipment, should procure from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a permit therefor, which permit should accurately describe each package of such liquors to be shipped, giving all the marks and brands on each, stating to what warehouse they should be shipped and within what time it should be done; and each barrel or package so described in such permit should be painted all over except where the marks and brands are with black paints mixed with oil; and such liquors, after their removal from place where manufactured, should never, under any circumstances, be sold or offered for sale in the United States, except they should be returned after their shipment from the United States as imported liquors, and pay the regular duty as required on foreign liquors imported to this country.

10. All cars, boats, vessels, wagons, drays, carts, or other conveyance by which any liquors should be removed from place where manufactured before the tax should have been paid thereon, except as expressly provided by law, such cars, boats, vessels, wagons, drays, or carts so used in such removal of such liquors should be forfeited to the United States, and the persons so aiding in such removal should be severely punished by fine and imprisonment.

11. No liquors should in any case be sold for less than the tax on the same, except a special permit should be obtained by the person owning the same upon good cause shown from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for that purpose. And in all cases of sale of liquors for a less price than the tax thereon except where permission should be granted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, it should be prima facie evidence that the tax had not been paid thereon; and the liquors in all such cases should be seized and forfeited to the United States, and the seller and purchaser each punished by fine and imprisonment therefor, unless they could show upon trial that the tax had been legally and properly paid thereon before such sale.

From what I have stated it will be seen that under the plan I propose liquors can be cheaply manufactured, and without any unnecessary hinderances or restraints—providing the manufacturer desires to comply with the law and did not seek to evade or violate it—and the system of identification of liquors is so easy and perfect and the records so convenient to establish the same that spurious liquors could not be got on to the market without detection, hence none would be deterred from engaging in the sale of liquors upon condition that they desired to comply with the law. Now for the purpose of preventing the illegal manufacturer of liquors, as well as the keeping or selling of them, the law should in the twelfth place provide, that every place where liquors should be manufactured in violation of law, and every place where such liquors should be kept, whether for sale, storage, or otherwise, that such liquors, together with the real estate where manufactured or kept and all personal property found thereon should be forfeited to the United States, upon condition that such person or persons so manufacturing or keeping such liquors in violation of law owned such real estate. In case such real estate, where such liquors were made or kept in violation of law, was rented property, then the same should not be forfeited to the United States, except it could be shown that the owner thereof had had forty-eight hours' notice of the fact that liquors were manufactured or kept on his premises, in violation of law, and he did not within such forty-eight hours notify the internal revenue collector of such county or collection district in which such property should be situate, of the fact of such illegal manufacture or the keeping or selling of such spurious liquors, by letter, telegraph, or otherwise, it should be taken for granted that he was consenting thereto, and in such case such real estate should be forfeited to the United States the same as though the owner was manufacturing or keeping such liquors on his premises in violation of law, except in case of infants, idiots, and insane persons; but no land deeds to an infant, idiot, or insane person after the taking effect of the law should be so exempted.

And in addition to such forfeitures such persons so making or keeping such liquors in violation of law should be severely punished by fine and imprisonment. And in order to insure a detection of all violations of the law, and a certain and speedy punishment of all persons so violating the same, provision should be made for all persons to inform that desired to in case of such violations; and as an inducement for such information such informers should have all or a very large share of the proceeds of such forfeiture, after the tax and expense the Government had been put to in proving the same were deducted therefrom.

A section should be added embracing a system of penalties, including fine and imprisonment, for every willful violation of the law, and an express provision should be made preventing the compromising of cases instituted for violations of the law, or the compounding of felonies under it.

The law should also provide that all liquors found within the United States after the 1st day of September, 1868, which had been manufactured prior to the taking effect of the law I propose, and upon which the tax had not been paid, the burden of proving such payment should be upon the claimant of such liquors; such liquors, together with the real estate and all personal property found thereon, should, in like manner, be forfeited to the United States as provided in the case of illegal manufacture of liquors, unless such person or persons claiming the same should, on such 1st day of September, 1868, pay the tax due thereon, or show that the same had been paid previous thereto. This last provision would put millions of dollars into the Treasury out of which it has been swindled, and thereby justly punish men who have been willfully violating the law.

With such a law upon the statute-book, in my judgment no man would dare to undertake the manufacture or sale of spurious liquors. Such liquors upon a man's premises, with a law of that kind, would be worse than a mad dog, for it would not only subject him to fine, but his person to imprisonment, and at the same time destroy his property by causing it to be forfeited to the United States. Such a law as I have stated all honest men could easily comply with, and no man, not even a thief, would dare hazard a violation of it.

Some may insist that the law I propose is too severe, and that public sentiment would not be in favor of its enforcement. I insist that so soon as the people once understand the extent of the frauds now being practiced upon the Government by the class of persons known as the whisky ring, they would favor the enforcement of any law that would break down that ring and collect the revenues. In its enforcement it can injure none but willful violators; and it matters but little to me how much they may suffer providing honest men can be benefited thereby. Our revenues must be collected and laws must be made strong enough and enforced, at all hazards, to accomplish that, even if we have to imprison and forfeit the property of every scoundrel in the land who undertakes willfully to violate it.

Similar provisions to those I have named could be enacted to prevent tobacco frauds.

SPEECH OF HON. LEWIS SELYE,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 13, 1868,

In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

Mr. SELYE. Mr. Chairman, the attention of honorable members has been largely occupied since the opening of the present session of Congress with the consideration of questions connected with the finances and currency of the country. Numerous suggestions have been made for expediting the return to specie payments; projects in great variety have been presented for reducing or paying in a manner little burdensome to the people the public debt, and multiplied proposals of the most opposite and diverse character have been offered for the amendment of our present system of currency.

The restless anxiety of the public mind on these subjects, and the zeal and persistency with which they have been discussed in both Houses of Congress, give evidence that our whole financial and monetary system is out of order, and that disease is deep-seated in the body-politic, which must be removed before the restoration of sound national health is possible. I have no desire, sir, to undervalue the importance of the efforts that are being made by honorable gentlemen to restore specie payments, and bring back the currency to a sound and normal condition; I have no wish to obstruct any measure calculated to lessen the weight of debt which presses so heavily on the country, or to lighten the taxation rendered inevitable by that debt.

But I believe, Mr. Chairman, that a broader statesmanship and a sounder political philosophy would teach us to look deeper than the external symptoms of the disease, and investigate the source from which it springs. That this has not been already done by abler men is my apology for now addressing you.

I had hoped that the report of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue would have offered to us such a statement of the national disease as would have exhibited not only the extent, but the causes of our present industrial and commercial depression, and at the same time have suggested a remedy adequate to its removal. But able and valuable as that document unquestionably is for the extent and variety of the information it contains, collected with great industry and presented with great clearness, it yet fails, as I conceive, to offer to our consideration any complete or well adjusted system of national finance, for the reason that it ignores, or more strictly speaking, evades, by postponement, the discussion of that essential feature—the adjustment of the tariff question.

That depression severe and universal in all our industrial and commercial interests does exist will not be denied. Thousands of unemployed laborers throng our cities; the capital invested in our varied manufacturing enterprises lies unrewarded; the tax gatherer enforces his relentless demands in a period of universal depression, and the unemployed workman and the overburdened employer alike look forward with gloomy anticipation to a period of suffering and privation, of bankruptcy and disaster. All our great manufacturing interests—cotton and wool and iron—are languishing; all the lesser industries connected with or depending on them languish too. The demand for manufactured goods has dwindled to a point less than has been reached for many years, and in an inverse ratio with the diminished consumption of the country have declined the profits of its production.

Following this decline in the profits of production, so plainly felt now by all classes of the community, is necessarily a commensurate decline in the tax-paying power of the people, and as this depression sinks into prostration will this inability to bear taxation be increased, until universal commercial bankruptcy supervene, and the advocates of national repudiation shall have placed within their reach the coveted opportunity of accomplishing their guilty and unpatriotic object.

I hold, then, Mr. Chairman, that first in the discussion of the means by which the national financial and industrial prosperity may be restored, comes the question, How is the productive power of the country to be maintained and increased?

I answer; by the development of our industrial resources and the healthy stimulation of our national production. In accomplishing this I do not underrate the importance of enforcing a rigid economy in the public expenditures, and of lessening the burden of taxation. I do not underrate the importance of securing a sound currency as well as a wise administration of the public debt. But I hold that not less important than any or all of these, it is to protect our own industry from the destructive effects of foreign competition, and thus to render it profitable and prosperous, and by the same means to turn back the stream of gold which is now flowing to Europe in such mighty volume to pay our foreign trade balances.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

This subject, sir, of the necessity of the revision of the tariff, so as to render it truly effective not only to secure sufficient revenue for our Treasury, but adequate protection for our industry, has been, I observe, studiously avoided, as well by Mr. Commissioner Wells as by many honorable gentlemen in this House, whose zeal and eloquence had placed them, in former sessions, among the foremost advocates of protection to American labor. Feeling, sir, the immeasurable importance of this subject to my country, I can be no party, from any considerations of personal interest or political expediency, to its further neglect by Congress. In undertaking to discuss it, sir, I make no pretensions either to oratory or philosophy, and shall endeavor to treat it in a manner at once plain and practical, looking rather for my guidance to the teachings of experience in my own and other countries than to the generalities and abstractions of so-called political economy, by which the friends and advocates of the manufacturing interests of foreign countries have so unremittently and so successfully sought to deceive and mislead our people.

Springing from the working classes, and sympathizing with the men who toil, I am not here the advocate of protection to any special class or interest or section of the country; but I am here the advocate of protection to AMERICAN INDUSTRY of every branch and in every State.

The production of the country, sir, is one; whether it be from our forests or our fields, from our mines or from our factories, the people, all the people, are interested in the common produce of the nation, whatever their pursuits or wherever their locality may be. Thus, sir, neither championing the interests of the East nor the West, the North nor the South, I aim at the enforcement of a grand NATIONAL POLICY of complete industrial independence, the effect of which will be not only to secure the comfort and independence and elevation of the people, but also the power and solvency and honor of the nation.

Mr. Chairman, I am not ashamed of this doctrine of protection; I am not afraid to speak the word, and tell honestly what I mean. The specious sophisms of the so-called free trade philosophers of Manchester and Paris have not deceived me. I regard man, made in the image of his Creator, endowed not only with the physical capacity to labor, but with an intellect to think and a soul to live hereafter, as something different from a mere machine to be used as an instrument of production at the smallest possible cost to its possessor; and I hold that there is something more important to a nation than the ability to undersell its neighbors or competitors in the markets of the world. If, sir, the penalty of making cheap goods is the moral and intellectual debasement of a people, then do I affirm that in a country the power and prosperity of whose Government depends (as it does in the United States) on the intelligence and virtue of its citizens, the policy of degrading labor here to an equality with its condition in Europe would not only be a political blunder, but a moral crime.

PROTECTION MAINTAINED BY THE FATHERS.

The principle, sir, of protection for which I contend, is no novelty in American politics. It has been held from the beginning by the founders of this Government, and the great political teachers of the people—men whom we are accustomed to honor, and whose opinions on all other subjects are regarded as authorities. Among these I may enumerate the reverend names of Franklin, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Jackson, and, in his earlier and better days, Calhoun, and Clay, and Webster, and Lincoln, and many others.

FRANKLIN.

Franklin, in a letter to Humphrey Marshall, written in London in the year 1771, says on this subject:

"Every manufacture encouraged in our country makes part of a market for provisions within ourselves, and saves so much money to the country as must otherwise be exported to pay for the manufactures he supplies. Here in England it is well known and understood that wherever a manufacture is established which employs a number of hands it raises the value of land in the neighboring country all around it; partly by the greater demand near at hand for the produce of the land, and partly from the plenty of money drawn by the manufacturers to that part of the country. It seems, therefore, the interest of all our farmers and owners of land to encourage our young manufactures in preference to foreign ones imported among us from distant countries."

JEFFERSON.

Jefferson, in a letter to J. B. Say in 1815, enforces the policy of protection, even to prohibition, of articles which we are capable of producing at home. The words in which he asserts the importance of securing by governmental interference national industrial independence are so remarkable that I am induced to quote them:

"Experience has shown that continued peace depends not merely on our own justice and prudence, but on that of others, also; that when forced into war the interception of exchanges which must be made across a wide ocean becomes a powerful weapon in the hands of an enemy domineering over that element, and to other distresses of war adds the want of all those necessities for which we have permitted ourselves to be dependent on others—even arms and clothing. This fact, therefore, solves the question by reducing to its ultimate form whether profit or preservation is the first interest of the State? We are, consequently, become manufacturers to a degree incredible to those who do not see it, and who only consider the short period of time during which we have been driven to them by the suicidal policy of England. The prohibitory duties we lay on all articles of foreign manufacture which prudence requires us to establish at home, with the patriotic determination of every good citizen to use no foreign article which can be made within ourselves, without regard to difference of prices, secures us against relapse into foreign dependency."

And, in a subsequent letter, the great statesman distinctly records his opinion in favor of a protective tariff. Writing, January 9, 1816, to Mr. Benjamin Austin, he says:

"You tell me I am quoted by those who wish to continue our dependence on England for manufactures. There was a time when I might have been so quoted with more candor." * * * "We have since experienced what we did not then believe—that there exists both profligacy and power enough to exclude us from the field of interchange with other nations; that to be independent for the comforts of life we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist." * * * "He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures must be either for reducing us to dependence on that foreign nation, or to be clothed in skins and to live like wild beasts in dens and caverns. I am proud to say that I am not one of these. Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort; and if those who quote me as of a different opinion will keep pace with me in purchasing nothing foreign where an equivalent of domestic fabric can be obtained, without any regard to difference of price, it will not be our fault if we do not have a supply at home equal to our demand, and wrest that weapon of distress from the hand which has so long wantonly violated it."

MADISON.

Madison, one of the wisest and greatest statesmen this country has produced, thus opposed the "let-alone" doctrines of the free-traders, in a letter addressed to Mr. Joseph C. Cabell, in 1828:

"The theory of 'let us alone' supposes that all nations concur in a perfect freedom of commercial intercourse. Were this the case they would, in a commercial view, be but one nation, as much as the several districts composing a particular nation; and the theory would be as applicable to the former as to the latter. But this golden age of free trade has not yet arrived, nor is there a single nation that has set the example. No nation can, indeed, safely do so until a reciprocity, at least, be insured to it."

"A nation leaving its foreign trade, in all cases, to regulate itself might soon find it regulated by other nations into subservience to a foreign interest. In the interval between the peace of 1783 and the establishment of the present Constitution of the United States the want of a general authority to regulate trade is known to have had this consequence." * * * "The theory supposes, moreover, a perpetual peace—a supposition, it is to be feared, not less chimerical than a universal freedom of commerce."

And in giving this summary of the opinions on this question of our illustrious statesmen, I may fitly refer to the recorded views of

although they have been often quoted. Writing to his friend, Dr. Coleman, in 1824, the honored patriot says:

"You ask my opinion on the tariff. I answer that I am in favor of a judicious examination and revision of it; and so far as the tariff bill before us embraces the design of fostering and protecting, preserving within ourselves the means of national defense and independence, particularly in a state of war, I would advocate and support it. The experience of the late war ought to teach us a lesson, and one never to be forgotten. If our liberty and republican form of government, procured for us by our revolutionary fathers, are worth the blood and treasure at which they were obtained, it is surely our duty to protect and defend them." * * * "This tariff—I mean a judicious one—possesses more fanciful than real danger. I will ask: what is the real situation of the agriculturist? Where has the American farmer a market for his surplus product? Except for cotton he has neither a foreign nor a home market. Does not this clearly prove, when there is no market either at home or abroad, that there is too much labor employed in agriculture, and that the channels for labor should be multiplied? Common sense points out the remedy. Draw from agriculture the superabundant labor; employ it in mechanism and manufactures, thereby creating a home market for your breadstuffs, and distributing labor to the most profitable account and benefit to the country. Take from agriculture in the United States six hundred thousand men, women, and children, and you will at once give a home market for more breadstuffs than all Europe now furnishes us. In short, sir, we have been too long subject to the policy of British merchants. It is time that we should become a little more Americanized, and, instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of England, feed our own, or else in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall be rendered paupers ourselves."

To this brief selection from the declarations of the fathers I might add the recorded utterances of nearly, if not quite all, the statesmen of this country, whose experience has guided the national councils, and whose wisdom has been acknowledged by the people.

PROTECTION MAINTAINED BY THE RULERS AND STATESMEN OF EUROPE.

Nor are the statesmen of this country alone in their teachings on this subject—Colbert, the father of the economical system of France, two centuries ago, avowed and enforced them, and in a single passage in one of his reports to Louis XV expresses the cardinal principles of his system: "Reduction of export duties upon all domestic products; diminution of import duties on raw materials; exclusion of foreign manufactures by means of increase of duties."

We know how well the first Napoleon understood the principle of protection—how well, too, he understood the dangerous fallacies of the free-traders of his day. "If the empire were of adamant," said he, "political economists would grind it to dust;" and he answered their sophisms by the resistless logic of a blockade all round the maritime coast of Europe, and by this means released forever France and Germany from the industrial domination of Great Britain. And in this matter the present emperor of France has shown himself an apt disciple of his great teacher—the Anglo-French treaty of 1860, so boasted as a "free-trade treaty," being in fact a wisely concocted protective measure, by which the interests of French industry were intended to be secured in a manner much more effective than those of American industry by the Morrill tariff of 1861, which has been the object of such virulent and unreasonable assault by the friends of British traders and manufacturers at home and abroad.

CHEVALIER.

M. Chevalier, the celebrated French economist, notwithstanding his opposition to the policy of protection, as applied to France, presents this strong plea for the principle itself:

"It is not an abuse of power on the part of the Government; on the contrary, it is the accomplishment of a positive duty, so to act at each epoch in the progress of a nation as to favor taking possession of all the branches of industry whose acquisition is authorized by the nature of things. Governments are, in effect, the personification of nations, and it is required that they should exercise their influence in the direction indicated by the general interest, properly studied, and fully appreciated. Therefore (he continues) I shall carefully avoid censuring Colbert, in France, or Cromwell, in England, for the effort to establish, in his own country, a powerful commercial marine. I regard as excellent the desire of some of the eminent men of the principal nations of Europe to establish around them the various branches of manufactures, although I may not praise without distinction all the measures by them adopted for the accomplishment of their object."

These words were written in the year 1852.

Nor is the French economist alone in the admission of the inherent soundness of the principle of protection.

John Stuart Mill, the illustrious political philosopher of England, whose advocacy of "free trade" is so well known, avows in his work entitled "Principles of Political Economy," the opinion that "the superiority of one country over another in a branch of production often arises only from having begun it sooner. There may (he alleges) be no inherent advantage on one part, or disadvantage on the other, but only a present superiority of skill and experience. A country which has this skill and experience yet to acquire may in other respects be better adapted to the production than those which were earlier in the field; and, beside, it is a just remark, that nothing has a greater tendency to produce improvement in any branch of production than its trial under a new set of conditions. But it cannot (he proceeds) be expected that individuals should, at their own cost, introduce a new manufacture, and bear the burdens of carrying it on until the producers have been educated up to the line of those with whom the processes have become traditional. A PROTECTIVE duty, continued for a reasonable time, will sometimes be the least inconvenient mode in which a country can tax itself for the support of such an experiment."

SARCASMS AND FALLACIES OF FREE TRADE.

Sir, we are accustomed to hearing from the advocates of free trade sarcastic insinuations against the "narrow and antiquated notions" of protection, as though it were the remnant of a by-gone barbarism, which was destined rapidly to disappear before the science and the wisdom of an enlightened civilization. We have been accustomed to hearing the tariff legislation of the country held up to public execration as intended to benefit a class of grasping and selfish manufacturers at the cost of the workingmen and the farmers of the country.

Efforts have been made to mislead the people by the statement of vague, but plausible, generalities; and so persistent has been the zeal of these missionaries of a foreign interest that millions of our countrymen are to this day deceived upon the subject and verily believe that it is better to import our fabrics from foreign countries than to manufacture them at home!

Mr. Chairman, it is time that this delusion should be dispelled; and therefore I have occupied the time of the House in establishing this fact: that the principle of protection, for which I contend, has the direct sanction and authority of the great statesmen of American history; the example and the teachings of the wisest and greatest rulers and ministers produced in Europe for the last two centuries. Yea, more, sir, the very apostles and prophets of free trade themselves have been adduced as witnesses to prove the argument for it to be unanswerable.

So much, sir, and for the reasons I have stated, have I thought it well to say in defense of the principle of protection. I shall now, with your permission, look at the practical working of that principle, as we see it illustrated in the experience of our own and other lands.

HISTORICAL EXAMPLES—GREAT BRITAIN.

And first, let us turn to Great Britain—that land from which we import so many, not only of our goods, but of our opinions, and from whose philosophers and statesmen have emanated that pernicious system of "free trade" which has been used—sometimes by visionary theorists, sometimes by selfish demagogues—but always with the effect of misleading the unwary and deceiving the ignorant of our people.

It may then be well to inquire what has been the experience and the practice of Great Britain in this matter of free trade, respecting which her economists profess with patronizing pity to instruct the people of this benighted land.

Great Britain, Mr. Chairman, with an area of only one hundred and twenty-one thousand nine hundred and twelve square miles, (less than many of our individual States,) possesses a commerce far surpassing that of any other nation on the earth. Her imports and exports of merchandise for the year 1866 amounted to the value of £534,135,956, or $2,670,979,780. The foreign commerce of our own country is for the same period not one third as much, and when I add that the annual exports of British manufactures now amount to $750,000,000 the predominant interest to which that people are indebted for a foreign trade so vast and so various is manifest.

What are the causes, sir, which have given England this mighty manufacturing supremacy? She possesses no natural advantages which can be considered as peculiar or controlling. On the one hand, she depends, and always must depend, to a great degree, on other lands for her food and raw materials. She owes much, it is true, to the industry and perseverance of her people; much to her iron and coal mines, so rich and so accessible; much also to her insular position, which makes it so easy for her to receive her supplies and distribute her productions. But all this would have availed but little without governmental aid. Long and steadily, sir, has England maintained the policy of protection; and the English manufacturer for generations—alike in peace and in war—under every dynasty and administration, has been enabled to rely on the steady and enlightened coöperation of his Government. To protect, extend, and encourage the manufactures of Great Britain has been the traditional policy of her statesmen. The result is seen in a manufacturing prosperity without a parallel on the earth.

She resolutely and systematically began her system of protection in the year 1338.

And, first, with regard to woollens, Edward III, seeing the absurdity of growing wool in England, which had to be sent across the channel to be converted into cloth, set himself to work to induce Flemish artisans to come over and settle in England to teach the English workmen the arts of spinning, dyeing, and weaving. He accordingly sent abroad agents to induce them to come over, promising them protection and holding out liberal offers to those who should accept his invitation. The provision of law by which foreigners are entitled, except in case of treason, to trial by a mixed jury—half natives and half aliens—a provision which has recently attracted so much attention by reason of the refusal of such a jury to some of the Penians, was one of the assurances of fair play he established in their favor. That provision is found in his statute of 1353, for the regulation of the staple, that is, for the establishment and government of markets for the purchase and sale of wool and of woollen cloths, the last place where a man would think of looking for it who did not know that it was a part of the system for the protection of domestic industry—a temptation to the workman to transport himself, once for all, to the place where the food and the raw material are grown, instead of sending barrels of flour and pork and bales of wool over the sea for his whole lifetime just to bring them back again in the shape of cloth, burdened with the costs of transporting tons of matter both ways, when by bringing the man once you get him and his posterity forever.

Fuller, in his Church History, gives this quaint account of the means resorted to by Edward:

"Englishmen at this time knew no more what to do with the wool than the sheep that wear it as to any artificial and curious drapery, their best cloths being no better than friezes, such was their coarseness for want of skill in the making. Unsuspected emissaries were employed by our king in those countries, who wrought themselves into familiarity with such Dutchmen as were absolute masters of their trade, but not masters of themselves as journeymen and apprentices. They bemoaned the slavishness of those poor servants, whom their masters used rather like heathens than Christians; yea, rather like horses than men; early up and late in bed, and all day hard work and harder fare, as a few herrings and moldy cheese, and all to enrich the churls, their masters, with profit to themselves. But Oh, how happy should they be if they would but come into England, bringing their mystery with them, which would provide them welcome in all places. Here they should feed on fat beef and mutton till nothing but their fullness should stint their stomachs. Yea, they should live on the labors of their own hands, enjoying a proportionable profit of their gains to themselves: their beds should be good and their bed-fellows better, seeing the rudest yeoman in England would not disdain to marry their daughters unto them, and such English beauties that the most envious foreigner could not but commend them."

In the reign of James I, about the time our ancestors were landing at Plymouth, agents were employed to bring from Rochelle, in France, "three prime workmen," to instruct his subjects in the process of manufacturing the alum used in dyeing; and the three prime workmen were smuggled out of the French port in hogsheads.

In 1654 the stocking weavers said, in a memorial to Oliver Cromwell, that their success had "vindicated the nation against that old proverbial expression, 'The stranger buys of the Englishman the case (skin) of the fox for a groat, and sells him the tail again for a shilling;' for we may now retort and say, the Englishman buys silk of the stranger for twenty marks, and sells him the same again for a hundred pounds."

The statistics and regulations of this long period would fill a volume, and I have cited only a few pertinent facts. Honorable gentlemen will remember that in the period to which I refer, Edward III forbade, under the severest penalties, the exportation of sheep and wool from the kingdom. The punishments affixed to the violation of this law were among the most cruel of England's sanguinary code. Fines, maimings, imprisonment, death, and confiscation, were the penalties ruthlessly enforced until 1746, when they were mitigated to transportation for seven years, and this was subsequently repealed, but not until 1825. The British tariff act of 1819 imposed a protective duty of fifty per cent. on woollens, and by a later act (1834) fifteen and twenty per cent. were still retained upon them.

Thus, sir, we see that from 1338 to 1834 the woollen manufacture in England was protected by absolute prohibition, first enforced by penalties, and afterward enforced by taxes.

Nor, sir, is the history of the iron industry in England less significant and pertinent. In 1610 the protective duty laid on foreign bar iron was £2 10s., or $12 50 per ton; in 1782, £2 16s. 2d., or $14; in 1808, £4 4s., or $21; in 1806, £5 7s., or $27; in 1819, £6 10s., or $32 50 in British vessels, or £7 18s. 6d. in foreign; in 1826, it was reduced to £1 10s., or $7 50. Why? Because through an unwavering policy of protection for a century and a half her iron had obtained the mastery over all competition.

The prices of bar iron at the works in 1825 were: In France, £26 10s.; in Belgium and Germany, £16 14s.; in Sweden, £13 18s.; in St. Petersburg, £15 18s.; in England, £10. Truly, it was time to pull down the scaffolding when the building was erected and covered in, and it became wise to admit at as small a cost as possible, as raw material, such qualities of iron as she did not herself produce.

If it should be said that England's early command of the finest wool, and her possession of iron ore and coal gave her such natural advantages as secured her superiority in these industries, I would refer to another of her manufactures for which she does not produce any portion of the raw material. England grows not a pound of cotton, yet, in 1860, the real value of the manufactures of cotton exported from Great Britain amounted to £52,000,000 sterling, or over two hundred and fifty million dollars; while the amount of her exports of all other manufactures amounted only to £41,000,000 or $2,000,000,000. Here we see her naturalizing an utterly foreign manufacture so as to make its products exceed one half her total foreign commerce in her own manufactures and productions. How was this accomplished? The manufacture of cotton was first introduced into England about 1740, and at that time the East India article could be sold at less than one third the price of the domestic; and had its importation been permitted the British manufacture could not have been established against the competition of the Asiatic product. But, notwithstanding all the disadvantages under which the domestic manufacture labored, the British found a way of meeting the difficulty. It was at once simple and effective, and was done by an act of Parliament, which reads thus:

"Calicoes, painted, stained or dyed, in Persia, China, or the East Indies, shall not be worn or used in this kingdom."

And further:

"All such goods, whether mixed, sewed, or made up together for sale with any other goods, shall be forfeited; and the person in whose custody, knowing thereof, the same shall be found, or that shall dispose thereof, shall forfeit £200."

The British tariff upon cotton goods passed in 1819 still prohibited the manufacture of all countries east of the Cape of Good Hope, and upon all produced elsewhere charged fifty to sixty-seven per cent.

The history of England's protective policy may be best seen in a tabular statement, showing the duties imposed on foreign manufactures imported at various epochs; and with your

Mr. Chairman, I am speaking the facts of history when I thus point out the means by which England established her manufacturing supremacy. They were first prohibition, and afterward protection.

ENFORCED UNDER SO-CALLED FREE TRADE.

But within a few years past England professes to have made a radical change of policy; and now proclaims herself not only the pattern, but the champion of "FREE TRADE" before the world. And yet the tariff of 1842, with its subsequent modifications, was essentially discriminating in behalf of domestic interests. It secured an average duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem on manufactured articles, and effected a most important saving in the cost of production, by opening the ports for foreign food.

But, sir, although a quarter of a century has scarcely passed since this free-trade revolution in Great Britain has occurred, there are already manifest unmistakable symptoms of its injurious effect upon the industry of the country. Orders are being sent from Great Britain to Belgium and France for iron, for locomotives, for machinery, and for many articles in the production of which England, up to a very recent period, had held the place of admitted superiority in the world. Germany is becoming an active competitor of hers for the supply of cutlery, steel, and various articles of lighter hardware; and thus markets, which have been heretofore controlled by Great Britain, are now slowly but surely receding from her.

I take the following extract from a recent number of Engineering—an able London journal, devoted to the discussion of industrial and mechanical subjects—which frankly admits the danger of which I speak:

"Of all this, however, the consideration is now useless. What we have done we cannot undo; nor is it in the nature of man, with all his thousand channels of intercourse, to now preserve a monopoly of ideas, nor, indeed, any exclusive information in practical science or art. Between ourselves and engineers on the continent the race has become one, not of engineering and manufacturing instinct, knowledge, and fitness, but one merely of commercial resources. They have plenty of coal and plenty of iron for generations to come, even if they have not so much as we have."

"The whole question of British vs. foreign competition is virtually narrowed to that of the cost of labor, since, whatever our mechanical resources, our competitors will employ as good if not better machinery, and we can look for no advantage, therefore, in that respect. At present, labor is dearer in England than in France and Germany. There are many reasons for this. While we are importers of food at high prices the leading continental nations are exporters. Again, and for the very reason we have just given, they are more especially agriculturists and not manufacturers, and in all agricultural communities the value of labor is much lower than in manufacturing districts. And yet again, the French laborer can live upon far less than an English worker so far as provision for bodily wants is concerned."

"Steam is better and cheaper than horse-power, and law better than bull-dog courage, and this, we know, is the sentiment entertained abroad. The attention required for modern machinery—and it is modern machinery which now enables continental engineers to compete with us—is not a matter of strength and courage, nor of beef and mutton, but of thought, dexterity, and skill. And in these respects the Continental workman is in advance of our own, and his lodging and keep cost less than here. We are not supposing our workmen to change places with him, nor are we weighing the scale of relative comfort. As a rule he is more frugal, temperate, docile, and pliable."

And, sir, on this subject I may appropriately mention that the observation of many intelligent American manufacturers who have, during the past summer, made an extended tour of Great Britain and continental Europe, for the purpose of investigating, in the light of their practical experience, the industrial systems of those countries and the true condition of their working classes, corroborates this opinion. These gentlemen all concurring in the opinion that the fears now so generally entertained in England of the danger to her industry from the growing competition of Belgium, France, and Germany, are neither exaggerated nor unfounded. And in illustration abundant facts have been cited to show that the labor of these countries commands a price very much less than that paid in England. Thus I learn that at this moment rails and bars and beams of iron are laid down in Liverpool, of Belgian manufacture, at prices from five to ten per cent. less than the cost of their production in England, and that the wages paid the iron-workers of Belgium are less by half than those paid the iron-workers of England, everything at the same time betokening such steady progress on the part of the Belgian manufacture as threatens the eventual and possibly the early overthrow of the manufacturing supremacy of England, which is based upon her iron production.

No wonder, then, that the English operatives, discouraged and depressed at the new competition which has arisen, should cast around them for relief. At home they have, under their free-trade system, no resource, and accordingly they must look abroad. Therefore, such notices as the following are frequently found in the columns of the British journals:

"Depression of the English Iron Trade.—A great meeting of iron-workers was held on the 17th of December at West Bromwich. There were present upward of five hundred iron-workers, representing nearly the entire trade of West Bromwich, Wednesbury, Tipton, Billston, Walsall, Smethwick, and Oldbury. The question of the proposed reduction was specially discussed; and after mature deliberation the meeting were of opinion that reducing iron and wages would not causany material improvement to the trade, and they entered their protest against such a proceeding. Emigration was preferred, and it was thought probable that it would be adopted on a large scale.

"It is said that a great reduction of wages is about to take place at the various iron works in South Wales. In some places where works are closed there is great distress."

RETURN TO PROTECTION DEMANDED.

But, sir, not only are her manufacturers thus embarrassed and her operatives distressed, but her farmers are crying out despairingly for relief. In an article in the London Farmer (an influential agricultural journal) upon this subject, I find the following significant words:

"Such language gives some indication of the present condition of England as a great manufacturing nation, and the risk we run—from the various causes in operation, among which there is, perhaps, none so formidable as the transfer of our skilled foremen and artisans, as well as improved machinery, to the continent of being eventually outstripped in many branches of industry by foreign competitors. Indeed, although no alarmists, we can hardly prevent the conviction that, with the above facilities and the lower rate of wages and cheaper rate of living on the continent, we shall at no distant day, not only be equalled in the quality but surpassed in the cheapness of almost all classes of British goods. Taking these views into consideration, and accepting them as sound and well-founded, the question arises, How are we to maintain the present high position of England as a manufacturing country, and prevent her from being outrun in the march of improvement?" * * * "So long as England can compete with other countries, and excel in the production of the principal wares and articles of commerce, her policy is certainly to adopt such a system of open ports as will tend to facilitate and promote the trade and exportations of the kingdom. But as there are exceptions to many excellent rules and modes of procedure, so we think, at the present era, when all our energies and genius are required to maintain our prestige as a manufacturing nation, such an exception may, and does actually arise. If a system of husbandry such as above referred to would increase the supply of animal food at home, and not materially diminish our yield of corn, and at the same time not only maintain, but, in all likelihood, augment, the present amount of rural employment, as well as effectually prevent a repetition of the infliction which we have just sustained from cattle disease, undoubtedly a prohibitory duty would be permissible, for it is obvious the supply of foreign corn would increase in the ratio that foreign stock would diminish. Moreover, the well being of the agricultural community at home would be improved, and while the energies of employer and employed would be devoted to the cultivation of stock on the one hand and the production of manufactures on the other, the two staples for which this country is best adapted, the great surplus of goods available for exportation, which could, in all likelihood, be produced at less expense than at present, would thereby be rendered more remunerative and less likely to suffer from foreign competition."

Here is an appeal from the farmers of free-trade England for a prohibitory duty upon foreign cattle. Thus does it seem certain, sir, that the boasted experiment of British free trade is to terminate in failure.

HISTORICAL EXAMPLES OF THE EFFECT OF FREE TRADE.

Fifty years ago all nations that are now regarded as "Powers" defended their domestic labor market from foreign invasion as vigilantly as they did their territories from hostile armies. The principal countries which failed to do so, seduced by free trade wiles, are Portugal and Turkey. The former country, in 1703, then one of the leading commercial nations of the globe, entered into a commercial treaty with England, by which she bound herself to admit British wares into her ports at fifteen per cent. duty, for the favor of an English tax on her wines one third less than that imposed on the wines of France. The latter, fearing no rivalry in her own markets, or in the world's commerce, proclaimed absolute free trade. With what result in both cases I shall inform the House on the highest free trade authorities. Mr. J. K. McCulloch thus reports the effect on—

PORTUGAL.

"Formerly Lisbon had about four hundred ships, of from five to six hundred tons burden, employed in the trade with South America, but at present there are not above fifty ships engaged in foreign trade, and of these the average burden does not exceed one hundred and fifty tons. The produce of Portugal sent to foreign countries is almost entirely conveyed in foreign ships."

TURKEY.

And with regard to Turkey the same writer says:

"The Turkish manufacturers of muslins, gingham, handkerchiefs, &c., have suffered severely from the extraordinary importation of British goods, so much so, that of six hundred looms for muslins in Scutari, in 1812, only forty remained in 1831; and of two thousand weaving establishments in Tournovo, in 1812, there were only two hundred in 1831."

The same authority continues:

"Though our (British) muslins and chintzes be inferior in fineness to those of the East, and our red dye (a color in great esteem in Turkey, Persia, &c.) be inferior in brilliancy, these defects are more than balanced by the greater cheapness of our goods; and from Smyrna to Canton, from Madras to Samarcand, we are everywhere supplanting the native fabrics."

And Mr. Cobden himself, the apostle of free trade, about twelve years ago, summed up the effects upon other countries of the policy he was advocating, in these words: "Turkey and Portugal have become a burden and a curse to England." The decay of their manufactures had so impoverished and enfeebled them as to leave them valueless as customers, and conquered, not by British arms, but by British free trade, she made them her dependencies, and they are now upon her hands like the worn out slaves of a southern plantation, "a burden and a curse." Thus is the disease of the "sick man" of the East accounted for—thus can we understand the ruin of the fairest and the finest of the lauds of western Europe.

These countries, sir, voluntarily bowed their necks to the yoke of British trade, and if they are ruined and degraded, they have at least to blame themselves; but there are other lands unhappily placed within the power of England, on which she has forced her free trade principles at the cannon's mouth. Among her wretched victims in this respect, the most conspicuous are India and Ireland.

INDIA.

With regard to the former country, Mr. Chairman, the results of the British policy in India were described in a speech delivered some ten or twelve years ago in the British House of Commons by a man whose name is known and honored wherever slavery is detested and liberty understood and loved—George Thompson, of England—in which he used these words:

HO. OF REPS.

Internal Tax—Mr. Selye.

40TH CONG... 2D SESS.

"At the close of the last century cotton abounded, and to so great an extent was the labor of men, women, and children applied to its conversion into cloth that even with their imperfect machinery they not only supplied the home demand for the beautiful tissues of Dacca and the coarser products of western India, but they exported to other parts of the world no less than two hundred million pieces per annum."

But in 1818 India was thrown open, and the native industry was exposed to unlimited competition. British free trade was let loose upon that beautiful but fated land; men, women, and children were driven from the workshops to the fields, and all demand for labor ceased, except in raising rice, sugar, indigo, cotton, and opium. Under the altered circumstances here is the description given of the condition of the country by the same authority:

"Some of the finest tracts of land have been forsaken and given up to the untamed beasts of the jungle. The motives to industry have been destroyed. Go with me to the northwestern provinces of the Bengal presidency and I will show you the bleaching skeletons of five hundred thousand human beings who perished from hunger in the space of a few short months. Yes, and of hunger in what has been called the granary of the world. Famines have continued to increase in frequency and extent under our sway for more than half a century."

IRELAND.

And with regard to Ireland, sir, her story is still sadder; the lessons of her experience still more emphatic. Endowed by the Creator with advantages of soil and climate and geographical position unparalleled; producing a race hardy, intelligent, laborious, and enthusiastic; with vast capacity for industrial development and commercial prosperity, we yet see her to-day prostrate and writhing at the feet of England, at once a rebel and a slave. Why is this? For centuries it had been the steady policy of England to discourage all manufactures in Ireland (except, indeed, that of linen;) and with the exception of the brief interval between 1782 and 1800, (when she was governed by her own Parliament, and during which her material condition was improved and advanced with a rapidity unexampled,) she was forcibly subjected to the same treatment as that which was afterward applied to India, and with what effects let the sufferings of that beautiful land to-day attest. I have not time to cite the melancholy statistics of the decay and exhaustion of Ireland under the policy of her British taskmaster, but shall briefly quote from a declaration put forward by an important body of Roman Catholic clergymen recently convened in the city of Limerick, in which the whole sad story is condensed:

"The governing country, [this document states] had grown passionately jealous of the activity and success of the small minority whom she permitted to aggrandize themselves. 'The export of cattle was not allowed, lest it should lessen the value of English land. Then the export of wool was forbidden, unless under great restrictions, and only to a few places. The export of cloth was then prohibited, and almost every kind of import, too, unless the cargo was first discharged in England. A king promising from his throne to 'discourage the woolen manufacture of Ireland,' and essay after essay showing how to utilize Ireland for English wealth, without seeming to deem it worth a thought whether Ireland decayed to ruin or not, are the singular phenomena of English rule and Irish subjection from the reign of James I till the year 1782."

Thus it came to pass that those we call the native population found no country before them in 1772, when they were allowed some of the privileges of Irishmen. A Parliament that, to retain the enjoyment of its prejudices, took every royal message as law, sold their best interests for the pride of ascendancy, and brought Ireland to the verge of bankruptcy. 'The year of free trade' (that is, liberty to export) came with England's 'necessity'—always, alas! apparently Ireland's 'opportunity.' In the history of mankind such notional progress is not recorded as that which brightens the annals of Ireland from 1782 to the year of the Union, (when a highly protective tariff was in force.) With the consciousness of power there came an exhibition of independence which was fatal. Ireland lost her Parliament. It can be no harm to say that England thought the advantage of extinguishing our Legislature a great one, for she paid £1,420,000 to the parties in the country who gave her the key to Irish resources and the control of Irish liberty. Thus, from the very beginning of English rule, the Irish population may be said to have been impoverished by law."

If the theory of free trade were worth anything, Ireland, rich in agricultural resources, with an abundant population, adapted to its culture, and in close proximity to the best food market in the world, would necessarily afford a conspicuous example of its advantages, but we read in her ruin the undeniable evidence of its fallacy.

EFFECTS OF PROTECTION—GERMANY.

In contrast to this, let me for a moment ask the attention of the House to the condition of Germany, a country whose industrial history affords at once such a parallel and a contrast to our own as makes its intelligent study the more important.

GERMANY BEFORE THE ZOLLVEREIN.

I have said that in Napoleon's celebrated decree was laid the foundation of the German as well as the French manufacturing systems, and all enlightened statisticians furnish the evidence that with that blockade commenced the upward impulse of German manufactures of every kind. But at the return of peace in 1815, the manufacturers of England, at that time greatly strengthened by their long monopoly of the markets of the world, renewed their formidable competition with those of Germany, inundated the country with their goods at prices which the native manufacturers under the free-trade system, at that time introduced and advocated even as it is now with us, were unable to meet, and universal distress prevailed. It was in reference to this policy that Henry Brougham (a name once honored but now justly despised in this country) declared that "England could afford to incur some loss in the export of English goods for the purpose of destroying foreign manufactures in their cradle"—a principle ten years afterward reiterated by another British liberal statesman, Joseph Hume, who desired "that the manufactures of the Continent should be strangled in the cradle." In three years after the battle of Waterloo, so sudden and so universal was the depression which prevailed that notwithstanding the theories of the economists deeply imbued with the teachings of Adam Smith, and (like our free traders Perry and Walker, and the Evening Post and Chicago Tribune, &c.) slow to abandon them, a demand for protection to domestic industry was made which could not be resisted, and the Zollverein or Prussian Custom League was established. Since that time nearly all Germany, except the Austrian territories, has joined the league. For five and thirty years this league, embracing a population larger than that of our own country, has had a constitution for all the purposes of foreign commerce parallel to that of the American Union, and industrially and commercially formed the United States of Germany. With what result is shown by the present proud position of Prussia and the North German Confederation. Before the establishment of the Zollverein, Germany had been held to be greatly overpopulated; it was divided and disturbed, its internal commerce embarrassed, its people and Government very poor—selling their raw products and cheap labor to the outside world. Its condition was thus pithily described by Chevalier Busen: "The national sin for the last two centuries had been poverty—the condition of all classes with few exceptions."

GERMANY SINCE THE ZOLLVEREIN.

And now, sir, what is the condition of Germany? She has gone on steadily in the work of her industrial development until she has proudly placed herself at the head of the nations of Europe, and elevated her people to a condition the first on that continent in point of intellectual development, and now advancing in their physical and moral condition with a rapidity exceeding that of any other portion of the Eastern Hemisphere. That condition has been well described by one of our greatest writers:

"An empire has been constructed embracing a population little short of forty millions, among whom education is universal; with a system of communications not excelled by that of any other country, with the exception of those provided for the very dense populations and limited territories of England and of Belgium; with an internal commerce as perfectly organized as any in the world, and growing from day to day with extraordinary rapidity; with a market on the land for nearly all its products, and, as a necessary consequence, with an agricultural population that grows daily in both intelligence and power; with a mercantile marine that now numbers more than ten thousand vessels; with a public treasury so well provided that not only has the late war left no debt behind, but that it has been at once enabled to make large additions to the provision for public education; and with private treasuries well supplied as to enable her people not only with their own means to build their own furnaces and factories, and construct their own roads, but also to furnish hundreds of millions to the improvident people of America, to be by them applied to the making of roads in a country the abundance of whose natural resources should long since have placed it in the position of money-lender rather than that now occupied of general money borrower."

And growing out of this industrial prosperity has arisen the political power of Prussia—a power that has humbled Austria, with her vast wealth of natural resources, but yet emasculated and bankrupt from her free trade policy; a power that has, by the exhibition of its moral and military force, has effectually wiped out the disgrace of Jena, and frustrated the designs of the successor of Napoleon, as though conflict of arms had actually passed between her soldiers and the soldiers of France.

To what foreign and domestic policy, sir, is this growth within the lifetime of a man, of a people from weakness, poverty, and political bondage, to such overtowering strength, to be attributed? It is to be attributed, sir, to its steady development of the productive power of the people.

TARIFF OF THE ZOLLVEREIN.

The tariff of customs duties under which this wondrous progress has been attained is distinguished by three grand principles:

1. It has the stability of treaty stipulations. Diets or Congresses cannot alter its provisions once or twice a year.

2. Its duties are all specific. The Zollverein tariff has not a single ad valorem duty in it.

3. It is strictly for protection, and ignores all notion of taxation for revenue.

Mr. Chairman, let not the glorious example of Germany be forgotten. We have reached a point in our history just parallel to that of the German States after the close of the Napoleon wars. Our industry, temporarily stimulated into activity by the abnormal circumstances of the war, is now exposed to the assaults of the manufacturers of Europe, and it is ours now to decide whether we shall follow the example of Turkey or of Prussia.

I shall give one further example, sir, of the beneficent effect of protection, derived from the history of another of the nations of Europe—I mean the small but prosperous kingdom of Belgium. That little country, with a territory of eleven thousand three hundred and thirteen square miles, (less than one-fourth the area of the single State of New York,) has a population of four millions nine hundred thousand, being three times as dense as that of Massachusetts. In 1846 she raised a million tons of iron ore and ten million tons of coal, nearly equal to two thirds the coal product of the United States the same year. In 1845 Belgium produced one hundred and thirty-four thousand five hundred and thirty-six tons of pig iron, and in 1864 four hundred and forty-nine thousand eight hundred and seventy-five tons, increasing to more than to threefold within twenty years.

But the increase in the aggregate product of her blast furnaces, iron foundries, iron works, and machine shops was three hundred per cent.; the product of her machine shops alone rising from fifty-six thousand six hundred and ten tons in 1845 to three hundred and twenty thousand six hundred and forty-two tons in 1864, or to nearly sixfold. At the time of this immense growth of the iron industry, it is to be observed that the prices were reduced in these twenty years full twenty-five per cent.

Nor, sir, was it in the production of iron alone that the Belgians progressed at this marvellous rate. There success in the manufacture of silk, glass, linen, and woollens has given them a reputation in all the world's markets. To carpets and laces their name is given as distinctive of the finest.

Belgium secures a home market for her raw materials by defending and maintaining her manufactures carefully and adequately. She finds a home market for her own breadstuffs and provisions by employing all her hands busily in every form of converting industry. She fosters her skilled industry by barring out from her home market all competition with its products. Her lands are cultivated like garden grounds. Her factories are alive with industry, and are carrying away the iron trade of northern and eastern Europe from England. Her foreign commerce grew, after it was liberated from the rule of Holland and Spain in 1830, so rapidly that it stood in 1860 at double its due proportion to that of the United States.

How, Mr. Chairman, was this wondrous progress in material prosperity accomplished? How came it, sir, that this little kingdom has risen within a quarter of a century to a rank in manufacturing which is driving England to despair? I shall tell the House, sir, it was by means of the tariff of import duties imposed upon foreign manufactures.

The tariff contained such provisions as the following: Raw wool, (not produced in Belgium,) free. Woolen manufactures, twelve, twenty-one, twenty-six, and thirty-two cents per pound, varying according to quality and quantity of labor employed. Silk cocoons, (not produced in Belgium,) one tenth of one per cent. Silk manufactures, bleached, died, or printed, eighty-seven and one half cents per pound. Hides and skins, raw, (not produced in Belgium,) two cents per ton; tanned and dressed, three cents per pound, or $67 20 per ton. Sugar, raw, (not produced in Belgium,) two cents per ton; refined, $185 68 per ton. Raw cotton, (not produced in Belgium,) two cents per ton; manufactured, seven, nine, and fifteen cents per pound. Flax, undressed, (not produced in Belgium,) nine and three fourth cents per ton; pickled, $20 72 per ton.

These rates, Mr. Chairman, fairly represent the policy and provisions of the Belgium tariff; it aims at and effects a decided and avowed protection to the labor of the people. The consequence is seen in the growth and prosperity of her population. In ten years (1840 to 1850) her population increased sixteen per cent., while that of Great Britain increased but eight per cent., and now her industry is so established and so diversified that she is almost ready for "free trade." The effect of her system having been so to diminish the cost of all her products as to enable her to outrival the great monopolist of the earth, GREAT BRITAIN.

If, sir, we would "subdue England without fighting her," and secure the permanent prosperity of our own industry, we will heed the lesson taught us by little Belgium.

THE UNITED STATES.

But I must refer to the experience of our own land—and, sir, I make this general statement, that our industrial history establishes this fact, that in times when the policy of protection prevailed, general prosperity existed among all classes of the people and in all sections of the country, while in times when the free trade policy prevailed, as uniformly, universal industrial depression prevailed, and commercial disaster was the invariable result.

In support, sir, of this statement, so important to this argument, I shall place on record the testimony of that great political economist,

Henry C. Carey, who, in a published letter, has given a condensed synopsis of the history of our tariff legislation and its consequences for the last fifty years. I shall not apologize for the length of this extract, for the historical facts it states are so pertinent to this discussion that you will perceive at once the value of the testimony:

"Fifty years since, the second war with Great Britain came to a close, leaving our people well provided with mills and furnaces, all of which were actively engaged in making demand for labor and for raw materials of every kind. Money was then abundant, and the public debt was trivial in amount.

"Two years later, we entered upon the British free trade system, and at once all was changed. Mills and furnaces were closed; labor ceased to be in demand; and our poor-houses were everywhere filled. Money becoming scarce and interest high, land declined to a third of its previous price. Banks stopped payment. The sheriff everywhere found full demand for all his time, and mortgagees entered everywhere into possession. The rich were made richer, but the farmer and mechanic, and all but the very rich were ruined. Trivial as were then the expenses of the Government, the Treasury could not meet them. Such wastefulness of things that induced General Jackson to ask the question, 'Where has the American farmer a market for his surplus produce?'

"To the state of things here described we were, in 1823, indebted for the first thoroughly national tariff. Almost from the moment of its passage, activity and life took the place of the palsy that previously existed. Furnaces and mills were built; labor came into demand; immigration increased, and so large became the demand for products of the farm that our markets scarcely felt the effect of changes in that of England; the public revenues so rapidly increased that it became necessary to exempt from duty tea, coffee, and many other articles; and the public debt was finally extinguished.

"The history of the world to that hour presents no case of prosperity so universal as that which here existed at the date of the repeal of the great national tariff of 1823. Had it been maintained in existence, we should have had no secession war, and at this hour the South would exhibit a state of society in which the land owners had become rich while their slaves had been gradually becoming free, with profit to themselves, to their owners, and to the nation at large. It was, however, repealed in 1833, and the repeal was followed by a succession of British free-trade crises, the whole ending, in 1842, in a state of things directly the reverse of that above described. Mills and furnaces were closed; mechanics were starving; money was scarce and dear; land had fallen to half its previous price; the sheriff was everywhere at work; banks were in a state of suspension; States repudiated payment of their debts; the Treasury was unable to borrow a dollar, except at a high rate of interest; and bankruptcy among merchants and traders was so universal that Congress found itself compelled to pass a bankrupt law.

"Again, and for the third time, protection was restored by the passage of the tariff act of 1842. Under it, in less than five years, the production of iron rose from two hundred and twenty thousand tons to eight hundred thousand tons; and so universal was the prosperity that large as was the increase, it was wholly insufficient to meet the great demand. Mines were everywhere being sunk. Labor was in great demand and wages were high, as a consequence of which immigration speedily trebled in its amount. Money was abundant and cheap, and the sheriff found but little to do. Public and private revenues were great beyond all previous precedents, and throughout the land there reigned a prosperity more universal than had in the whole history of the world ever before been known.

"Once more, in 1846, however, did the Serpent—properly represented on this occasion by British free-traders—make his way into Paradise; and now, a dozen years elapsed, in the course of which, notwithstanding the discovery of California mines, money commanded a rate of interest higher, as I believe, than had ever been known in the country for so long a period of time. British iron and cloth came in and gold went out, and with each successive day the dependence of our farmers on foreign markets became more complete. With 1857 came the culmination of the system, merchants and manufacturers being ruined; banks being compelled to suspend payment, and the Treasury being reduced to a condition of bankruptcy nearly approaching that which had existed at the close of the free-trade periods commencing in 1817 and 1834. In the three years that followed, labor was everywhere in excess; wages were low; immigration fell below the point at which it had stood twenty years before; the home market for food diminished, and the foreign one proved so utterly worthless that the whole export to all the manufacturing nations of Europe, as I have already stated, amounted to but little more than $10,000,000.

Thus do we see, that while for long centuries all western Europe, (except Portugal and Ireland,) has maintained constant, persistent, and adequate protection, secured, it may be well to remark, in most cases by specific duties, our manufacturing system has not had any such constant or adequate protection for more than four years at a time, and that only twice in all our history before the rebellion.

If I have failed, sir, to prove the necessity and wisdom of governmental aid to stimulate the industry of a country into active life, then history has been written in vain and the experience of the past is valueless.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF ESSENTIAL FOR THE NATIONAL CREDIT.

At any time, sir, this would be a question of interest to the nation; but at this crisis it becomes of vital moment. How may we avert this fatal paralysis that is creeping over our industry? How quicken the energies of our producing population and make profitable the labor that now slumbers unemployed in the arms of our artisans? How revive the commerce of the country and restore hope to our laborers and confidence to our capitalists? On the answer to these questions depends how we shall be able to discharge our national obligations and maintain the financial honor of our country before the world.

NECESSITY OF DEVELOPING OUR RESOURCES.

I say, sir, it is to be done by turning to profitable account the mighty and the varied resources which God has given to us. With iron ore of every quality and description, and coal and wood in limitless abundance, from Lake Superior to Chattanooga—why should we import a single bar or rail or pig of iron? With pastures adequate to feed unnumbered flocks, why should we look to foreign countries for a single fleece of wool, except it may be of some rare and special qualities peculiar to some other soil? With a steam and water power of incalculable capacity at our command, and with skill and energy and capital abundant, why should a yard of cloth be worn not woven in America? With the richest cotton land in all the earth, and a patent conferred by heaven itself upon some descriptions of our fiber, which no human skill or ingenuity can defeat, why should we suffer our market to be supplied, to the value of a single dollar, by the fabrics of European looms? With an area of arable land that practically knows no bounds, rich and fertile, and possessing every variety of climate, capable of producing food from the coarsest and most necessary vegetable and cereal, to the highest and rarest fruits, why should we not sustain a population of five times our present numbers, and thus at once give relief to the suffering toilers of western Europe and coin into national wealth the boundless and undeveloped agricultural resources of our land? With such deposits of the precious metals as God has placed in no other country, why should we not have such accumulated treasure here of gold and silver as would make us the dispensers of bullion to the world?

RECKLESS IMPORTATIONS.

The answer, sir, is at hand. It is because we have been running the spendthrift's course, and with a reckless, I might say a wicked, prodigality, expending more than we have been earning, and madly incurring a debt to foreign creditors for the supply of articles, some of which were useless luxuries, and others might have been far better furnished by the labor of our own workmen.

I learn, sir, from the official report to the Secretary of the Treasury on the commerce and navigation of the United States for the fiscal year of 1866, that we imported, in the following amounts, the descriptions of goods enumerated, estimated in their gold value at the port of exportation:

Cotton and manufactures of cotton.....	$30,844,391
Iron and manufactures of iron.....	18,755,000
Wool and manufactures of wool.....	66,800,000
Silk and manufactures of silk.....	28,350,000
Making a total of.....	114,749,391
To this should be added, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, for undervaluation, at least twenty per cent., being.....	28,951,878

which would represent an amount in our currency of at least $250,000,000 expended in a single year for four classes of staple articles produced in foreign countries, which possess no natural advantages over our own for their production. I cite these four classes simply as illustration, not that the amount here stated represents by any means the total value of articles imported into this country which had much better be produced at home. But, sir, the fact is sufficiently startling that we prefer to pay the manufacturers of Europe for silk and cotton and iron and woolen goods $250,000,000 which, if we chose, we could have made at home.

FATAL IMPROVIDENCE IN INCURRING DEBT.

If, from the superabundant production of our land, we, indeed, paid for these goods by our exports to foreign countries, and so kept our balance square, no result of disaster to our commerce or dishonor to our country would ensue, however unwise or injurious such a policy might be. But when we examine the facts we find that we are recklessly consuming these foreign goods without paying for them, putting ourselves of our own will under bondage to Europe, the most degrading and the most helpless—the bondage of a debtor to a creditor.

Sir, when we call to mind the experience through which our country has passed for the last seven years—the terrible drain that has been made upon her resources in the suppression of the rebellion, the enormous loss of productive labor, the unparalleled expenditure of treasure, the unstinted sacrifices which were made for the maintenance of the integrity and honor of the nation—we should suppose that a sober sense of the necessity of economy and retrenchment, both individual and national, would possess us all. Instead of such being the case we find the fiscal year succeeding the termination of the rebellion to have been distinguished as the one in which we received the largest amount of foreign goods ever imported into the United States in a single year!

Our imports for that year, (the fiscal year of 1866,) as by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, were as follows:

Aggregate imports.....	$487,600,000
Less specie imported, about.....	9,000,000
	478,600,000

Add to this sum twenty per cent. for undervaluations.....

	$514,320,000

Actual value of imports..... representing the amount payable in gold to the producers of foreign countries, an amount exceeding by more than one hundred millions, the aggregate imports of any preceding year in the history of the Republic. And, sir, although the importations for last year exhibit some slight abatement, still they have amounted to a figure absolutely startling. They were as follows:

Aggregate imports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867 (less specie imported).....	$388,751,086
Add to this sum 20 per cent. for undervaluations.....	77,750,217

Actual value of imports.....	$461,503,303
------------------------------	---------------

AMOUNT OF OUR FOREIGN INDEBTEDNESS.

It is difficult, sir, to estimate with any accurate precision the amount of American indebtedness existing in Europe; but approximation may be made to it.

In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on our foreign and domestic commerce of 1863, the amount of capital held by foreigners in the United States, including State, national, railroad, and municipal stocks, is estimated at $500,000,000. This amount has been largely increased since that date. What amount of our bonds are now held by the capitalists of Germany and England and other European countries, it is impossible to tell; but those most competent to judge, fix the sum at not less than $1,000,000,000. Certain it is that great efforts have been made to promote the sale of these bonds in the money centers of Europe, and that for years the weekly remittance of them by private parties, in liquidation of trade balances, has been regular and large. Thus only have we been enabled to meet our foreign mercantile indebtedness, by selling our national securities at a disgraceful shave.

If then, sir, it be correct to estimate the amount of our foreign debt, on which interest must be punctually paid, at a rate in gold of probably six per cent, at $1,500,000,000, it is clear that we must remit $90,000,000 of gold annually in payment of this charge. And, sir, at the rate at which for the last two or three years we have been importing goods, we must to this add not less than $60,000,000 more to pay the balance of our foreign mercantile indebtedness. Thus we have an annual demand for gold payment to Europe beyond the value of our merchandise exported of at least $150,000,000.

We do not pay this balance in gold, sir, but we pay it in our depreciated bonds, and so help still further to depreciate them, while we rivet more firmly the shackles on our national industry and degrade still lower our financial standing before the world. Sir, this is a humiliating topic for an American citizen to discuss who is conscious—and who is proud in the consciousness—of the power and stability and wealth of his country. But we must not conceal nor deny the fact that our paper in Europe is not “gilt edged,” that, “not to put too fine a point upon it,” it can only be negotiated at a ruinous discount. Shall we continue to submit to this indignity? Shall we continue to pursue this course of reckless spending of borrowed money? I pray this House, by every consideration of national honor and solvency, to answer emphatically and promptly, “No!”

How, then, is it to be helped? Reverse the motion, sir; stop the inundation of foreign fabrics that now floods the land! If the people of the United States have not self-control enough voluntarily to forego the consumption of foreign luxuries for which they are unable to pay in honest money, and to procure which they are compelled meanly to run in debt, then, in the name of justice and of honor, I conjure Congress to put such a tax upon these needless articles as will at least secure some recompense in the way of increased public revenue for the injury inflicted on the country, and at the same time serve as a check upon the guilty extravagance of the people.

Put such additional and permanent duty upon articles imported from Europe which are also manufactured here as will encourage capitalists to invest their money in manufacturing enterprises, and will give profitable employment to our own mechanics and unskilled laborers in manufacturing, mining, and farming pursuits, and at the same time stimulate the emigration to this country of the suffering and ill-paid artisans of Europe.

HOW TO RESUME SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Thus, sir, and in no other way, can the depreciation of our national securities and the consequent premium upon gold, which is simply the consequence and evidence of the weakness of the national credit in the world's money market, be removed. The able Secretary of the Treasury may with prophetic finger point to the hour on the clock when, a year and a half hence, we shall, with a great flourish, “resume specie payments.” Honorable gentlemen, in this and the other House of Congress, may wisely talk about “the volume of the currency,” and enact laws for the regulation of the same, hoping thus to remove the malady; the editor of the New York Tribune may advise us that “the way to prepare for resumption is to resume;” but I say, sir, that the only way to restore our national credit is to restore our industrial prosperity; to make the labor of our people profitable, to increase the production of the country; to give wholesome and remunerative employment to our capital in industrial development. Thus, without depending upon foreign labor or foreign money for anything essential to the comfort of our people, shall we supply our own wants, multiply the wealth of our own citizens, and thus increase the tax-paying power of the country. Thus shall we put our balance with Europe on the other side of the ledger, and selling more than we are buying, have gold flowing inward, instead of outward. The return to specie payment will be the natural result of a policy like this.

PROTECTION FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE CONSUMER.

It is an objection, Mr. Chairman, flippantly but commonly made by the advocates of the so-called free-trade policy that protection to domestic production is a tax upon the many for the benefit of the few. This allegation is rarely attempted to be sustained by specific facts, but is put forward as one of those “grand principles” by which the teachers of the British philosophy delight to enlighten our ignorance. Now, sir, I distinctly and unequivocally deny the truth of this position, and on the contrary affirm that the speediest and the surest mode to cheapen the cost of goods to the consumer is to encourage their home production, thus reducing the question to the lowest possible ground, it becomes a matter affecting the pecuniary interest of every man in the community, as it influences the price of the commodities he consumes. And here, Mr. Chairman, I may be allowed to protest against the unjust and unfounded obloquy which the public advocates of free trade are wont to cast upon the class of our citizens who invest their money and employ their time in manufacturing enterprises, and are stigmatized as “selfish” and “greedy” and “grasping” by the very men who are fattening on the profits derived directly or indirectly from the unrequited toil of the white slaves of England. As to this question of the inordinate profits realized by manufacturers, let me, sir, adduce the testimony of a man as competent as any in the United States to speak on this subject, and whose veracity as well as competency will be admitted by the people of the United States. I mean Mr. Peter Cooper, of New York. He, in a recent published letter, makes the following statement upon this point.

PETER COOPER'S TESTIMONY.

“During a period of over thirty years engaged in the manufacture of iron, the capital invested by me has not, on the average, yielded me four per cent. per annum, and this with all the skill and energy and perseverance which I was able to command in promoting its profitable employment, and that my own case was not exceptional may be gathered from the fact that during the same period nearly, if not quite all my brother manufacturers who were engaged largely in the same industry were compelled to succumb to the pressure of adverse circumstances caused by the fluctuating policy of the General Government, and pass into bankruptcy. Such has been the experience through which the men of enterprise and genius and capital have passed, who were induced to volunteer, at the time of the country's greatest need, as pioneers in the great work of establishing our manufacturing independence, and at the sacrifice, in most cases, of their own fortunes, laid the foundation of that noble fabric of industrial independence which we rejoice to see now rising solid and symmetrical in this great land.”

This statement, I believe, sir, fairly describes the experience of the adventurous men who embarked their money and employed their genius and their time in the early efforts to establish American manufactures. They should be honored as patriots and benefactors, at whose cost the country has been immeasurably benefited.

PROTECTION FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE WORKINGMEN.

But, Mr. Chairman, while, as Mr. Cooper shows, a very large proportion of our early manufacturers have sacrificed their fortunes, there can be no doubt that the artisan and the unskilled laborer have reaped the benefit of their efforts. The effect upon these has been to cause increased demand for their labor, and, as a consequence, increased remuneration for it. The result is exhibited in a table, compiled before the war, for the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances for 1856 and 1857, and shows the annual per capita production to each man, woman, and child, white and black, in the respective States. No doubt the amount of this annual production would now be considerably greater; but I am satisfied that the proportions between the annual production of the population of the manufacturing and of the agricultural States therein stated would be more than sustained at the present moment.

Thus we see, sir, that where employment is most varied there is labor most productive, and consequently best rewarded.

PROTECTION CHEAPENS GOODS.

I have said, sir, that the speediest and surest mode to cheapen the cost of goods to the consumer is to encourage their home production, and I only regret that I am compelled by the limit of my time to restrict my proof of this position to a few facts. Perhaps one of the most pertinent I can adduce is derived from the cotton industry. By the tariff acts of 1816 a duty of twenty-five per cent. was imposed on all cotton fabrics, requiring that they should be taken at a minimum valuation of twenty-five cents per square yard. By the acts of 1824 and 1828, this minimum valuation was increased first to thirty and afterward to thirty-five cents the square yard, being in effect a specific duty of nearly nine cents a yard; and we see the effect upon the price of the article in the following table of prices, compiled by Mr. Appleton:

	Cents per yard.
1819.....	21
1823.....	13
1829.....	8
1843.....	6½

The same fact is illustrated by the prices at which "prints" were sold, commencing at the date when the manufacture was first successfully established—1825:

The average price per yard in 1825 was.....	$23 07
The average price per yard in 1830 was.....	16 36
The average price per yard in 1835 was.....	16 04
The average price per yard in 1840 was.....	12 09
The average price per yard in 1845 was.....	10 90
The average price per yard in 1850 was.....	9 24
The average price per yard in 1855 was.....	9 15

How rapidly the cotton industry has grown, and how firmly it has been established, may be gathered from the fact that the number of spindles in New England in 1850 has been estimated, upon reliable authority, at 2,751,078; according to the census, the population in New England in 1850 was 2,728,106, making an average of 1,008 spindles to every thousand of its inhabitants. The population of Great Britain in 1850 was 20,798,552, and the number of spindles was 20,857,062—equal to a thousand and eight spindles to a thousand inhabitants. Thus, in less than fifty years, the productive power of the people of New England in this manufacture had become fully equal to that of the greatest manufacturing nation on earth. The number of spindles in the whole country in 1860 was 5,035,798. In Great Britain, in 1862, the number was 30,387,457.

Let me draw another illustration from the shoe manufacture, now strengthened through our protective legislation as to be almost entirely independent of foreign competition. It is asserted by persons competent to pronounce an opinion, that we now furnish boots and shoes cheaper than they could be imported, and that American leather, the manufacture of which was protected by the early tariffs, is superior to that which is commonly used in Europe. Thus has this important industry established itself impregnably, and secured the supply of shoes to the people cheaper than it would be possible to import them.

The manufacture of cotton hosiery supplies another evidence of the truth of my position. Before the war this manufacture was thought by practical men acquainted with the subject impossible, but I learn, on reliable authority, that in 1860 cotton stockings were sold at three dollars per dozen, which can now be freely had at $1 60, and that with cotton at fourteen cents a pound a good article may be furnished to the consumer at twelve and a half cents a pair, being one half the price paid before the war.

But although I might multiply proofs from the experience of almost every branch of industry of the proposition I have advanced, I shall refer only further to the iron manufacture, the foundation, sir, of all our industry, and the basis of the world's material prosperity.

Not more than thirty years ago our annual production of iron did not exceed fifty thousand tons, now it is not less than one million five hundred thousand tons. With all the disadvantages it had to contend with of competition with British capital and skill, and of the vacillating and uncertain policy of our Government, it has been able to obtain a foothold in the country from which it now cannot be dislodged, but only through the effect of protective legislation. During the protection period between 1828 and 1832 its production was doubled; for eight years later, under a free trade policy, until 1842, although the population increased at the rate of thirty per cent., production made no progress. In the years 1848, under protection, the amount reached eight hundred thousand tons, and then, under the influence of low tariffs, it receded to less than five hundred thousand tons. In six years, under the influence of the MORRILL tariff, the production has reached the large amount of one million five hundred thousand.

CONCLUSION.

I have trespassed on the attention of the House too long, and I hasten to a conclusion. My object has been to show that the principle of protection to domestic industry has been proclaimed and maintained by the great statesmen of this country almost without exception; that it has been proclaimed and maintained, too, by the rulers and ministers of all the nations of Europe which have succeeded in establishing their manufacturing systems; that the operation of this principle of protection has been uniformly beneficent, securing individual prosperity and national power; that the countries which have been excluded from its operation have invariably sunk into poverty and degenerated into political vassalage and helplessness; that this great gain has been accomplished without loss to any class or section of the people, inasmuch as its effect invariably has been to cheapen the cost of goods to the consumer, while at the same time it secures such just and liberal recompense for labor as enables the workingman to educate his children and beautify his home, and himself to fill the place of an enlightened citizen; and, sir, I have also shown that in the perilous condition in which our country stands to-day, with the mighty debt that presses so heavily and so injuriously on her productive energy, her credit dishonored abroad, her currency depreciated at home, her people recklessly consuming foreign luxuries, for which they pay in borrowed money, obtained at the disgraceful sacrifice of the nation's credit, the necessity exists for action, at once prompt and decided, to arrest the drain of gold to Europe that is depleting and enervating the nation.

The revision of the tariff thus, sir, I assert, demands the immediate attention of this House. To revive the flagging industry; to stop our reckless expenditures in Europe for commodities which may either be dispensed with altogether or made at home; to secure profitable employment to our laboring population in all departments of our industry; to open the mighty resources of our undeveloped country to the millions of honest workers that now look to this nation as the only land of hope from depressed and suffering England and from famine-stricken Europe, should, Mr. Chairman, be our first care, either as legislators or as patriots.

Representation in Congress.

SPEECH OF HON. RICHARD YATES,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

June 11, 1868,

On the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, to representation in Congress.

Mr. YATES said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The war through which the country has passed and its incidents have waked up a new spirit of inquiry into the powers of the Constitution, the relative powers of the General Government and of the States, of the President and of Congress. It seems that the doctrine of State rights or State sovereignty, which was undoubtedly the father of secession and the cause of the war, and which, upon the construction given to it by the Democratic party, is certainly the gateway to the dissolution of the Union, is now revived, and Senators even on this side of the Senate seem to give color to the dangerous pretension that it is settled that the States are sovereign in the power to limit the right of suffrage to as many or as few of the people as in their discretion they may deem proper. Mr. President, I declare myself opposed to that sort of logic which opposes every measure of reform upon the ground that "the question is settled." Moreover, I am not in favor of applying the precedents of slavery to the altered state of things brought about in this country by emancipation. In advocating the cause of human rights I do not like to have a merely legal plea interposed, a special demurrer, a musty precedent brought up to prevent the saving action of Congress for a wholesome and permanent reconstruction of the Union.

Sir, I do not decry precedents. I belong to the profession of the law, and I am proud to be a member of that profession. I know, however, that precedents are as useful sometimes to show the errors of the past, as they are as examples for our imitation.

Slavery was once the rule and freedom the exception, and whatever else might be disturbed, slavery was sacred. All constitutions, laws, and usages were to bow submissively before the Moloch of slavery. Even the good Lincoln—who was a radical anti-slavery man, and who said if anything was wrong slavery was wrong—said it was no part of the war to interfere with slavery, and up to the beginning, and during the war, statesmen denounced it apologetically. Even Congress raised a rampart for its protection by an apologetic resolution that it could not be interfered with, and that it was no part or purpose of the war to put it down. Behind the parapets of judicial decisions, and clothed with the imperial panoply of law and precedent, it stood impregnable and defiantly secure. The cry from all the hustings was "the question is settled."

But, Mr. President, it perished with the rebellion. Brightest among the trophies of the war is slavery destroyed and the supremacy of the slave power annihilated. In America, all, thank God, are free.

And yet, sir, when the proposition is introduced here to append a fundamental condition to the admission of a State, and that fundamental condition is to be in aid of human rights, we are told that that is an old question, and has long been settled.

We now have a new rule. Freedom is now the rule, and slavery the exception. It is now settled that all constitutions, laws, usages, and precedents, and all constructions against human liberty, are but cobwebs, to be swept away, in the march of events, with the institution of slavery in aid of which they were set up and established. Whatever may be the precedents or the rule of construction heretofore, it is now settled that all future constructions are to be given in favor of liberty and the extension of the rights of all men.

How long will it take statesmen to learn that nothing is to be considered as settled which is not settled upon the principles of right, truth, justice, and liberty?

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKLEW] says that, as "this question has been settled from the foundation of the Government to the present time, surely no man can be hardy enough to question it." My colleague [Mr. TRUMBULL] says that all such conditions are inoperative and void.

Mr. President, when the other day I referred to some illustrations showing the applicability of the ordinance of 1787, and of the Missouri compromise of 1820, the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] said I was exceedingly unlucky in introducing those precedents. Sir, the bad luck is on his side. The bad luck is on the side of any man who now, in the altered state of things in this day of emancipation, casts his vote against a fundamental condition by which the rights of every American citizen are recognized and secured. Suppose that condition was inoperative, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] very justly asked, "what harm could there be in it?" Would it weaken the Constitution to require the people, through their Legislature, to give their assent to such a condition? Such consent would be in the nature of a compact, and the idea of good faith would enter into it, to last during all the generations of the people of the State. The word of a great State must be kept. With a bad grace could the State ever attempt to alter this great fundamental cornerstone of the institutions of the State.

Mr. President, upon the subject of the power to impose these conditions the argument of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has not been answered, and cannot be answered. The precedents which he offered are to the point, and they sustain the power of Congress over the subject. I shall be able to show, during this argument, that every Senator who has voted for imposing this condition upon Nebraska and upon Alabama has positively committed himself to the power of Congress over the question of suffrage in all the States. Senators may as well consider this. They are committed to the principle; their mouths are closed; they cannot explain away this committal; no technical quibbles will avail them. You cannot say by your votes that the State shall never have power to change its constitution in regard to suffrage, and yet say that Congress has not the power over the question of suffrage in the States. Every Senator upon this floor who has committed himself by his vote in favor of imposing a condition preventing the States from changing their constitution so as to exclude a large portion of the people from suffrage has asserted the power of Congress, the unlimited power of Congress, over the subject of suffrage in the States. And it will not do at all for Senators, when they, by their votes, have appended to the Nebraska and Colorado bills a fundamental condition prohibiting those States from disfranchising their citizens, to say now that it has been settled that Congress has no power over the question of suffrage.

But, sir, I referred to the ordinance of 1787, not simply because Congress had the power to pass that ordinance, but to show the salutary effects of fundamental conditions, such as the bill before us proposes, on the future of a State. What I asserted was, that the ordinance of 1787 did keep slavery out of the Northwestern Territory. Those five States, which were carved out of the Northwestern Territory, would have been slave States, inevitably slave States, but for the effect of the ordinance of 1787. The slave emigration which went to Missouri would, at least one half of it, have gone to Illinois and the other western States; and instead of this ordinance being inoperative, as contended by the Senator from New York, it was regarded as having almost the sanction of a constitutional provision. All petitions to Congress to suspend the operations of the ordinance, even temporarily, failed. It is a historical fact that slave-owners who emigrated to Illinois in many instances hired out their slaves in Missouri, fearing that if taken to Illinois, they would become free by operation of the ordinance. So troublesome did the slaves hired out in Missouri, by residents of Illinois, become, that the Legislature of Missouri, not being able to reach the owners, passed a law, making the resident agents of the owners responsible for the mischiefs they committed.

When the people of Illinois came to adopt their constitution, they declared in the preamble, that it was made consistent with the ordinance of 1787, and provided in the constitution against the future existence of slavery in the State. All efforts to amend the constitution so as to admit slavery, failed, all that has been said to the contrary notwithstanding. I say, that the people held in high estimation this condition prohibiting slavery. As they regarded the title to their homesteads; as they regarded the Declaration of Independence; as they regarded their right to worship God; so they regarded that ordinance, which made their prairies the home of freemen, and which dedicated the Northwestern Territory to freedom and free institutions.

And sir, what has been the effect? Under that ordinance those five Territories became free States, and the power of this continent is there; they are running their race to glory, and inspired by the energizing power of free labor and free institutions they have taken their position, and already of themselves, constitute an empire.

When I referred to the Missouri compromise, I did it to show that that compromise had the effect to keep slavery out of the territory north of the parallel of 36° 30' north latitude. Will any Senator deny that, in the absence of that ordinance, slavery would have entered into those Territories, under the State-rights doctrine that slave property could go, under the constitution and the laws, into any State or Territory of the United States? That compromise you may now call a foolish thing; but the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] will remember that Mr. Clay said of it, the bells rang, the cannons were fired, and every demonstration of joy was made throughout the Republic, on account of the passage of the Missouri compromise. You remember Mr. Douglas said, though afterward he attempted to break it down: "That it was a compromise akin to the Constitution; that it had its origin in the hearts of patriotic men of all sections of the country, and was canonized in the hearts of the American people as a sacred thing, which no ruthless hand would ever dare to disturb." This was the effect of that compromise. Slavery could not enter that Territory. This compromise stood as a wall against slave immigration, and protected those Territories from the blighting curse of human bondage.

It is said by the gentlemen who contend that these fundamental conditions are null and void, that the condition which was imposed on Missouri in 1821 was all right enough. It seems that in the adoption of her constitution, one clause excluded the immigration of free negroes into the State. Congress put a condition in the act of admission which provided, that nothing in that clause should be so construed as to interfere with, or deprive citizens of the United States of their rights. This it is admitted was a good condition; and why? Because it prevented the State of Missouri ever afterward from violating the Constitution of the United States, by the exclusion of citizens of the United States from entering that State. Now, sir, our argument is this: that this condition, which we offer to impose upon the States which are to be restored to their full relations in this Union, is to prevent the State from violating the Constitution of the United States, in that most important and vital of all points, the depriving a whole race of their right of suffrage, and other rights under the Constitution.

The doctrine for which I contend is, that Congress has the right and the power to enforce by laws "necessary and proper," in the language of the Constitution, a republican government in every State of the United States, whether that State is to be received into the Union, or is already in the Union. The power to establish republican governments devolves upon Congress in the last resort. In the first instance, it may be committed to the States; but Congress has the revisory power. Congress, under the Constitution, is required to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government. Then the concluding clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution declares, that Congress shall have authority to carry into effect all the enumerated powers of the Constitution, by passing laws necessary and proper for that purpose, and also shall have power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect any power vested in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. The power is vested in, and the duty imposed upon, Congress of guarantying to each State, a republican form of government, and Congress is authorized, and, in fact, required, by necessary and proper laws, to carry into execution that guaranty.

This doctrine is not at all startling when Senators look at the ground whereon they stand, and see how they have already committed themselves, and consider what immeasurable benefits will flow to the people of this country, by settling the question of slavery and all its incidents by taking the question of suffrage out of the arena of American politics, by settling it upon principles just and fair to every section of the Union, by placing each State upon an equal footing with every other State, and each citizen of the United States upon an equal footing with every other citizen of the United States. Sir, when this doctrine can be sustained upon such clear demonstration, it ought not to startle Senators.

Mr. President, it has been said sarcastically, that upon this question, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is radical. It is said to me, that I follow in the wake of the Senator from Massachusetts. Sir, I do not follow in any man's wake; but I do not object to this accusation. I do not deem it a reproach to be a disciple of that distinguished Senator, the worthy representative of that grand old

SENATE.

Commonwealth "where American liberty raised its first voice."

For a quarter of a century that Senator [Mr. SUMNER] has been the fearless champion of human rights. He has occupied the advanced guard, the outpost in the army of progress. Triumphant over calumny and unawed by personal violence, with a keen, prophetic eye upon the great result to be attained, with the scimeter of truth and justice in his hand, and the banner of the Union over his head, he has pressed onward to the goal of final victory. Although yet in the vigor of his manhood, he has lived to see the small band of pioneers who stood by him swollen to mighty millions. His views have already been embraced and lauded as the wisest statesmanship. They have been written upon the very frontispiece of the age in which he lives; written in the history of the mighty events which are transpiring around us; written in the constitutions and the laws, both national and State, of his country. Where he stood yesterday other statesmen stand to-day. Where he stands in 1868 other statesmen will stand in 1872. Say what we may, there are none in this country who can contest the right of his tall plume to wave at the head of freedom's all-conquering hosts.

Mr. President, I wish it understood that I do not antagonize the Chicago platform. The ground that I take is in entire accord and harmony with it. That platform says what I do, that the question of suffrage belongs to the States—so I say, that the question of suffrage belongs in the first instance, to the States, but if the States shall in prescribing the qualifications of voters so prescribe them as to disfranchise a portion of citizens arbitrarily, and thus render the government anti-republican, then Congress is required to intervene and make it a republican form of government.

I confess that recent events, and especially the course of President Johnson, have satisfied me that too much reliance is not to be placed upon mere paper edicts which we style platforms. Measures, not men, was once the doctrine, but my doctrine now is: both men and measures. A good platform in the hands of bad men is of not much avail. With men of the unquestioned integrity, wise statesmanship, and lofty patriotism of Grant and Colfax, we can trust the helm of the ship of State, and feel secure that no narrow creeds, but the good of the people and the prosperity of the Republic, will be the pillars of fire to lead and guide them in the administration of the Government.

I consider myself fortunate in being able to sustain the view of the case I have taken, by the strong authority of Mr. Madison, as set forth in the Debates of the Virginia Convention, page 261:

"With respect to the other point it was thought that the regulation of time, place, and manner of electing the Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise. The diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated unequally now in some of the States, particularly in South Carolina, with respect to Charleston which is represented by thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage it was proper that it should be remedied by the General Government. It was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of these in the first place to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And considering the State government and General Government as different bodies, acting in different and independent capacities, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments, the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised."

I add to this the declarations of Alexander Hamilton, set forth in the following extract from the Federalist, paper No. 69:

"It will, I presume, be as readily conceded, that there were only three ways in which this power could have been reasonably organized; that it must either have been lodged wholly in the national Legislature, or wholly in the State Legislatures, or primarily in the latter, and ultimately in the former. The last mode has with reason been preferred by the convention. They have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government in the first instance, to the local administrations; which in ordinary cases, and where no improper views prevail, may be both more convenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interfere, whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety.

Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the national Government, in the hands of the State Legislatures, would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy. They could at any moment annihilate it by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs. It is to little purpose to say, that a neglect or omission of this kind would not be likely to take place. The constitutional impossibility of the thing, without an equivalent for the risk, is an unanswerable objection. Nor has any satisfactory reason been yet assigned for incurring that risk. The extravagant surmises of a distempered jealousy can never be dignified with that character. If we are in humor to presume abuses of power, it is as fair to presume them on the part of the State governments as on the part of the General Government. And as it is more consonant to the rules of a just theory to intrust the Union with the care of its own existence, than to transfer that care to any other hands; if abuses of power are to be hazarded on the one side or on the other, it is more rational to hazard them where the power would naturally be placed, than where it would unnaturally be placed."

I shall embody in my speech, the positions assumed by Senators on this floor. For instance, I refer to the position which was taken by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who said a day or two since:

"I contend that every State has the right to regulate the question of suffrage and to amend her constitution in any particular from time to time, so that it does not cease to be republican in its character."

"Mr. EDMUNDS. Who is to judge of that?"

"Mr. MORTON. I suppose that is a question to be judged of by Congress."

Suppose the State fails to establish a government republican in its character, what then? Who is to judge whether it is republican or anti-republican? "I suppose," said he, "that is a question to be judged of by Congress." My colleague, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] while he asserts the exclusive power in the States over the suffrage question, still admits enough for the purposes of this argument:

"Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When the times comes that any of the States of this Union so change their constitutions as to set up something different from a republican government, the Government of the United States may interfere."

He and I may differ as to what may be a republican form of government, but that he commits himself to the power of Congress to intervene, in case the State government is not republican, is, I think, to be inferred from his speech.

He says further:

"I am not prepared to say what steps should be taken in case the State of Nebraska should hereafter change its constitution, and in that change adopt a different rule in regard to suffrage from that which was recognized at the time the State was admitted. Perhaps we could find some way to compel the State of Nebraska to allow the same persons to vote that it agreed it would allow to vote when it was admitted into the Union; but we should have to find that way out then; we cannot provide for it now."

He acknowledges that perhaps there is power somewhere, in cases of failure on the part of the State to comply with the condition, and I assert, you cannot trace it to any source except Congress. The remarks of other Senators go to show that they admit that this revisory power is in Congress. I read from the same debate, the views taken by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] and the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING:]

"Mr. STEWART. We do not pretend to determine at what point Congress should interfere under the authority of the guarantee clause. That will be for a future Congress when the question comes up. That there are times when it should interfere the Senator from New York now admits."

"Mr. CONKLING. Certainly."

"Mr. STEWART. Every man who reads the Constitution must admit that there may be times when the Congress should interfere upon the question of suffrage."

Now, sir, here these Senators, who have asserted that the exclusive power over suffrage is in the States, admit away their whole case. They admit fully the power of Congress to revise the action of the States upon the suffrage question. The right to exercise the power is clearly admitted. Whether it shall exercise the power to pass all laws which are necessary and proper to carry into execution this clause of guaranty, depends upon whether the State government is a republican form of government. That is the question.

On the 22d day of January, 1866, I introduced a bill into the Senate of the United States, and defended it in a speech of considerable length, in which I took the position that Congress had this revisory power, and that wherever a State had an anti-republican government, it was the duty of Congress to interfere and make it a republican form of government; and I am glad to be supported in that view now, by such distinguished authorities as the Senators whose remarks I have quoted. If that bill had then become a law, by this time, no vestige of this question would be left to disturb the harmony of the nation.

I quote from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] March 7, 1866, which will show that I was in advance even of him for congressional legislation for suffrage in the South as well as the North:

"Something has been said of the form in which the proposition has been presented. There is the bill of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] which he has maintained in a speech of singular originality and power, that has not been answered, and I do not hesitate to say cannot be answered. By this bill it is provided that all citizens in any State or Territory shall be protected in the full and equal enjoyment and exercise of their civil and political rights, including the right of suffrage."

"Not doubting the power of Congress to carry out this principle everywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States, I content myself for the present by asserting it only in the lapsed States lately in rebellion, where the twofold duty to guaranty a republican government and to enforce the abolition of slavery is beyond question. To that extent I now urge it."

Now, I come to consider the clauses of the Constitution affecting the question of the power of Congress, or the States, over the question of suffrage. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] thinks that the whole gospel of the Constitution is contained in chapter ten of the amendments, which provides that—

Unfortunately for his position, this power to guaranty republican governments is "delegated to the United States," and the Constitution says, that wherever a power is vested by the Constitution, in the Government of the United States, Congress shall execute that power. I quote the clause:

"ART. I. Certain powers having been enumerated, these words follow in section eight: 'To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.'"

Thus it is seen, that it is for Congress to carry into effect the various powers vested in the Government of the United States. How is Congress to do this? By all laws necessary and proper to that end.

The thing is very plain. We see that the same clause which authorizes Congress to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry the enumerated powers into effect, says, that Congress shall have power to pass all necessary and proper laws to carry into effect "all other powers" vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States.

I say, then, that it is the duty of Congress, to do what I propose: by a necessary and proper law, to guaranty to every State in the Union, a republican form of government. Article four, section four, of the Constitution is as follows:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

A guarantor is one who undertakes to do a thing, which another has undertaken to do, provided that other fails. Now, suppose South Carolina, or any other State, should in its constitution insert the word "black" before the word "inhabitants," so as to provide that "all black inhabitants shall be electors," would Congress intervene? Would Congress, having the power to guaranty republican forms of government, sit still, and see white citizens excluded from the suffrage by the constitution of South Carolina? Does any Senator dare to answer categorically "Yes" to that proposition? I should like to see the Senator who is bold enough to answer it in that way. Kentucky says that her electors shall be all white inhabitants, and she excludes every other than the white race. Maryland does the same thing, and Illinois does the same thing. Will you intervene, will you exercise the power conferred on you by the Constitution, or will you bow ignobly to the prejudice of caste and race? Will you decline to intervene where black people are excluded, and intervene where white people are excluded?

Mr. President, if we had expended the time to find out power in the Constitution, for Congress to confer upon men their rights, and to establish and preserve a republican form of government, if we had examined the Constitution closely and critically with a view to find out this power, instead of trying to find that Congress has not the power to guaranty a republican form of government, by securing to all men their rights, we should have been more successful. For instance, take section two of article one. This is the groundwork of the claim of exclusive State jurisdiction over the question of suffrage. It is as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

If the States have exclusive power over this question they get it from that section of the Constitution. How do they get it from this section? According to the construction of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] they get it by implication, in this way: it provides that the Legislatures shall be chosen by the people of the State, and these same people who choose members of the Legislature, are made the electors of Representatives in Congress. Is there any more implication in favor of the exercise of the power in this clause by the Legislatures of the States, than there is implication in favor of the exercise of the power by Congress itself? It may be said to me, "Surely you would not contend that Congress should declare who shall elect members of the State Legislature." I would not; I would not think that very appropriate; I would not think it was doing the thing in the right way exactly. But is it more appropriate, that the Legislature shall decide who are to vote for members of the Legislature, than that Congress should say who are to vote for members of Congress? With much propriety can I say, that Congress shall define the rights and qualifications of the citizens of the United States, for the sake of uniformity in citizenship, and as a matter of self-national preservation, and not leave the question, who shall be citizens of the United States to thirty-six different States, and have as many different standards of citizenship as there are States in the Union. But, sir, I waive this view of the case, because the uniform construction has been that the question belonged to the States in the first instance, and I do not propose now, to question that construction.

But this section of the Constitution says that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members "chosen every second year." By whom? "By the people." Suppose that any State constitution says that a part of the people shall not be embraced in choosing Representatives; suppose it excludes any particular class: is not that State in conflict with this provision of this Constitution, because all the people are not represented, and are not consulted in choosing their Representatives? There can be no mistake upon this point. Members of the Legislature, and members of Congress are to be chosen "by the people." The "people" in each case are to be the electors; and those who vote for members of Congress, are to have the same qualifications as the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Most clearly, if the Constitution of a State, or the laws of a Legislature, so fix the qualifications of voters as to exclude any portion of the people on the ground of race or color, it is in conflict with this clause of the Constitution, which provides that the people, not a part of the people, not half of the people, not white people, or black people, but all the people, shall be represented in the choice of their representatives, State and national.

I think I have shown, that all Senators on this side of the Chamber admit that Congress has a right to pass all laws necessary and proper to guaranty to a State a republican form of government, provided the States adopt constitutions which are not republican forms of government.

Then, sir, the issue is clearly narrowed down to the question, What is a republican government? Whenever it can be shown that States have violated this great fundamental idea, it is clearly the duty of Congress to intervene.

My colleague [Mr. TRUMBULL] says, in a letter, published in The Advance, a newspaper in Chicago, that "a republican form of government does not depend upon the numbers of the people who participate in the primary elections for members of Congress." It is true, that it does not exclusively depend on the numbers of people who vote. Minors may be excluded; other persons may be excluded on account of certain disabilities. But while a republican government does not depend on the numbers who constitute the body politic, it does depend largely on the question, whether any large portion of the people are excluded from the benefit of suffrage, on the ground of race, color, or previous condition. Let me put a case to test the question. Suppose that in carrying out the provision of the second section of the first article of the Constitution, the constitution of some State should say, that Germans should not participate in the choice of members of the Legislature and Representatives in Congress; would that be a republican form of government? Suppose that Illinois, where we have a large mass of Germans, a most intelligent, industrious, and thrifty population, who constitute a large portion of the Republican strength in that State, and who are almost universally the friends of freedom, loyal to the Government, and gallant defenders of the flag; suppose that the constitution of the State of Illinois should be altered so as to say, that the people who are to choose members of Congress and members of the State Legislature should not include any person of German birth, would it not be anti-republican in form? Does any man dare to say that it would not be the duty of Congress to intervene to restore to those Germans their rights, to declare the constitution of the State, so far as it excluded this large class of our fellow citizens, to be not republican in its features? Suppose that the people of Utah should exclude from the polls everybody but Mormons, followers of their faith; suppose that Connecticut should exclude everybody except Congregationalists; or Maryland everybody except Catholics, would it not be our duty to intervene, and make those governments republican in form? And yet, when it is proposed to enfranchise the negro, we bow to the prejudice of caste, and say that a State government is republican in form, whether it excludes the colored man or not.

If I am asked whether there must not be some limitations, I reply, yes; but not total exclusion; there may be temporary disabilities, of age, residence, and other disabilities; but the difference between making temporary provisions as to a class, and the total exclusion of a whole race of our fellow-citizens, is very apparent.

Mr. CONKLING. By permission of the Senator I beg to ask him a question. He says that fixing qualifications as to residence and age is within the power of the States, as I understand him. I beg to inquire whether, if the State of Illinois should say that voting should be confined to persons upward of forty-five years of age, and who had resided in the State of Illinois at least twenty-five years, such a provision as that would be republican, in his judgment?

Mr. YATES. Exclusions from suffrage for a time, and which apply to all men alike, are allowable. If all men are excluded, men of all races, unless they are of suitable age, from voting, I do not see anything which would conflict with its being a republican form of government. Equality is the basis of a republican government. The Senator seems to forget the idea which enters into the definition of a truly republican government. He was very sound yesterday, or some other Senator was very sound in my view, when he said, it did not depend on Congress to say what sort of statutes of limitation a State should have as to the payment of debts, applicable to all citizens alike, but Congress shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government; and the test whether a government is republican, depends upon whether it grants to all citizens alike the same privileges, and imposes upon all citizens the same disabilities and duties. To define the length of residence necessary to enable a man to vote, to say what his age shall be, is one thing; and to say that he shall not vote at all because he is black or white, is an entirely different thing. In the latter case, color is made the disqualification, just as race would be if Germans were excluded from the ballot-box. The State may preserve a right; it may fix the qualifications; it may impose certain restrictions so as to have that right preserved in the best form to the people; but it is not legitimately in the power of the State, it is not in the power of the Congress of the United States, it is not in any earthly power to destroy a man's equal rights to his property, to his franchise, to his suffrage, or to the right to aspire to office—I mean according to the true theory of a republican government. That is the one thing, that in this country, the Government cannot do.

The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] will remember, that if a State constitution should do so unwise a thing as to debar from the polls all men till forty-five years of age, there is a question behind that. Who made the constitution? Were all men, of all races and colors permitted to vote on the question whether that limitation should be put on all alike? If he means that in the State of New York, where only a portion of the people can vote, that that portion of the people have a right to impose such a limitation on others who have no voice in making the limitation, then most clearly such a provision would be anti-republican. My answer to him is, that such a provision as he mentions, would establish an oligarchy, and therefore be unconstitutional, while a reasonable limitation as to age is not only proper, but absolutely necessary, and if made applicable to all men alike would be constitutional.

The Senator from New York will ask me, perhaps—I address myself to him simply because he sits before me—"Do you not consider Illinois a republican government? Do not you consider New York a republican government?"

I answer that question by asking another: Does New York exclude from suffrage, among the people who are to choose members of the Legislature, any large class of its citizens? and then I leave him to answer whether a government that does that is republican.

Mr. President, I say to Senators that we must look at things as they are. The disabilities which heretofore existed against the black man have been removed. Even admitting the soundness of the hard ruling of the Dred Scott decision, what was it? That the black man was not a citizen because he belonged to a subject race, because a slave has no will, and therefore cannot vote, and hence is excluded from the body-politic. But now, that disability is removed; slavery is dead and will have no resurrection; the genius of civilization touched it, and it fell; the light of the nineteenth century blazed upon it, and it faded away. By the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution, slavery was abolished throughout the land, and Congress was required "by appropriate legislation" to enforce emancipation. By this emancipation, the disabilities which attached to the colored race are removed, and the colored man stands before the country and the world a freeman and a citizen; emancipated into the sovereignty, one of the people, one of the body-politic, and is entitled to the same rights and privileges that any other citizen, of whatever color, may enjoy.

I admit, sir, in the language of the Chicago platform, if you choose, that in the first instance, the right of suffrage belongs properly to the States to regulate for themselves; but it is subject to the Constitution of the United States, to the Constitution as it is amended; and especially to that particular clause in the Constitution which says, that Congress shall guaranty to every State in this Union, a republican form of government.

Now, let me repeat the question: What is a republican form of government? Mr. Madison, in the forty-second number of the Federalist, says: "The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government," and he speaks at length on that subject. I only read enough to show that the question, who shall vote, is of the essence of a republican government, and enters into the definition of what is to be considered a republican form of government.

Mr. Madison further says in the Federalist, No. 57:

"Let me now ask, what circumstance there is in the constitution of the House of Representatives that violates the principles of republican government, or favors the elevation of the few on the ruins of the many? Let me ask, whether every circumstance is not, on the contrary, strictly conformable to these principles; and scrupulously impartial to the rights and pretensions of every class and description of citizens? Who are to be the electors of the Federal Representatives? Not the rich, more than the poor; not the learned, more than the ignorant; not the haughty heirs of distinguished names, more than the humble sons of obscurity and unpropitious fortune. The electors are to be the great body of the people of the United States. They are to be the same who exercise the right in every State of electing the correspondent branch of the Legislature of the State."

Now, what I say emphatically, and what the people of this country will indorse, is, that in the light of the Declaration of American Independence, in the light of the Constitution of the United States as amended, any State government which excludes one large class of citizens from suffrage is not a republican government. It must embrace the representation of the great body of the people without distinction of race or color. I maintain that proposition, and I say that no Senator can maintain the reverse. I say emphatically, that the equal right of every man to vote and to aspire to office is essential to republican government, and if he is deprived of that right, the government which deprives him of it is not republican.

Sir, in its spirit and in its letter, and in substance, the adverse plea is bad. The very essence, marrow, and life of a republican government, the very basis of republican government, is equality of all its citizens. The question whether any class of citizens can be excluded from the right of suffrage, is a vital and a fundamental question. It is the only question to be decided in this argument. It is subterranean, it runs under the very foundation corners of republican government, and if you acknowledge the right to thus exclude any class of citizens, you loosen the earth around and beneath the corner-stones and the structure will fall. Whenever a Government attempts to exclude any large class of its citizens from the rights which it gives to other citizens, it ceases to be republican. Such exclusion stamps it with the brand of an oligarchy as indelibly as did the spot of blood on the hand of Lady Macbeth stamp her as a murderess.

And the argument that Illinois or New York or Ohio is a republican form of government, if it excludes any large class of citizens on account of race, color, or previous condition, if we are to judge it according to the foundation theories of our governmental system, is not worthy of a child ten years old.

The Republican masses of the country understand it, and last year the Republicans of Ohio tried to make their government republican, to make it conform to the Constitution of the United States, by conferring the elective franchise upon all her people without regard to race, color, or previous condition.

I am not asking what is an approximation to a republican form of government; I am not inquiring whether Illinois is not more republican than some Government in Europe or than some other State. I am not trying to decide that question; but I am trying to decide the only issue that is before the American people, and that is presented by the Constitution of the United States, namely, whether any Government which excludes a citizen from his rights, except for mere temporary disability, such as age, or residence, or crime, is a republican form of government. Why, sir, a man's right to vote is as sacred as any other right that he has. To rob a man of that right is as wicked as the law of slavery, which robs him of his wife, or child, or of himself.

What is the theory upon which the Government of the United States was built? What was the cause of the Revolution? For what did our fathers fight, but the principle that taxation and representation must go together, and that all just government must be founded upon the consent of the governed, not a part of the governed, not half of the governed, not an oligarchy, but upon the consent of all the people? A majority of all the people of the United States are to decide those questions by which the rights of all are protected, the will of all is represented, and the Government itself is maintained and preserved. Go back to revolutionary days; go back to the door-steps of those little meetings of our fathers, as they stood up with wounds yet bleeding, fresh from the Revolution, and with the blood and sweat of battle running down their furrowed cheeks; listen to their discussions, and what do you hear? Their only remonstrance against the mother country was her asserted right to tax the Colonies without their consent. This was the initial cause of the Revolution. It was for this that the blood of our fathers consecrated the battle-fields of the Revolution; it was for this that John Hancock and James Otis spoke; it was for this that Warren fell—a denial of the right of Government to tax the people without their consent.

This power in Congress to guaranty a republican form of government to the States is a mighty and a vital power. It is the wisest power in the Constitution. It is the only power by which the national Government can preserve its nationality, by which it can secure equal representation, by which it can put the States upon an equality. It is the doctrine that was designed to protect the States in their rights in the true sense of "State rights," so that all the States should be upon an equal footing, and the citizens of each State should enjoy all their rights in every State of the Union. As the Senator from Massachusetts well said in one of his speeches, "this guarantee clause has been a sleeping giant but recently awakened during the war, and now comes forth with a giant's power."

Sir, what is the duty of the Republican party? What position should the Republican party take? Will they stand back appalled by the statement that the question is settled? Will they join the State-rights party upon the other side of the House, and in the South, and say that Congress has not the means for its own preservation in its hands, and assert the doctrine of State rights, by which the leaders of the rebellion are to control the legislation and the destinies of this country?

Mr. President, I wish to say to Senators and Representatives, and to all of the Republican party, that we have to meet this question of suffrage. It must be met. It confronts us in the next elections. It confronts us in the new relations of five million people set free. It confronts us in the imperious demand made by the emancipated race for enfranchisement. We cannot ignore the question. Burying your head in the sand will not obscure you from the keen gaze of the pursuer. Your opponents will meet you upon every stamp, and ask you whether you are for universal manhood suffrage. It cannot be dodged. No question of finance, or banks, or currency, or tariffs, can obscure this mighty moral question of the age. No glare of military glory, not even the mighty name of General Grant, can stifle the determination of the people to finally consummate the great end and aim for which the Republican party was brought into being. We are to be for or against suffrage. If we are for it, how many States shall we lose? I mean as a State question. How many will there be like Ohio, bowing to the prejudice of color and caste and afraid to proclaim their honest sentiments? How many States shall we lose if we are for it? If we ignore it, if we give the lie to the whole record of our lives and evade it, try to dodge it, then, I think I can speak for Illinois alone, we shall be beaten by fifty thousand majority upon a vote taken in that State.

How, then, do I propose to settle this whole question? The States have in the first instance acted upon it; they have established governments which are not republican in so far as they exclude portions of the people from the ballot-box, and I would by a bill not ten lines in length declare that no State shall in its constitution or laws, make any distinction in the qualifications of electors, on the ground of color, caste, or race, and that all the provisions of any constitution, or law of any State, which exclude persons from the elective franchise on the ground aforesaid, shall be null and void.

Such a law would be constitutional and just to every section, just to all the people; and the people instead of opposing it, would hail it with joy and gladness. They would pronounce it the wisest act that the Congress of the United States had ever performed, because it would remove this bone of contention from the arena of State politics; it would forever settle this disturbing question; it would make citizenship uniform in every State of the Union. And if we would exercise our power "by laws necessary and proper" to pass such a bill as this, the effect would be salutary, and would result in the final and certain triumph of the Republican party. I know, sir, what timidity suggests to the minds of Senators, but a bold, honest, straightforward course would set this country right upon this question, and we should gloriously triumph in every election.

Shall the party which has come up through great tribulation, has faced all these questions, the abolition of the slave traffic in the District of Columbia, the abolition of slavery in the District, the fugitive slave law, the emancipation of the slaves, the employment of colored troops, the establishment of negro suffrage in the District of Columbia and in the rebel States, shall the party now hesitate before it takes the last final step of a full, complete, and glorious triumph?

Sir, the people do not understand that argument which says that Congress may confer upon a man his civil rights and not his political rights. It is the pleading of a lawyer; it is too narrow for statesmanship. They do not understand why a man should have the right to hold property, to bring suits, to testify in courts of justice, and not have the right to a voice in the selection of the rulers by whom he is to be governed, and in making the laws by which he is to be bound. Shall he have civil rights without the power of protecting himself in the enjoyment of them? What is liberty, what is emancipation without enfranchisement? What is the abolition of slavery, unless you employ the power conferred upon you by the Constitution, as amended, "to enforce by appropriate legislation" the rights of the emancipated slave? Shall this party which has been the champion of the equality of all men, which has proclaimed it upon the housetops everywhere throughout the land, now shrink from asserting practically the equal rights of all men of this race? Shall we draw Mason and Dixon's line between the right to vote in the North and in the South? Shall we impose on the South, the votes of four or five million ignorant people just released from slavery, and refuse it to the more enlightened and intelligent colored men of the North, who are much fewer in number? Is that the position of the great Republican party? Will it hesitate to exercise a power clearly vested in Congress by the Constitution of the United States, and to confer the same rights upon all the people, in every section, North as well as South, East as well as West? Will you by doing injustice—yes, sir, absolute injustice—to the free colored men of the North, lose their votes in the coming presidential election, and in the States where the balance of power would be in their hands?

You know well that the argument was used with wonderful effect in Ohio, that argument which lost us our valued Senator, [Mr. WADE]; that while we, the great Republican party, could impose equal suffrage on the southern people, we were not willing to impose it upon ourselves; that while we could do justice to the loyal millions of ignorant black men in the South we could not do justice to the loyal thousands of intelligent black men in the North. I refer to this because to this issue we are forced, and we might as well face it at once. The power is with us. We have exercised the power in the southern States. We have the same power in the northern States, and every consideration of justice, expediency, and success demands the prompt exercise of the power.

I know it is asked, Why not have the Constitution amended? I ask, why have it amended? When the Constitution says, that we shall by necessary and proper laws, carry into effect this provision of the Constitution, when we have the power by law to do it already, why have a constitutional amendment? We have not time—we cannot wait for an amendment to the Constitution. How long would it be before Kentucky would consent, by agreeing to ratify such a constitutional amendment, to give enfranchisement to her colored population? At least fifty years; and so of Maryland, and of many northern States. A constitutional amendment will not accomplish the object. By waiting for that we shall commit the same mistake that we committed when we did not, at the end of the war, declare all the slave States, except Missouri, disloyal, and act for them all as disloyal States. Such a constitutional amendment would, perhaps, never be adopted. I say there is no necessity for amending your Constitution in this way. Use the power; you have it. Read your Constitution; understand it; you need not amend it; but exercise the power it clearly confers.

It is said that such a law would be subject to repeal if Congress were to pass it. That is true; but then I have the authority of my colleague, and I have the authority of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN], for saying that such a law would not be repealed. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said the other day, that when these rights are once conferred, they will never be given back. My colleague said, and truly said, that when these men once get these rights, they will never give them up, and as the Senator from Ohio well said, the tendency of all legislation of this day, is in favor of the extension of the right of suffrage.

Mr. President, it is "the era of good feeling" we want, such as existed in Monroe's administration, when all questions were settled, when all the States were in harmony each with the other. This question settled we will have an "era of good feeling," States all the same in their rights, individuals having the same rights, no sectional jealousies, this disturbance removed from politics entirely. There is no way under the sun by which it can be done, but for Congress to exercise its just and constitutional powers by a law for that purpose, and not throw the question into the caldron of State politics, a bone of contention, there to divide the people, it may be for fifty years to come. Rather let us, by one sublime act of nationality, broad as the clause of the constitution abolishing slavery, confer these rights upon every citizen in every State of the Union.

The Republican party cannot stand still. If it stands still, or recedes, it dies. It must move forward. When we set five million people free they had to be taken care of. They had to be made citizens. But are they taken care of, when we deprive them of the rights which belong to other citizens? Will the Republican party fail to take this last final step in this mighty onward movement of human progress? Sir, suppose the almighty Architect of the Universe, after he had created the heavens and the earth, the sun and the moon and the stars, on the sixth day, had ceased his work, and not created man and breathed into him the breath of an immortal soul. So would it now be, if the Republican party, after vindicating the beautiful and beneficent system of government designed by the genius of our revolutionary sires, should fail to consummate the last great act, and admit to equal enjoyment with themselves, the immortal millions, who for two hundred years have sighed and suffered under our rule.

I know, sir, that the other party say that the Republican party are attempting to establish the supremacy of negro rule. I wish to say in regard to that, simply that with no decent regard to truth can any man say that the Republican party propose to establish the supremacy of negro rule. You cannot point me to the declaration of a Senator, or of a politician; or of a newspaper of the Republican party, that says the Republican party is proposing to establish the dominion of negroes over the country. No, sir; that is not the doctrine of the Republican party. The doctrine of the Republican party is the equality of all men, and the supremacy and rule of all men. I might, with much more propriety, say that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] is trying to establish rebel rule in this country than he can say the Republican party is trying to establish negro rule, because, he is willing to enfranchise the leaders of the rebellion, the men who organized civil war, the men whose hands are red with the blood of our country's defenders, and whose lips are fresh with perjury; when he is willing to take them into the high places of the Government, to allow them to resume their former positions of power, and sway, I may truly say that he is in favor of rebel rule, but I deny that it can be said that any Republican Senator has ever declared anywhere, that he was in favor of negro rule.

Now, Mr. President, the cry of negro equality is equally senseless and groundless. Statesmanship, nor constitutions, nor laws, nothing can make all men equal in fact. From what a lofty, shining light would Frederick Douglass have to fall, to reach the low level of Andrew Johnson? Far as the angels fell.

"Hurled headlong flaming from the ethereal sky."

* * * * *
"Nine times the space that measures day and night
To mortal men."

Statesmanship, however, can confer upon men the same chances in life, the same protection, the same laws, the same privileges, the same rights of every kind.

The fact that one race is superior to another is no warrant for its having superior advantages; on the other hand, if there is any advantage, it should rather be in favor of protection to the meek, the humble, and the lowly. I believe, myself, that the pure American Anglo-Saxon man is the highest style in all God's created humanity, and therefore I believe he can fight his way through, without having an advantage by law over his poor colored neighbor and fellow-citizen, and that he is not in danger of being subjected to that negro rule and supremacy, of which so much is said.

It is contended by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] that there should be a qualification, that only those who can read and write should vote. I reply to this, that we ourselves, by our own action, have conferred suffrage upon those who cannot read and write. Providence overruled us in this regard. In order to have loyal States in the South, we were compelled to confer suffrage upon those who could not read and write. On the other hand, there are thousands of white men in the State of Kentucky, and in the State of Illinois, and in every other State, who cannot read and write, and yet who make good citizens. We cannot, by any principle of equality, confer suffrage upon any favorite class, either of intelligence, wealth, birth, or fortune. There is this advantage in universal suffrage: that the masses, though ignorant, are honest, and they are a check upon the intelligent oligarchy, to whom, I am sorry to say, have been traced mistakes and corruption upon many and many a bloody page of history in all times past.

The true theory is to trust the Government of the American people as our fathers made it, to the consent of the governed, founded upon the rights of all the people, to the strong common sense of all the people. There is more virtue and more intelligence in all the people, than there is in a part of the people. All the people, all the virtuous people, all the wise people, all the ignorant people, must be consulted. We must trust that one force will counterpoise the other in the future, as it has done in the past.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is a very learned man; but I would not be willing to trust the legislation of this country in the hands of a hundred men like him. Professor Agassiz is a very classic man. We live with Longfellow in his poetry. Henry Ward Beecher and Theodore Tilton are men of rare genius, sparkling wit, and surpassing eloquence; and yet I would not trust the government of this people in the hands of such men alone. I take it that the banker knows more about finances than the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] does, because his pursuits are different; the merchant knows more about barter and trade, and the poor man knows the wants of poverty, and the wants of the people, better than the rich or the intelligent. Jeff. Davis is an educated man—educated at the expense of that Government at whose throat he made an infernal leap. Robert Toombs is an educated man. I would rather trust the government of the people of the United States to the hands of all the people, to the hands of the humblest laborer who was loyal, and who had an honest heart, who was devoted to his country, than to any oligarchy or favored few.

Sir, it is the ballot which is to be the great educator. The fact that men have an interest in the Government, that they have the right to vote and hold office, is an incentive to them to inform themselves. This is the reason why education is more universally diffused in the United States than in any other country. This is the reason why we have schools and colleges everywhere in our midst. They are the offspring of the molding influences of our free institutions. They are born of the ballot.

Much has been said about the results of the recent elections. Mr. President, if the Republican party will stand to its guns, will stand upon the platform which in its past record it has made for itself, will stand by the consequences of its own teachings, I have no fears for the result. As for myself, sir, as I did three years ago, so now I "accept the situation." I nail the colors of universal suffrage to the masthead; and I am for it by act of Congress, guarantying a republican government to every State in the Union, East as well as West, North as well as South.

I do not propose to arraign the Democratic party. I will only say this: they have been the consistent opponents of the war from the start. The rebellion could not have stood on its legs a single year without its aid and cooperation. The Democratic party, as an organization, has been part and parcel, yea, the very heart and life of the rebellion itself. It has furnished it its leaders, its aid and sympathies. In their conventions, in their platforms, in their presses, in Congress, in their Legislatures, they opposed every measure for a vigorous prosecution of the war. Sir, I well remember when in the western States, in 1862 and 1863, the Democratic Legislatures were nothing more nor less than rebel camps in the capitals of those States in which they met. They passed resolutions denouncing the war, and threw every obstacle in our way, as ever since, they have persistently resisted every measure by Congress, for the speedy and proper reconstruction of the Union.

What patriot can ever forget the Democratic National Convention at Chicago of July 29, 1864, presided over by Horatio Seymour and engineered by Vallandigham, when the whole weight and power of the Democratic party were thrown in favor of the enemies of the country? It was at that fearful crisis in the history of the country, when the scales hung even, when Sherman and our brave boys in blue were moving on through Dalton, over Lookout mountain, and Mission Ridge, and from Atlanta to the sea, amid shot and shell, and the war and thunder of battle; when Sheridan was sweeping along the valley of the Shenandoah, and when Grant was struggling in that hand-to-hand fight through the Wilderness; when our losses were counted by thousands; when the question of English intervention hung doubtful in the scales; when the good Lincoln, through the weary watches of the night, with long strides nervously paced his executive chamber awaiting, tremblingly, dispatches from the Army. It was while events like these were transpiring that the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, representing the party in every State of the Union, passed, amid heaven-rending huzzas, with all the forms of parliamentary solemnity, that resolution, forever black with the imperishable stain of treason, that the war, after four years of fighting, was a failure, and that the public welfare demanded an immediate cessation of hostilities.

That party even now charge it as the great crime of the Republican party, that it disfranchises the leading rebels. They proclaim that those States which made war upon the Government, and set up governments in direct antagonism to our own, are lawful States in the Union, having the right all the time during the war, and now, to send their Senators and Representatives unquestioned, to take their seats in the Congress of the United States.

And, sir, to the great shame of the Democratic party, while they would receive with open arms into Congress, the leaders of that party which organized the rebellion, brought on the war, filled the land with mourning and desolation, and by plunder and piracy, by arson and murder, by perjury and by poison, by the slow tortures of starvation, and by every savage and infernal cruelty shocking in the sight of God and man; while they would bring them back, and introduce them to the high places of power, to resume their former influence in the Government, they descend to the unworthy work of belittling the loyal blacks, and unblushingly advocate the disfranchisement of those men of another race who guided and cheered our boys in blue, and won their title to the nation's gratitude by deeds of imperishable valor.

If I had time I could turn to the brighter record of the Republican party, show its record bright with the country saved from the hands of the spoiler, and the banner of the Union planted upon every battlement where traitor hands had put it down. But I refer to it only in one aspect, as it may bear upon the enfranchisement of the race it set free.

Deplorable as war was, it has had its compensations. Slavery is dead, and will know no resurrection; that most accursed chatteling of human beings, the auction-block, the tearing asunder of mother and child, the day of stripes and the lash, the revolver and the bowie-knife, are past. Dens and caverns, the pursuing bloodhounds, mountains climbed and rivers crossed and no escape from the Constitution and the laws—these have past. What a sublime result, that not a single slave clanks his chains upon one inch of American soil, and that the nations hail with shouts of joy the banner of universal emancipation! Thanks to God; thanks to the Anti-Slavery Society; thanks to Parker, Garrison, Henry Ward Beecher, Wendell Phillips, and all the pioneers in the anti-slavery cause; thanks to the Republican party and the Thirty-Ninth Congress; thanks to Grant and Sheridan and Sherman and our brave boys in blue everywhere; thanks to Abraham Lincoln for the proclamation of emancipation; thanks to all who labored, suffered, and achieved, who fought and who fell for this lifting up to light and liberty and citizenship five millions of God's long-oppressed and downtrodden poor; but thanks also to the poor freedman himself, for he, too, has borne himself most nobly. Of them it may be said, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." How humbly have they walked, poor slaves and outcasts! no law for them, no home, no property, no name, no wife nor child he could call his own, no heritage but hopeless bondage—borne down for centuries by the iron heel of foul oppression, they never aspired to rule over us; they only asked to be bachelors of wood and drawers of water, and for a place to lie down and die. Instead of insurrections and massacres of women and children, as we feared, no instance is on record of a single act of savage cruelty on their part during the war. It was said they were too cowardly to fight, and yet they fought more daringly than Napoleon's veterans, and threw themselves headlong on the battlements of the enemy and into the mine of Petersburg, and into the breach at Port Hudson, and into the jaws of death everywhere, with an irrepressible ardor and lofty daring, equaled only by that of our own unmatched and dauntless boys in blue, fighting for a flag, which for two hundred years has been the ensign of liberty for all but them.

In all the long and fearful struggle of the war, not one of these sable millions ever proved faithless to the flag. Did one solitary one of them ever refuse to share his scanty loaf with the sick and wounded soldier? Who, when night spread its dark robes over the earth, led our worn and wearied soldier through bayous, swamps, and by-paths, and bid him God speed to his home, and the headquarters of our Army?

And now, after having secured our own safety and the life of the nation aided by his acts of valor, in common with those of our brave soldiers; if, after they have been called to be soldiers of the Army of the Union; if, after we have clothed them in the uniform of the United States Army; if, after they have flashed two hundred thousand bayonets in the face of Jeff. Davis and his traitor hordes; if now, we open the portals of the American ballot-box to bloody-handed traitors, and leave them to the tender mercies, and hostile legislation of their former owners, we shall commit the crime of history, and write upon the nation's name, in lines dark as night, and deep as hell, a stigma which all the ages cannot wash away.

Let no friend of the Republican party be discouraged through any temporary defeat. Let him remember, that despite occasional defeats, the true center of gravity in a republican Government like ours, is in that power which represents the theory of liberty on which the Government is based. Remember that the march of our republican army, has been through storms of persecution, iron walls of prejudice, and through defeat after defeat to final triumph. There are men here who remember the time, when to speak against slavery, was denounced as a crime against society. It was death for Lovejoy, imprisonment for Parker, and mob-law and lynch-law for the early pioneers in the cause of freedom. Any other sin might be atoned for, but, clad in iron mail, slavery was secure behind its impregnable bulwarks. Only in 1837, the blood of Elijah Lovejoy sprinkled the soil of my own State, while bravely defending his press against an infuriated mob. But from that blood men sprang, as Minerva from the head of Jupiter, full armed with buckler, lance, spear, and helmet of living truth, to fire the world against the accursed system of human bondage. Only in 1849, as a member of the Legislature of my own State, I introduced a resolution to abolish the slave traffic in the District of Columbia, and it was voted down by an overwhelming majority. I remember well the time when it was just as unpopular to advocate the abolition of the slave traffic in this District, where men were sold upon the auction block, and shook their chains in the face of the Capitol, as it is now to advocate the passage of an act by Congress, where the States have failed to secure suffrage in every State in the Union. Twice has it been my pleasure to witness these colored men, in all the dignity of enfranchised manhood, march to the polls and rescue this capital from the long dominion of copperheads and a slave oligarchy. How long since statutes of the States were black with cruel legislation, expelling these colored men from the States, and subjecting them, for small or no offenses, to the penitentiary, jail, and the whipping-post? In my message of 1865 to the Legislature of Illinois, I called upon it to sweep them from the statute-book, with a swift, resistless hand, and they did it, leaving not a section to mar and darken the face of the revised statutes of that great State. You remember, that when in 1862, Mr. Lincoln issued that conditional proclamation of emancipation, the Democratic party rallied and carried almost every State. But we did not give up; defeat did not hurt. Like the bombardment of Fort Sumter, it roused the nation, and we gloriously triumphed in the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. And now, through all these defeats and triumphs we reach the final great consummation, the complexion to which it must come at last, the summing up of the whole matter, the simple freedom and equality of all men, the enfranchisement of all men made in the image of God, to a perfect and universal equality of rights.

And, sir, do you suppose we will falter before taking this last step. The true-hearted Republican is never deterred by election returns. He expects some defeats. He expects to triumph amid the storms of defeat, as well as in the sunshine of victory. I hail it, not as a defeat, but as a glorious harbinger of victory, that, notwithstanding the timidity of politicians in Ohio, two hundred and sixteen thousand freemen dashed away their prejudices, and voted for suffrage; not as a defeat, but as the herald, the John the Baptist, the "prepare-yet-the-way" of speedy, glorious, and final victory.

The shortest way to reconstruction is the simplest, the plainest, the easiest; and the only way is the straightforward road to the impartial and equal rights of all men.

I believe in a special providence in the affairs of men as well as of nations. I believe, colonization, emigration, and the march of empire having completed the circle of the globe, that upon this North American continent, between the Atlantic and the Pacific, is to be "Time's noblest empire—the last." I believe that this is the chosen nation of Heaven, where the experiment of the self-government of man is to be made. I believe that light from Heaven blazed along the pathway of the Mayflower, and guided our fathers through the storms of revolutionary preparation to the Declaration of Independence. I believe that God meant that we should highly appreciate our privileges by making them cost dearly; I believe that He gave us slavery, with all of its accursed ugliness and deformity, as the appalling contrast to the beauties and blessings of liberty. I believe that He thrust across our path the Ethiopian, that we might learn that all men, without regard to color or the accident of birth, are brothers, and that of one blood are all the people that dwell upon the face of the earth. I believe He gave us Lincoln as He had given us Washington—Lincoln so good, so grand, and so great—as an example for statesmanship, and that from his martyrdom should spring the seed of the church, the gospel of liberty, and human rights.

And, in a word, that in all these providences, sad experiences, fearful wars, prejudices of caste, virtues, and wickedness of rulers, "God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform," and is leading us through the red sea of trouble and the wilderness, to a bright Canaan of national deliverance. Having solved the problem of the ages, the equality and brotherhood of the race of man, and vindicated his eternal justice, this nation will move forward in the van of material progress and Christian civilization, and scale height after height of power, glory, and grandeur, such as no people in the world has ever yet achieved.

Mr. President, I have not gone one solitary step further than I thought it was necessary for me to go for the best interests of my country. I do not antagonize the Republican platform. I leave the question of suffrage where the Constitution leaves it, with the States in the first instance, but I reserve the power to the Congress of the United States, contained in the Constitution of the United States, by laws necessary and proper, to see that every State has a republican form of government.

Contested Election.

SPEECH OF HON. COLUMBUS DELANO,
OF OHIO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 3, 1868.

On the contested-election case of Delano vs. Morgan, from the thirteenth congressional district of Ohio.

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to discuss the question on which the decision of this case rests, I will briefly refer to the circumstances which led to the contest. I can do so with greater propriety since the sitting member has spoken, because, in his remarks, he has not answered the conclusions of the Committee of Elections, nor has he confined his remarks to the questions made by the majority and minority reports. On the contrary, he has indulged himself in such observations as seem to me more appropriate from the hustings than on the floor of this House. If his observations were intended as a campaign speech to be used on some future occasion, and not appropriate here, then I may say I think his object has been attained. But in that event, at the proper time, I shall be willing to accommodate the gentleman.

Briefly, then, the circumstances which led to this contest are as follows: the canvass for the seat now contested was very ardent on both sides, and the result before the election was regarded as uncertain by all who were intelligent and candid. The returns at first received indicated clearly the election of the contestant. This soon became so highly probable that the sitting member retired, admitting his defeat by 400 majority.

Afterward this impression was removed by returns from remote townships, partly in Coshocton county, which changed the result; and almost simultaneously with these returns contestant was informed that frauds upon the ballot-box had been perpetrated and detected. As it was then well known that a large number of deserters had voted for the sitting member it was demanded by the political friends of the contestant that these alleged frauds should be at once investigated. This examination was made, and it was ascertained that in three townships in Coshocton county, (giving the sitting member an aggregate majority of 159 votes) there had been practiced by the political friends of the sitting member gross and palpable frauds. This was done by judges and clerks of the elections who were corrupt enough to take out of the ballot-box Republican tickets, and replace them with Democratic tickets, making each change equal to two votes.

In one township in Coshocton county (Jefferson) one of the judges was three times detected in making such change by those who were in the room while the ballots were being counted. He was then accused of his crime; and being exposed probably did not repeat it.

In two other townships this species of fraud was so clearly proved by the evidence that the sitting member could not deny it; and the minority and majority reports each concur in its existence, and correct it as far as possible by striking from sitting member's majority 46 votes in Linton, and 20 in Monroe township, in Coshocton county.

It is not probable that all the frauds of this character were discovered; but enough has been proved to induce a fair and reasonable presumption that there was a systematic plan among certain political friends of the sitting member to pollute the ballot-box, in the manner already indicated, whenever an officer could be found venal enough for such a job. In one instance the fraud was probably committed by a clerk; in another, by the judge who took the ballots from the box while counting, and in others the presumption is very strong that the entire board of officers participated in the crime. Having shut themselves up during the reception and while counting the votes, they refused to permit anyone to be present to observe their conduct.

But the fraud did not stop here. It was ascertained that aliens had been taken from Knox to Licking county to be fraudulently naturalized, and upon investigation it was proved that both forgery and perjury had been practiced by certain friends of the sitting member in order to obtain fraudulent final certificates of naturalization.

Nor did the discovery of fraud end even here. It was ascertained, and is in proof, and the proof is uncontradicted, that a car load of non-residents (some sixty in number) were imported into the district by friends of the sitting member on the night preceding the election. These non-residents were distributed in squads, of from five to ten in number at each railroad station, where the train stopped in passing through the district. They were heard to say that they were going into the thirteenth district to vote for the sitting member, because they could do no good by voting in Mr. BINGHAM'S district; and they were in charge of a special manager, who was inquired of as to what he was doing, and who replied that "they had been fixing up things to beat Delano, and would beat him whether or no." All this and much more is proved by Mr. Krumbaker, a respectable merchant of Zanesville, who happened to be a passenger on the train that evening, and whose character is well established and above reproach. No attempt was made to contradict or impair the evidence of Krumbaker on this subject.

It was under circumstances thus briefly referred to that contestant felt himself compelled, in deference to the feelings and wishes of his constituents, to undertake this contest.

It is due, however, to truth and justice, to say that contestant was so reluctant to enter into the contest after all these frauds were exposed, and when he knew that besides these frauds more than two hundred deserters had voted for the sitting member, that he applied to the central committees of the several counties to be relieved from undertaking it. But these committees in all the counties except the one in which contestant resides refused to assent to an abandonment of the contest, and urged its prosecution with such vigor and decision as to compel contestant to proceed with it.

Having made this reference to the circumstances which led to the contest, I will at once, Mr. Speaker, consider the question on which this contest rests as the case is now presented by the report of the committee. By reference to the reports of the majority as well as the minority of the Committee of Elections, it will appear that after reducing the official majority of the sitting member by deducting the fraudulent votes in the townships of Linton and Monroe, in Coshocton county, he must be declared not entitled to the seat, provided the House shall decide that deserters are not qualified electors in Ohio.

Thus we see that the first question to be determined is this: "Are deserters from the military and naval service of the United States entitled to vote in Ohio?"

Before considering this question, however, we must inquire whether persons drafted in 1862, who failed to report, are deserters. Those drafted in 1864, who failed to report, are deserters by express provision of law. The draft of 1862 was under a different enactment, and the law and circumstance governing this draft must first be considered.

First, then, I affirm that those persons who failed to respond to the draft of 1862 are deserters.

The draft of 1862 was made by authority of an act of Congress, approved July 29, 1861, entitled "An act to provide for the suppression of the rebellion," &c., the first section of which provides—

"That whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President of the United States, to enforce by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings the laws of the United States within any State or Territory of the United States, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of any or all the States of the Union, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to uppress such rebellion in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed."

The third section is as follows:

"That the militia so called into the service of the United States shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war as the troops of the United States, and be continued in the service of the United States until discharged by proclamation of the President: Provided, That such continuance in service shall not extend beyond sixty days after the commencement of the next regular session of Congress, unless Congress shall expressly provide by law therefor: And provided, further, That the militia so called into the service of the United States shall, during their time of service, be entitled to the same pay, rations, and allowances for clothing as are or may be established by law for the Army of the United States."—U. S. Statutes-at-Large, vol. 12, pp. 281, 282.

Congress afterward, and on the 17th day of July, 1862, passed the following enactment:

"Whenever the President of the United States shall call forth the militia of the States, to be employed in the service of the United States, he may specify in his call the period for which such service will be required, not exceeding nine months; and the militia so-called shall be mustered in and continue to serve for and during the term so specified, unless sooner discharged by command of the President. If, by reason of DEFECTS in existing laws, or in the execution of them, in the several States, or any of them, it shall be found necessary to provide for enrolling the militia, and OTHERWISE PUTTING THIS ACT into execution, the President is authorized in such cases to make ALL NECESSARY RULES AND REGULATIONS; and the enrollment of the militia shall in all cases include all able-bodied male citizens between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, and shall be apportioned among the States according to representative population."—U. S. Statutes, sec. 1, vol. 12, p. 597.

By virtue of these provisions the President did on the 4th of August, 1862, issue General Orders, No. 94, by which he ordered:

"1. That a draft of three hundred thousand militia be immediately called into the service of the United States, to serve for nine months unless sooner discharged. The Secretary of War will assign the quotas to the States and establish REGULATIONS FOR THE DRAFT."

"2. That if any State shall, not by the 15th of August furnish its quota of the additional three hundred thousand volunteers authorized by law, the deficiency of volunteers in that State will also be made up by special draft from the militia. The Secretary of War will establish regulations for this purpose."—Compendium of General Orders, A. G. O., for 1861-62-63, p. 90.

Afterward on the 9th of August, 1862, the Secretary of War issued General Orders, No. 99, which contained the regulations for the enrollment and draft for three hundred thousand militia, as he was authorized to do by the President by General Orders, No. 94, before quoted. (See Compendium of General Orders, Adjutant General's Office, for 1861-62-63, pp. 93, 97.)

In this order the manner of the enrollment and draft are minutely pointed out, and it is, among other things, provided that—

"6. A printed or written notice of his enrollment and draft, and of the place of rendezvous of the drafted military force, shall thereupon be served by a person to be appointed by the commissioner, upon each person so drafted, either by delivering the same in person, or by leaving it at his last known place of residence.

"8. The persons thus drafted shall assemble at the county seat of their respective counties, within five days after the time of drafting, whence transportation will be furnished them by the Governors of the several States to the place of rendezvous."

"Fifth. Provost marshals will be appointed by the War Department in the several States, on the nomination of the Governor thereof, with such assistants as may be necessary to enforce the attendance of all drafted persons who shall fail to attend at such places of rendezvous."

Afterwards, by General Orders, No. 140, dated September 24, 1862, it was provided as follows:

"Third. It will be the duty of special provost marshals to arrest all deserters, whether regulars, volunteers, or militia, and send them to the nearest military commander or military post, where they can be cared for."—Compendium of General Orders, A. G. O., for 1861-62-63, p. 120.

Article twenty of the Articles of War is in these words:

"ART. 20. All officers and soldiers who have received pay, or who have been duly enlisted in the service of the United States, and shall be convicted of having deserted the same, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as by sentence of a court-martial shall be inflicted."—Rev. U. S. Army Regulations, p. 488.

The law does not define the term deserter or desertion, but leaves that to be determined by the tribunal that may be called upon to pass upon the act of desertion.

What, then, is a deserter? I answer, a person liable to military duty who abandons his military post without proper authority therefor.

How does a person become liable to perform military duty?

In two ways. First, by voluntarily enlisting in the military service; and second, by being drafted and compelled to go into the military service.

In either case he is regarded in the military service. In the case of being drafted it is the draft and the order to appear at a given time and place that puts him in the service. The draft is equivalent to an enlistment. There is no particular form required of a drafted man to put him into the service. The fact of being drafted is sufficient, and after that, and notice, he is in the military service and bound to obey all military orders coming from his superior officer; and if he does not obey he is subject to military punishment.

By the provisions of the law the President was authorized to make such rules and regulations concerning the draft as he might deem necessary. He did make such rules and regulations. He prescribed how the draft should be conducted; that notice should be given to the drafted person; that he should appear at a given time and place; and that if he did not a provost marshal might arrest him and take him to the place of rendezvous.

Here is express provision of law for treating a drafted man who fails to report as a deserter.

He is just as much a deserter as an enlisted man who obtains a furlough and remains away without authority after his furlough expires.

The furloughed man is bound to report at the end of his furlough. The drafted man is bound to report within five days from the draft. What is the difference between them? We all know that during the war men drafted before the law of 1863, were arrested and carried into the service and treated as deserters by the War Department. In fact, General Orders No. 99 made the fact of being drafted equivalent to being in the service.

Section nine is in these words:

"As soon as the draft has been made and the names marked on the enrollment lists, the commissioner will send a copy of the draft to the commandant of the rendezvous, and another of the same to the adjutant general of the State, who will immediately organize the drafted men into companies and regiments of infantry, by assigning one hundred and one men to each company and ten companies to each regiment, and send a copy of the organization to the commandant of the rendezvous.

"10. At the expiration of the time allowed for the drafted men to reach the rendezvous, the commandant shall proceed to complete the organization of the companies and regiments," &c.

Thus showing by the very terms of the order that the men were regarded as in the service of the United States as soon as drafted.

It has been held that the order of the President under the act of July 17, 1862, has all the force of an act of Congress. (Commonwealth vs. Audress, 10 Pittsburg Legal Intelligence, page 211.)

To show how this matter has been understood in the War Department, I call the attention of the committee to the following circular, No. 47:

[Circular, No. 47.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 7, 1863.

I. Drafted men become soldiers in the service of the United States by the fact of their names having been drawn in the draft. The notification, served upon them by the provost marshal, is merely an announcement of the fact, and an order for them to report for duty, at a designated time and place.

II. The following opinion of Hon. William Whiting, Solicitor of the War Department, is published for the information of all concerned:

"If a person after being drafted, and before receiving notice, deserts, the notice may still be served by leaving it at his last place of residence, and if he does not appear in accordance with the notice, or furnish the substitute or pay the $300, he will be in law a deserter and must be treated accordingly. There is no way or manner in which a person once 'enrolled,' can escape his public duties, and when drafted, whether present or absent, whether he changes his residence or absconds, the rights of the United States against him are secured, and it is only by performance of his duty to the country that he will escape liability to be treated as a criminal.

WILLIAM WHITING,
"Solicitor of the War Department,"
JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

Secondly. I now propose to consider whether deserters, under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, are voters in Ohio.

Also, if a conviction for desertion is necessary before such votes can be rejected by judges of elections.

The constitution of Ohio limits the elective franchise to citizens of the United States:

"Every white male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the State one year next preceding the election, and of the county, township, or ward, in which he resides such time as may be provided by law, shall have the qualifications of an elector and be entitled to vote at all elections."—Art. 5, sec. 1.

The twenty-first section of the act of March 3, 1865, is as follows:

"That in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after two proclamations hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their right to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any rights of citizens thereof; and all persons who shall hereafter desert the military or naval service, and all persons who being duly enrolled shall depart the jurisdiction of the district in which he is enrolled or go beyond the limits of the United States with intent to avoid any draft into the military or naval service duly ordered, shall be liable to the penalties of this section. And the President is hereby authorized and required forthwith, on the passage of this act, to issue his proclamation setting forth the provisions of this section, in which proclamation the President is requested to notify all deserters returning within sixty days as aforesaid, that they shall be pardoned on condition of returning to their regiments and companies or to such other organizations as they may be assigned to, until they shall have served for a period of time equal to their original term of enlistment."—United States Statutes-at-Large, vol. 13, p. 487.

Briefly analyzed, this act provides that deserters from the Army or Navy who fail to return within a given time after proclamation, to be issued by the President, shall be considered to have renounced and forfeited their citizenship and their rights to become citizens, and shall be incapable of holding office under the United States.

In this way Congress accepts their resignation of citizenship, and they lose their condition of citizens.

It is not ex post facto legislation because it inflicts no penalty; penalties are left for the courts, civil and military. It is not ex post facto, because future continuance in the neglect to perform their duties is superadded to past disobedience as a cause for accepting their conduct as an abnegation of citizenship.

Where, then, does the power to confer or take away citizenship rest in the United States?

I answer, in the national Government, first, because the Constitution has conferred upon the nation the power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." (Art. 4, sec. 8.)

It is impossible to execute this power and make citizenship uniform, unless the United States have exclusive and entire control over the subject; and hence it must be admitted that all the powers which the States previously had over this subject were surrendered and vested in the nation.

This seems to be so palpably just and necessary that it requires no argument, illustration, or authority; but lest it may be denied, I will venture to refer to the following cases: Wheaton 900, and cases there cited.

In the case of Lynch vs. Clark, 1 Sanford's R., 583, citizenship is said to be "a natural right or condition;" and in 2 Kent's Commentaries, s. p. 30, note, "The question of citizenship is one of national, and not of individual [or State] sovereignty."

HO. OF REPS.

Contested Election—Mr. Delano.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Judge McLean, in the 19 Howard, page 533, declares—

"That a State may authorize a foreigner to hold real estate," but it has no power to naturalize foreigners and give them the rights of citizens. Such a right is opposed to the acts of Congress, and subversive of the Federal powers.

"Every person who is a citizen of the United States whether by birth or naturalization, holds his great franchise by the laws of the United States and above the control of any particular State."—Attorney General Bates's Opinion, 29th Nov., 1862.

And to such an extent has this doctrine been carried that it has been clearly established by law and logic that no State can confer the elective franchise upon one who is not a citizen of the United States. There is no such thing as State citizenship. It is the nation and only the nation that makes and unmakes citizens; and if the elective franchise can be conferred by a State upon persons not citizens, it enables a State to subvert and overthrow our institutions and change our form of Government. Upon this point I refer to a few opinions of the ablest of our jurists and statesmen.

Judge Curtis, in 19 Howard, 581, before referred to, says:

"The enjoyment of the elective franchise is not essential to citizenship. It is one of the chiefest attributes of citizenship under the American constitutions; and the just and constitutional possession of this right is decisive evidence of national citizenship."

Judge Story elucidates this question with admirable power and precision in 1 Story on the Constitution, page 1103, as follows:

"If aliens might be admitted indiscriminately to enjoy all the rights of citizens at the will of a single State, the Union itself might be endangered by the influx of foreigners hostile to its institutions, ignorant of its forms, and incapable of a due estimation of its privileges."

In Wheaton, page 910, Mr. Lawrence says:

"If the States can admit to the elective franchise those who are not citizens, thereby neutralizing the votes of citizens, not only the Federal power of naturalization becomes a nullity, but a minority of actual citizens by the aid of aliens may control the government of the States, and through the States the Government of the Union."

Once more. Mr. Calhoun, in Wheaton, 905, puts the question so distinctly and clearly that without intending to indorse his opinions in other things, I think it will shed light on this question to quote from his argument. He says:

"Whatever difference there may be as to what other rights appertain to a citizen, all must agree that he has the right to petition and also to claim the protection of the Government. These belong to him as a member of the body politic, and the possession of them is what separates citizens of the lowest condition from aliens and slaves. To suppose that a State can make an alien a citizen or confer on him the right of voting would involve the absurdity of giving him the direct and immediate control over the action of the General Government, from which he can claim no protection and to which he has no right to present a petition."

"Now, admit that a State may confer the right of voting on aliens, and it follows that we might have among our constituents persons who have not the right to claim the protection of the Government, nor present a petition to it."

"But a still greater difficulty remains. Suppose a war should be declared between the United States and the country to which the aliens belong. They as alien enemies would be liable to be seized under the laws of Congress, and to have their goods confiscated, and themselves imprisoned or sent out of the country."

Notwithstanding a contrary practice in regard to suffrage for aliens has been adopted in some States, surely it is quite impossible to justify it, either in argument or on solid and well-considered opinions of eminent jurists.

In Ohio, by her constitution, United States citizenship is necessary to suffrage; and these authorities, and this argument to this point, are to show that by the Constitution of the United States, as well as from necessity, all the power once residing in the States over citizenship is now vested in the nation.

Let us consider what this power is:

Every nation is bound to preserve itself, and since so bound "has a right to everything necessary for its preservation." (Vattel, p. 62, Northampton, Mass., ed.)

Wheaton, page 105, section two, says:

"Of the absolute international rights of States, one of the most essential and most important, and that which lies at the foundation of all the rest, is the right of self-preservation. It is not only a right with respect to other States, but a duty with respect to its own members, and the most solemn and important which the State owes to them. This right necessarily involves all other incidental rights which are essential as a means to give effect to the principal end. Among these is the right of self-defense. This again involves the right to require the military service of all its people, to levy troops and maintain a full force, to build fortifications, and impose and collect taxes."

Let us reflect on these principles for a moment as connected with the law under consideration and the circumstances under which it was enacted. The nation was in the midst of an enormous and alarming rebellion. It required the military service of the people for self-preservation. Self-preservation was its duty, its right, and this right carried with it "necessarily all other incidental rights." Persons, citizens, owing military service, which, as Wheaton says, the nation had a right to require, were fleeing from the country, had fled the country and deserted the United States, refusing to render such military service as was due from them to the nation and such as the nation had a right to demand.

They are, under these circumstances, called upon to stop and to return, and are informed by this law that unless they do return to duty and their allegiance to the Government in a given time, after proclamation by the President, that they shall cease to be citizens. It is simply this, that they shall no longer enjoy the privileges and immunities incident to citizenship, if they longer refuse to perform their duties to the State which is the consideration for such privileges and immunities.

Can anything be clearer than the right of the State to take away citizenship with all its privileges from those who cease and refuse to perform such duties to the State as they owe in consideration for the privilege?

Justice Blackstone says:

"Allegiance is the tie or ligament that binds every subject to be true and faithful to his sovereign in return for protection which is afforded him."

The Attorney General, in his opinion of 29th November, 1862, says:

"The duty of allegiance and the right to protection are correlative obligations, the one the price of the other, and they constitute the bond between the individual and his country."

This principle is thus expressed by Vattel, (s. p. 106:)

"If the body of society or he who represents it (the Government) absolutely fail to discharge their obligations toward the citizen, the latter may withdraw himself, for, if one of the contracting parties does not observe his engagements the other is no longer bound to fulfill his, as the contract is reciprocal between society and its members."

It is on the same principle also that society may expel a member who violates its laws.

It must be distinctly understood and well remembered that the law under consideration applies only (as here claimed) to deserters; that is, to men who belong to the Army or Navy, who are or were subject to the rules, regulations, and articles of war, and who, thus situated, violated their oaths and deserted, and that, too, during the war.

It is only this class of flagrant culprits who were subject to court-martial and sentence of death for desertion, and whose resignation of citizenship Congress has simply accepted, saying to them that for this failure to perform these duties due from them as citizens, and made infinitely imperative by their having been made actual members of the Army or Navy, for this failure and continued failure, after notice, you shall cease to have the right to vote or hold office, and thereby direct the administration of the Government. You have renounced and are no longer worthy to enjoy these great principles.

It must also be remembered that this act was passed during the war, while Congress was in the full and rightful exercise of all the powers which a state of war confers upon Congress; and that these powers, by express constitutional provision, authorized Congress—

- I. To declare war;
- II. To raise and support armies;
- III. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; and
- IV. To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing provisions. (Art. 1. sec. 8, Constitution United States.)

Without resorting to the power of self-preservation and all the powers necessary for its execution which is conferred on States by the law of nations, I find in the text of the Constitution full authority for the law applied to these persons during a state of war; and to deprive the nation of this power is to surrender the elective franchise and the control of the Government to deserters who merit death and do not deserve and are not entitled to be citizens and electors. Surely argument nor authority need be longer employed to establish the proposition that duty and fidelity to the nation by its citizens is the price paid for citizenship, with its privileges and immunities, and that when the citizens fail in the discharge of their duties and refuse, as the disfranchised in this law did refuse to render military service for the Government in an hour of imminent need and peril, but fled and hid and skulked in foreign lands and secret places at home, and thus became deserters from the Army and Navy—surely, I say, under such circumstances to deny the right to take away citizenship from such persons, such deserters, is to make this Government a helpless, weak, and powerless thing, incompetent to defend itself, unable to command and enforce the military services either of its citizens or the members of its Army when imperiously required for the preservation of its life!

But it has this power; it is a power incident to sovereignty, necessary to the discharge of its duties and as certain as its other powers. It is also a power which once belonged to and was frequently exercised by the original States before the Federal Constitution was formed, and which passed from the States to the Federal Government when the Constitution was adopted. This I will establish by reference to history, (see remarks by Hon. Samuel Shellabarger, April 21, 1866, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, vol. 58 Congressional Globe, pp. 2102, 2103, 2104, 2105, and 2106,) as follows:

History.

"I assert that there is not, and never was, a civilized nation in which the sovereign did not both hold and exercise the power of forfeiting and taking away, and that by law or edict of the sovereign rights of citizenship, when its duties were not recognized or rendered."

"Accepting foreign citizenship forfeits all its rights in France; and so does taking a foreign office. (Wheaton, 922.) The same is true in Prussia. (Ib., 922.) One who abandons his country forfeits citizenship in Austria. An Englishman loses his rights as a British subject by adhering to a foreign Power. (Wheaton, 917; 2 Blackstone, 410.) The same is the law of Bavaria, of Wurtemberg, of Russia, and of Spain. The same law has been enforced again and again by Switzerland, and by every other European State; and that throughout all the period of civilized history."

"Mr. HALE. I desire to inquire whether this forfeiture of which the gentleman speaks can ever operate until office found by a court of competent jurisdiction?"

"Mr. SHELLABARGER. I answer the gentleman that it does take effect by act of the sovereign in the enactment of the law or edict, whichever may be the channel of communicating the national will upon that subject-matter; and he will so find upon an examination of the authorities."

"I have not appealed to these to show that our Government has the arbitrary power over the citizen which is held by the absolute powers of Europe, for it is not so. I appeal to these to show that, during all time, and in every truly sovereign State which has the power to demand allegiance, and to confer citizenship, and to define its duties, whether that State be, like Austria and Russia, an absolute monarchy, or, like England, a limited one, or, like Switzerland and Rome, republics, they could also withdraw the same citizenship from them who performed none of these duties."

"The two powers of conferring and withdrawing are in their nature inseparable. That would be a preposterior state of national sovereignty that can define by general law what kind of faith, allegiance, and duties done shall alone admit one to become a citizen and to demand his Government's protection, and yet that Government be utterly powerless to declare by similar law that the citizenship had ceased when all the duties of citizenship were utterly discarded and incorrigible treason was put in their place.

"The United States.

"I now assert that this very power in question, of withdrawing and withholding either some or all of the rights of citizenship from them who renounce their allegiance, has been exercised by your Government ever since it was in existence, and by the States before it was a Government. There was not a State in which during the war of the Revolution laws were not passed forfeiting rights of citizenship of them who adhered to the enemies of the country. The dates and titles of these acts will be found in American State Papers, page 198. I cannot here refer to more than one or two, which will give a just idea of the character and legal effect of all.

"Two years after the treaty of peace of 1783, Georgia and South Carolina passed laws forever disfranchising them who had made war against the United States; and Sir George Hammond, the British minister, in his elaborate debate with Mr. Jefferson as to these laws disfranchising and impoverishing these rebels, shows that these laws were in force in a majority of the States ten years after that treaty, and long after the adoption of our present Constitution. In 1787, Massachusetts passed a law which, for three years, excluded from voting, holding office, teaching school, and keeping hotel, all citizens of Massachusetts who had the year before engaged in the insignificant rebellion against Massachusetts which was headed by Daniel Shays. Those who had fired on or had wounded any citizen was forever deprived of citizenship, as was Shays and his principal officers. Afterward some of them who had fired upon citizens were permitted to recover their citizenship by proving penitence and loyalty, and by taking an oath of allegiance.

"Mr. HALE. Did not every one of those laws to which the gentleman has referred involve the trial, conviction, and sentence of the persons thus disfranchised before a court of competent jurisdiction?

"Mr. SHELLBARGER. I answer the gentleman, no, sir. Besides, the gentleman will find that one of our naturalization laws, that of 20th March, 1790, was repealed, in part, because it excluded from citizenship only those 'proscribed' by the State laws, and did not include, in terms at least, those 'legally convicted.' And the repealing act of 29th January, 1795, added to those proscribed the other class of them heretofore, making the clause read: 'No person heretofore proscribed by any State, or who has been legally convicted of having joined the army of Great Britain,' &c. So the law of 1802, now in force, is. So that either and both classes, the proscribed and the convicted, are excluded from American citizenship.

"Now, then, I go on with my argument; and the gentleman will see as I proceed how unimportant are the suggestions he makes.

"The power of these States to pass these laws forfeiting the right to vote, and these other rights, was, I believe, never disputed in this discussion with Mr. Jefferson by the British Government. Many of these laws were long after the treaty. By both the British and American interpretation of that treaty they who were in the United States at its date, and who adhered to our Government, thereby became citizens of the United States. These acts of the State Legislatures, especially that touching Shays's rebellion, turned them into disfranchised men who never adhered to any foreign Government, never were out of the United States, and who, but for these laws, would have been citizens of the United States. And yet some of these laws, without any trial or conviction, forever disfranchised them. Some of these laws punished particular individuals by name for specified offenses. These were acts of attainder or of pains and penalties, and such the United States may not now, owing to an express constitutional provision, pass. But such as provided generally for forfeiting citizenship where men had renounced their allegiance, were not bills of attainder, are not prohibited by our Constitution, and are a most ordinary and just exercise of sovereign power which was and is conceded by all our history to have been possessed by every one of the Colonies. And shall it be endured now, that this great nation shall hold less power over national allegiance when it is voluntarily discarded by a traitor than these Colonies had?

"The obligations of citizenship are as old as the Government; as old as any Government. They arise not at all out of any criminal law. Their violation is a violation of civil and political obligations, and works a forfeiture of the right to demand national protection and rights, as well where there is no law defining or punishing the act, either as treason or as any other crime; and also as well where the act of forfeiture is no defined crime (such as abandoning country to avoid defending it) as where it is treason. When, through Mr. Webster, this Government withheld from Thresher the rights of an American citizen to demand the Government's protection, and thus forfeited the highest rights of the citizen, the Government did not thereby impose new or ex post facto punishment, because that no law existed prohibiting the acts (which worked the forfeiture) of going abroad and engaging in the Lopez expedition. Of course these forfeitures by act of law ought never be resorted to except where the abjuration of allegiance is open and notorious; and then should not be extended to forfeiture of property, but only, as in Thresher's case, to withholding political power and protection.

"But, sir, I go on. From the day of its birth to this hour your Government has by acts of Congress both asserted and exercised this identical power for which I argue. These acts bear date respectively April 14, 1802, and March 29, 1790, and were signed by Washington and Jefferson. These acts all expressly provide that no person proscribed by any of these State laws to which I have alluded shall ever be admitted to become citizens of the United States without the assent of the States."

The power of Congress to enact this law may be further enforced by reference to the arguments of members during the pendency of the bill. Senator JOHNSON said "it vested not upon past neglect of duty, but required also future dereliction and disobedience."

In regard to the necessity of previous conviction, a careful analysis of the act under consideration will show that it does not, in any legal or technical sense inflict or pretend to inflict a penalty.

It provides that "in addition to the lawful penalties for the crime of desertion," certain persons therein described shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their right to become citizens; and such deserters shall forever be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any rights of citizens.

I think I have already established by authority, as well as argument, that obedience and fidelity to the Government are the price paid for the privileges of citizenship; and these two are correlative, binding the citizen and the Government together, constituting what Blackstone calls the "ligament" of Union.

These same authorities show that when either party breaks this bond, or severs the "ligament," both parties are discharged. The obligation and contract are thereby annulled, and the philosophy of government, as well as all law and logic, seems to me to make this so clear that it is beyond controversy. For example, no one in the United States denies, or even doubts the right of expatriation. This acknowledged, allows the citizen voluntarily to renounce his allegiance and surrender the privileges and immunities of citizenship; and when he does this and the fact can be proved will anybody be found bold enough to claim that he is still entitled to these privileges until he shall be tried and convicted?

It is hardly necessary to prolong argument on this point. The records of our diplomacy furnish numerous and complete evidence of its accuracy. I cannot omit, however, to refer to an opinion of Judge Black when Attorney General, dated August 17, 1857, Wheaton, page 924, wherein he says:

"There is no statute or other law of the United States which prevents either a native or naturalized citizen from severing his political connection with this Government, if he sees proper to do so in time of peace." * * * "There is no mode of renunciation prescribed. In my opinion, if he emigrates, carries his family and effects with him, &c., this would imply a dissolution of his previous relations with the United States."

I return to the question. Cannot Congress accept these acts of renunciation, and say, when duty and obedience are refused, and that, too, under the flagrant and criminal circumstances which constitute desertion and high crime, that protection and the rights of citizenship shall cease? To deny this doctrine or to abandon this policy seems to me to be monstrously absurd.

Let it be supposed that one of these deserters, having located among a congenial community, is elected to a seat in the House of Representatives. The evidence of desertion is clear, proven by the records of the War Office, by witnesses acquainted with the fact, perhaps by his own admissions, as in this case, in many instances. You tell him that seven years' citizenship of the United States are required to make him eligible, by article one, section two of the Constitution of the United States. He demands his seat, but you doubt. He urges that he has not been convicted. You answer it is true, and therefore you have not been and cannot be punished for your crime. But the law declares that for certain acts, punishable by penalties, after conviction, you shall, moreover, "be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited your rights of citizenship and be incapable of holding office."

"We find you clearly guilty of these acts; you are not a citizen, having renounced and forfeited that condition. We cannot punish you pecuniarily; that is left to the courts after conviction; but in the face of the law and the facts we cannot pronounce a judicial falsehood in your favor, declaring that you are to be regarded as a citizen of the United States, and that as such, entitled to be a member of the House."

The question of citizenship, then, you would try—not by the record, but in pais. And this is the same question, in principle, as that involved in this controversy. Therefore, I claim that it is for the judges of elections to decide as to the right of voting under this law as you may decide on the qualifications for holding the seat. Hence, if such evidence is brought as to these deserters as would have justified the judges of elections in rejecting their votes, and that evidence is not refuted nor overcome by the sitting member, then all such votes should be, ought to be, and I trust will be, excluded and set aside.

The House is the sole judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members. It is bound by no State adjudications, but may be advised by them as by argument, not as authority. It cannot admit a disqualified member nor count the votes of disqualified constituents, transient or permanent, and of these it is the sole judge.

I shall now attempt to show that this was the construction of this law by the Congress that passed it, and I will do this in the most explicit manner by the contemporaneous debate, by motions to amend, and by the votes on such motions, and on the final passage of the bill.

While the bill was under consideration in the House it was objected that no tribunal was provided for trying the question of desertion, and this objection led to the following debate:

"Mr. KERNAN. I do not understand how that is to be decided, or what tribunal is to decide it.

"Mr. WILSON. I do not suppose that there is any tribunal provided in the section for determining it; but I can suggest one way for determining it. If one of these persons should return, and should attempt to exercise the rights of a citizen, and he should be prevented from the exercise of those rights, then he can bring the question into the civil courts for determination.

"Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman agree to an amendment so as to make the section apply only to persons convicted of having done this?

"Mr. WILSON. That follows, as a matter of course, that a man shall not be deprived of his rights until he is convicted of the offense. He may be prevented from voting by challenge, and then he has the right to go to the courts to have the question decided.

"Mr. MALLORY. Many a man is punished now and convicted afterward.

"Mr. WILSON. This will place him exactly in the same condition, as to the right of suffrage, as an alien, a person of foreign birth, presenting a vote. His vote may be challenged on the ground that he is not naturalized, and the judges of election may refuse his vote. He then has his remedy against the judges of election; so would a man under this section."

* * * * *

"Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether he will consent to an amendment inserting after the word 'section,' in the seventy-seventh line, the words 'upon conviction before a court of competent jurisdiction?'

"Mr. WILSON. I should not vote for it, but it is with the House to determine. I cannot, certainly, accept it.

"Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Then I will offer the amendment if it is in order.

"The SPEAKER. The amendment would not be germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

"Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I move to close the debate on this section.

"The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 71, noes 43.

"The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. WILSON; which was agreed to.

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Golladay.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

"Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by inserting after the word 'ordered,' in the sixteenth line, the following words:

"Shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof by any court of competent jurisdiction."

"On agreeing to the amendment there were, on a division—ayes 53, noes 59.

"Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays; and being ordered, resulted—yeas sixty-three, nays eighty-two, thirty-seven not voting. So the amendment was rejected."

The proof produced in support of this contest would be sufficient before a military or civil tribunal, if unrebuted, to convict the persons whose votes I seek to reject of the crime of desertion.

This proof is unrebuted here, and hence these parties stand in this case proven to have renounced and forfeited their United States citizenship.

Would these facts, here established, have justified the judges of elections in rejecting their votes? If so, their votes are illegal and must be rejected here. There is no more difficulty in trying this question before election judges than there is in trying the question of residence or alienage or race. The records of the Army, such as here produced, with proof of identity before a court, established the guilt of a deserter until rebutted or explained. It is remarkably singular that proof sufficient to convict of high crime is not sufficient to show that a citizen has so behaved as to lose his right to vote or hold office.

Make conviction necessary before citizenship is lost, and the whole object and aim of the law will be defeated. The object of the law was to recruit the armies, to prevent their depletion, and to prevent those who abandoned the Government during the war from exercising any influence or control in the use of the elective franchise.

As I understand it, the Legislature of Pennsylvania and the courts of that State have virtually sustained the construction of this law for which I now contend. First, I am told that some court of that State divided three to two, in opinion, held that a conviction was necessary before the right to vote expired. This led to an act of the Legislature declaring conviction to be unnecessary, and providing that the official Army records, such as are here produced, should be evidence of the loss of citizenship. Acting on this law, some election judges have refused the votes of deserters on such evidence. Having been sued for so doing, they were justified and sustained by the lower courts and that decision having been taken up and sustained by the courts above. Thus I am informed. Here, then, is found the Legislature of Pennsylvania interpreting this law, and such interpretation the courts have sustained, and that interpretation is, and those decisions are, that conviction is unnecessary.

This is precisely the interpretation which I ask Congress to give the law, and I submit this question: "Does it require additional legislation to enable Congress to give such interpretation?"

It is then, after all, a question of construction as to what did Congress mean and what has Congress done; and on this question the Pennsylvania Legislature and the courts have decided that conviction is not required, and this decision accords with the plain and manifest intention of Congress when the law was passed, as well as the grammatical construction of the law itself.

I thus arrive by my argument at the following conclusions:

I. The right to create and take away citizenship is vested in Congress, and Congress has the right in all the plenitude of power which the States had over the subject prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

II. The States have no right to confer the elective franchise on persons who are not citizens of the United States, because thereby they might place the control of the States and finally of the nation in the hands of aliens, deserters, and enemies hostile to the nation, and not even possessed of the right of petition.

III. States may limit the elective franchise among citizens: as where by constitution it is limited to white citizens, or where it is taken from persons convicted of crime, when the State constitution provides for and authorizes such legislative limitations and restrictions.

IV. In the case before us, the Ohio constitution requires United States citizenship as one qualification to vote, and thus recognizes the power of the nation over citizenship.

Then, if the law under consideration rightfully deprives deserters of United States citizenship, deserters were not legal voters in Ohio.

V. Citizenship rests upon a contract or bond between the Government and the citizen, by which, for fidelity and obedience to law on the part of the citizen, the Government renders protection and gives immunities and privileges.

VI. When the citizen fails to comply with this agreement and perform his obligation, the Government may refuse to give protection and the privileges and immunities of citizenship, and accept the renunciation of the citizen, and this act of the Government is not in any sense an ex post facto law, or a penal law.

VII. The delinquent having thus lost his right of citizenship in the United States, is not entitled to the elective franchise in Ohio. And when he offers to vote the judges of election have the right and power, and it is their duty, to inquire whether he is a citizen or not, just as they may inquire whether he is a resident or minor or alien or of a race of men that is disqualified.

VIII. No previous conviction is required, either in terms or by fair implication, in the act of Congress under consideration.

The penalties for desertion are all left to be inflicted by courts, civil or military, after conviction. And the right of voting is simply withheld because the deserter has refused obedience to the Government, when obedience was necessary to defend and protect the nation, and thus and thereby has renounced and forfeited citizenship.

SPEECH OF HON. J. S. GOLLADAY, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 15, 1868,

In reply to Hon. HORACE MAYNARD on the reconstruction of Tennessee.

Mr. GOLLADAY. Mr. Speaker, I have sought the floor on this occasion to introduce a few thoughts suggested by the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] which was delivered upon this floor on the 12th of December last, in vindication of the State government of Tennessee. The length of time that has intervened since that date might to the superficial observer seem to preclude any reply at my hands. In consideration of the fact that both Houses of Congress are represented upon this floor by an accredited delegation it will be claimed, perhaps, by some as an act of supererogation for practical purposes; but in justice to truth and history, as in itself worthy of consideration, and the fact that I first saw the light in that once grand old State, that in youth I sported upon her friendly soil with my childhood's companions, and that in manhood I have traveled all over her length and breadth in far happier days, at least to her, when peace and plenty smiled upon her now desolate population, and her people were free, not only in name, but in fact; and in view of the further fact that she has no Representative in this Hall who dare now rise in his place and truly speak in her name and vindicate her outraged character from the unjust aspersions which have been so wantonly and cruelly heaped upon her true citizens, I feel myself impelled by a love of the land of my nativity, by the respect for all the kindly associations and memories of other days, to strike one lick for "Faderland," and make some humble effort to place her grievances upon the records of this Congress, that in the hereafter some gifted son of hers, now struggling beneath the wave of tyranny and oppressive proscription which pervades her land, shall rise here in our midst, and in burning tones of eloquence and pathos make these walls ring with the story of her wrongs, and point to this my most feeble effort in tribute to a not ungrateful son.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to say in all kindness, and with high respect personally for the entire delegation from Tennessee, that in my judgment she has this day no constitutional or legal representation on this floor. They do not represent the sentiments of the people, the honest yeomanry of that Commonwealth. They represent no republican form of State government. They only represent a form of government established there by the chance of war, and sustained to-day alone by military power and oppression, neither republican in form or in spirit. Under the government which exists there to-day her laws are not made by the representatives of her people. Her constitution was not framed by her people.

My friend, the honorable gentleman before alluded to, who so ably misrepresents that people, and each and every one of his colleagues, in my judgment, are here against and not by the voice of her people. It is due to them to say that they stand alone on this floor in their glory, if such it be, as being chosen by the newly made characters now euphoniously styled freedmen voters, while the men of means and enterprise, of morality, intelligence, virtue, of their own color, are wholly disfranchised and valued chiefly because they pay in taxes by their sweat and labor the expenses of this new government machinery, not forgetting the salaries imposed upon them by the votes of their manumitted slaves, and a few native whites, and quite a sprinkle of transient gentlemen who, like our celebrated Micawber, are only there "waiting for something to turn up."

My honorable friend [Mr. MAYNARD] in his speech stated that he rose to vindicate the State government of Tennessee. As he represents not the people of his district, but the partisans of the State government—as he, I hope ironically, calls it—it is eminently right and proper that he should have done so. The father should always recognize his offspring, and great is the ingratitude of the child which honors not the author of its being, even though the creative act was consummated by violence and the result the birth of a monstrosity. The gentleman's published speech (see Globe, December 13, 1867) contains this astonishing declaration:

"In examining the charges negatively it is well to remark that no complaint is made of any social or civil rights violated, of any person, of whatever opinion, condition, or color, unprotected in life, liberty, person, reputation, property, or business; of any crime unpunished, or of any individual wrong unredressed. It is a significant fact that with respect to these primary and fundamental officers of government it is not alleged that the laws are not impartially made and impartially administered."

I am unwilling to permit this declaration to remain without a most emphatic denial, and in the name of thousands of brave and gallant men and heroic women I enter an earnest protest against it.

The gentleman, no doubt, is pleased with the labor of himself and friends, for his presence here to-day as a member of this body is one of the practical results that have followed it, and if his roseate picture was true to fact either in outline, detail, or perspective, right well would he merit his place, for such a laborer well earns his hire.

How pleasant the gentleman's description of the workings of his State government, and what a Utopia is Tennessee. I almost conclude that when Moore wrote his charming work he was imbued with the spirit of prophecy and had Tennessee in his mind, with Governor Brownlow as her ruler and the honorable gentleman as her Representative and vindicator.

Right well has the work been done; for, to use the gentleman's language and examine "the charges negatively," I can safely assert that he holds the affirmative of his propositions, though "no complaint" had been made of the non-existence of that beatific condition of things which he would have us believe exists in Tennessee.

I make "the complaint" now. I do it without fear of successful contradiction, and I select this particular time to do it in view of the fact that, as other similar State governments are about to be forced upon an unwilling people, we may expect them to fail as signally in securing and maintaining those great ends for which people ordain and establish particular forms of government, to which they give their allegiance and yield their support, as that of Tennessee has done.

I do complain that the State government of Tennessee represented now on this floor is not republican in form; that it does not subserve the ends of good government; that it is one of force, not of consent; one of injustice and wrong, not of justice and right; one of war, not of peace; and as par excellence just such a government as Daniel Webster called "a military republic"—a government formed on mock elections and supported daily by the sword. Social and civil rights of thousands of her citizens are daily violated. No adequate protection for life, liberty, person, reputation, property, or business has any existence in many parts of the State. Crime and outrages are constantly being committed, for which no punishment is inflicted and no proper redress attainable.

The laws are unjust and unfairly administered. Founded upon a departure from the great rule of right and impartial justice, this government has been an outrage and a reproach to the American system from its conception to the present hour; not the creation of peace, careful thought, calm deliberation, mutual conciliations, and nice adjustment of its parts to the wants of a suffering population, and interests the most conflicting; but it sprang from the very loins of war, and was cradled in the hour of passion, prejudice, and oppression. Put suddenly in operation over a territory still vibrating from the tread of mighty armies; still white with the ghastly skeletons and yet red with the blood of slaughtered men, and inhabited by a people torn with civil dissensions, thousands of whom still wear the ragged uniform of opposing belligerent hosts; thousands of whom were wandering amid the ruins of once happy habitations, and the dead but happy memories of a glorious past, while thousands of others wept in agony for the loss of dear departed ones, many of whom, scattered over half a continent, as they were by the fatality of war, filled unknown and unhonored graves; with the accumulated wealth of long years of toil swept away, their labor system totally destroyed, and in their midst a once servile and docile race now drunk on the sweets of its first taste of liberty; perfect results were not to be expected out of such chaotic condition of things; but for God's sake insult not the memory of our forefathers by calling such a governmental fabric as the Radical loom sent to market from Tennessee republican! Let us look into its history.

Supplied with the luxury of a military governor during the war, or, at least, the greater portion of it, with all the spirit, if not the very forms of civil government overthrown and uprooted by the presence of contending armies, and the absolute supremacy of military power over the soil, the property, the business, and the inhabitants of the State, the war left Tennessee in a very singular and anomalous condition, regarding not alone her relations to the other States of the Union, but her form of government, or rather its want of form, as applicable to her own population. During its progress the presidential election of 1864 occurred. Preceding that election an electoral ticket favoring the claims of McClellan and Pendleton was put in the field.

President Johnson, then military governor of Tennessee, issued a proclamation governing said election, and prescribing conditions then unknown to the constitution and laws of the State. Among others, all voters were required to take the following oath:

"I solemnly swear that I will henceforth support the Constitution of the United States and defend it against the assaults of all enemies; that I am an active friend of the Government of the United States, and the enemy of the so-called confederate States; that I ardently desire the suppression of the present rebellion against the Government of the United States; that I sincerely rejoice in the triumph of the armies of the United States, and in the defeat and overthrow of the armies and navies and all armed combinations in the interest of the so-called confederate States; that I will cordially oppose all armistices or negotiations for peace with rebels in arms, until the Constitution of the United States and all laws and proclamations made in pursuance thereof shall be established over all the people of every State and Territory embraced within the national Union, and that I will heartily aid and assist the loyal people in whatever measures may be adopted for the attainment of these ends; and further, that I take this oath freely and voluntarily and without mental reservation, so help me God."

This attempt of Governor Johnson to control the elective franchise in the State in a manner different from that prescribed in the constitution was met by a very earnest protest from the McClellan electoral ticket in the State, which was delivered to Mr. Lincoln by Mr. John Lellyett, of Nashville, on the 15th day of October, 1865. The protestants, among others, made this strong declaration:

"We solemnly protest against these infringements of our law, conflicting as they do with the very letter of the Federal Constitution, because they are without authority, and because they will prevent a free, fair, and true expression of the will of the loyal people of Tennessee."

"The military governor expressly assumes, by virtue of authority derived from the President, so to alter and amend the election law of Tennessee, enacted under authority of the Constitution of the United States as above set forth, as to make the same conform to his own edict in the proclamation aforesaid. He assumes so to modify our law as to admit persons to vote at said election who are not entitled to vote under the law and constitution of Tennessee."

To this protest against the action of Governor Johnson Mr. Lincoln replied verbally, on the 15th of October, 1864, to Mr. Lellyett:

"I expect to let the friends of George B. McClellan manage their side of this contest in their own way, and I will manage my side of it in my way."

He replied further in writing, addressed to the protestants, under date of October 22, 1864, and therein, among other matter, after declining to interfere with Governor Johnson's proceedings, he said:

"I presume that the conducting of a presidential election in Tennessee in strict accordance with the old code of the State is not now a possibility."

To this the protestants, under date of October 28, 1864, replied:

"There will be no election for President in Tennessee in 1864. You and Governor Johnson may 'manage your side of it in your own way,' but it will be no election; and further, that 'in view of these things we announce that the McClellan electoral ticket in Tennessee is withdrawn.'"

My friend says there is "no complaint," &c. What is this? This ended the last attempt made by the patriotic men of Tennessee to hold any election under their old constitution. Men who had the power which military success always confers treated this constitution, under which the people had lived and prospered for so many years, with contempt, regarding it as practically abolished by the results and consequences of the war; and soon after steps were taken to establish what was called a new constitution in its stead. A convention of Unionists met in Nashville, January 10, 1865, and adopted a series of resolutions, upon which Governor Brownlow was nominated, and on March 4 the form of choosing a Governor, Legislature, &c., was gone through with, soldiers voting therefor in hospitals and camps. But a small portion of the population took part, or were allowed to take part, in this election; and the form of inaugurating a State government having been gone through with, it was soon recognized as legal by President Johnson, and some time after by Congress.

President Johnson, in his proclamation of June 13, 1865, said:

"And whereas I am satisfactorily informed that dangerous combinations against the laws of the United States no longer exist within the State of Tennessee; that the insurrection heretofore existing within said State has been suppressed; that within the boundaries thereof the authority of the United States is undisputed; and that such officers of the United States as have been duly commissioned are in the undisputed exercise of their official functions also; and I hereby proclaim and declare that the insurrection, so far as it relates to and within the State of Tennessee, and the inhabitants of the said State of Tennessee as reorganized and constituted under their recently adopted constitution and reorganization, and accepted by them, is suppressed."

On March 4, 1865, under the organization effected by Andrew Johnson, William G. Brownlow was chosen Governor by a vote of 23,388. At the same time a so-called Legislature was chosen by about the same vote. An examination of this vote will show how small a portion of the people of Tennessee were permitted to take part in forming this so-called State government, or admitted the right of others to do so, upon the ruins of their old constitution.

In the presidential election of 1860 Mr. Bell received 69,274 votes against 64,709 cast for Mr. Breckinridge and 11,350 for Mr. Douglas, making a total State vote of 145,338.

Not five years after Mr. Brownlow is made Governor by less than one sixth of this vote, and the fact that he had no regular opposition, and that only thirty-seven scattering votes were cast against him, show how thoroughly and well the work of the bayonet was performed.

This was the veriest farce of an expression of the popular will of the people of a great State which up to that time had disgraced our country.

The frail structure thus propped up by the bayonets and erected on the soil of Tennessee, took upon itself all the power and legislation of the State.

On the 5th June, 1865, the so-called Legislature passed what is known as their franchise act. A more outrageous, vindictive, anti-republican measure was never attempted before under the Constitution of the United States, and I might say in no democratic government under the sun. By this atrocious measure more than half of the white men of the State were deprived of the right of suffrage, among whom were a greater part of those who were most interested in the State by reason of their ownership in the real and personal property thereof, and most of those who by their talents and accomplishments in the walks of science and literature had done honor to their State in the pulpit, the rostrum, and the forum. At one fell swoop the highest privilege of political manhood was swept away, and the State deprived of the services of thousands of brave, intelligent, and patriotic men, who would die to-day that glorious old Tennessee might again live an honored equal among the sisterhood of States.

To say nothing of its illegality and gross injustice, one sad effect produced by this measure upon the prosperity of the State was that it prevents men learned in the art of legislation from taking part in the action of any Legislature. It prevents able jurists skilled in the laws from serving on the bench and giving that interpretation to law which is sanctioned by illustrious precedent, the progress of time and the usages of our country. One may say these men were rebels. Rebels to what? To the United States, perhaps, which rebellion had already been suppressed by the force of arms; but not to the State of Tennessee or to her constitution. Again, the fact was illegally assumed that 23,352 men choose certain of their number to meet together and declare four times their number to be rebels and not fit to vote, and they provide the machinery for prying into the conscience of men and getting at this fact by a system of checks and oaths which would have done honor to the inventive genius of a Spanish inquisition. This act violated the great fundamental principle of "no taxation without representation," and exposed the property owners of the State to a system of taxation most onerous and oppressive. Since this pretended government was established in 1865 the taxation has been regulated in the main by men who owned no great interest in the property of the State, and the taxes are collected of those who have no voice in their assessment, but it is alleged without contradiction within my knowledge that the legislators thus assessing pretend to represent counties in some instances where they did not live, and with less than one hundred votes in some cases.

Such a system is perfectly appalling in the disastrous consequences it has entailed upon the prosperity, the resources, and the business of Tennessee. Such legislators chosen under the bayonet, and many of them adventurers from other States, care very little what happens in Tennessee so it does not happen to them; and having nothing to pay tax on, and even less to pay it with, the amount or equity of a tax never occurs to them. One object in passing this act was that the men who, without any regard to the former constitution of Tennessee, held the election for Governor and Legislature on the 4th of March, 1865, might perpetuate their power. They knew they represented a mere faction in the State, and that they must disfranchise somebody in order to do it. Hence all were excluded who could not comply with the tests provided in this act of June 5, a very singular feature of which appears in section six thereof, which gives the right of franchise to "every white man who voted in this State at the presidential election in November, 1864, or voted on the 22d of February, 1865, or who voted on the 4th of March, 1865, in this State."

This means simply that all who submitted to the bayonet election of those dates, and gave their approval to them by their votes, had purchased thereby the privilege of coming to the polls without the risk of being impaled on the end of a musket. After getting ready for the next election by the passage of this act, it was thought necessary to make success more certain that Governor Brownlow should issue his "address" to the people, and the power of the bayonet was again brought into requisition as will be seen by reference to said "address" and the dispatch of President Johnson sent to Governor Brownlow from Washington city under date of July 20, 1865, from which I quote:

"I hope, and have no doubt you will see, that the recent amendments to the constitution of the State, as adopted by the people, and all laws passed by the last Legislature in pursuance thereof, are faithfully and fairly executed, and that all illegal votes in the approaching election be excluded from the polls, and the election for members of Congress be legally and fairly conducted. When and wherever it becomes necessary to employ force for the execution of the laws and the protection of the ballot-box from violence and fraud, you are authorized to call upon Major General Thomas for sufficient force to sustain the civil authorities of the State.

"The law must be executed and the civil authorities sustained. In your efforts to do this, if necessary, General Thomas will afford a sufficient military force."

With this promise of national aid by national soldiers to sustain their form of government and the franchise act, the farce of an election was again gone through with, and members of Congress were chosen, but a small portion of the citizens being permitted to vote. This form of government continued its operation, and the franchise act was amended by the so-called

Legislature in May, 1866, providing, among other things, that its restrictions and disqualifications should not apply—

"To those who have been appointed to any civil or military office by Andrew Johnson, military governor, or William G. Brownlow, Governor of Tennessee, all of whom are hereby declared to be qualified voters upon their complying with the requirements of this act."—Subdivision 3, section 1.

Now appears a new element for the perpetuation of power and a new piece of party machinery to aid in securing the party power and enable a minority of the citizens of Tennessee to govern the majority as powerfully and as abjectly as the serfs of the feudal ages or the slaves of the South were ever governed. Section two of this amended franchise act provides—

"That the Governor of the State shall, within sixty days after the passage of this act, appoint a commissioner of registration for each and every county in the State, who shall without delay enter upon the discharge of his duties, and who shall have full power to administer the necessary oaths provided by this act."

A thought will convince any one of the workings of this section when he reflects that each commissioner of registration was an appointee of Governor Brownlow, and that his position, as well as that of the Governor, depended on the exclusion of a sufficient number of voters to enable the adherents of the new government to carry and control every election. Men of the most bigoted and partisan views were chosen, often of the most reckless and ignorant character, who sat in solemn judgment on the acts and opinions of men whose every thought, even if mistaken in their views, had been for the good of Tennessee. Notwithstanding this enginery of oppression and outrage, it is known that in sundry instances, when the results did not meet the expectations of Governor Brownlow and friends, he very deliberately wiped them entirely out by rejecting them entirely, or beginning again, as he was authorized by a law passed by this despotic Legislature on February 26, 1868.

This act was followed by the passage of another on the 18th of May following which disqualified certain persons therein specified from holding any office, civil or military, and excluded them from all offices, State, county, or municipal. An effort was first made to secure representation for this government in this House in a formal way when Mr. BINGHAM, on the 5th of March, 1866, made his report to that effect from the select joint Committee on Reconstruction, to which the matter had been referred.

In tracing the history of this matter I have clearly shown that this government, thus established over the State of Tennessee, was the offspring of military power, and could not have existed without constant appeals to its aid even for a day; that it was framed by a small minority of the people without any regard to the wishes of the large majority. They were denied any expression of their opinions. This extraordinary and anomalous condition was alone sustained by the aid and comfort afforded by Federal authority claimed to be founded on Mr. Lincoln's policy and upon the theory that the State was obliterated, her constitution destroyed, her form of government at an end, and that the few loyal people of the State, backed by the whole military power of the nation, had the right to make this a despotic oligarchy by wiping out all old republican forms of government.

The rebellion either succeeded or it did not. I take it that all of the acts attending its conduct, except the actual material changes from life to death, and the destruction of perishable property, and change of its tenure by military force, were null and void. If so, what becomes of the constitution of Tennessee as it existed when the rebellion broke out? The rebels most certainly failed to destroy it, or to make a new one; and I submit to every thinking man on this floor if, during the progress of this unfortunate war, it was not authoritatively declared time and again that if the rebellion failed the State government would remain in its condition "ante bellum." In support of this assertion I quote from a speech delivered on this floor May 23, 1862, by the honorable gentleman himself, [Mr. MAYNARD.] He said:

"So far as there is a discrepancy in the statement of the facts it is needless to say on which side the truth lies, and as to the two philosophies no sane man can doubt which will be accepted by nine tenths of the American people. The death of States and the crushing out of institutions was not the purpose for which they entered upon the war. They intended the life of States and the preservation of institutions. Such has been, is, and I venture to affirm will be the policy of the President and his administration. It was this high conserving sentiment that led him to uphold of his sonatorial robes the great tribune of the people—Andrew Johnson—and intrust to his hands the labor of reinstating this great Commonwealth, in whose councils he had been so long conspicuous. He was sent not to destroy but to save, not to create new relations, but to restore and preserve the old.

"The State was not dead; its government was not destroyed; merely its functions for a time usurped and its action perverted; its relations to the Federal system suspended by violence. When the violence is overcome and the usurpation is subdued the former relations become active and the functions of the Government legitimate. The State exists as before. It has not been conquered; it has been rescued. It has not been subjugated; it has been disentrained. In times like these words are things and should be very carefully handled. In accordance with this theory has been the conduct both of the President and Governor Johnson. They do not believe a popular convention necessary to reorganize the community into a body-politic. They do not require new laws to authorize elections. They recognize the law anterior to the usurpation as still in force, and are providing for their execution. Justice, public and private, is administered in the Federal, State, and municipal tribunals; popular elections are held, and as fast as the State is delivered from the power of hostile troops the ballot-box resumes its sway;"

And much more of the same.

Who dare to challenge my witness? Verily "times change, and men with them." If my honorable friend was right then he is wrong now. If Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson, with whom he so well agreed, were right in 1862, why is it wrong in 1868? Who has changed, Mr. Johnson or my friend? Let the record speak. The honorable gentleman came here in 1866 and again in 1868 as a Representative of Tennessee, not as she was, as shown by him in 1862, but as she is, with a government founded upon the overthrow of his theory then when, to quote his own expression, "Words were things, and required to be carefully handled."

No amount of special pleading can reconcile, no sophism of the human mind can dress his theory then and now with the slightest semblance of similarity.

If my friend had only adhered to his theory then it might have deprived the people of Tennessee of his learning and experience now, yet he would be consoled by the knowledge that he was consistent with himself and with Mr. Lincoln, who died in the faith of that theory, to say nothing of Mr. Johnson, who yet clings to it as the sheet anchor of constitutional right, and also with one of the greatest captains of the war, (General Sherman,) who in 1865 recognized and adopted it in his famous negotiations with General Johnson, and, by so doing, manifested more real statesmanship even than soldiership, great and deserved as is his reputation.

If this had been carried out in good faith, as so eloquently portrayed by the gentleman, we would to-day be in the enjoyment of a restored Union, in truth and in fact, instead of widespread discontent, dissatisfaction, and poverty that exists in eleven States, with the people pressed and bowed down and overawed by a standing army, many of whose officers and subalterns, in violation of the Constitution and of every principle of civil liberty, are attempting to fill both civil and military positions, and at the arbitrary appointment of military commanders are filling State and municipal offices that under law are entirely elective. At the time this despotic and anti-republican State government of Tennessee first sought representation on this floor it is certain that political and not legal or constitutional considerations secured the representation and an acknowledgment by the law-making power of the nation. If time would permit, I would quote from the debates in this House to show the opinions of such distinguished men as Governor BOUTWELL and others to show the outrage; but I pass on.

The so-called Legislature afterwards, in February, passed a bill striking the word white from the franchise law, thus establishing negro suffrage in the State. About the same time a law also passed containing this provision:

"That in all State, district, county, and all other elections such aliens as have resided more than one year in the United States and more than six months in the State of Tennessee shall have the right of the elective franchise, provided that such persons shall have previously declared their intention to become citizens of the United States and that they shall not have participated in the late rebellion."

This is another of the important laws the gentleman talks about. The ignorant black, who knows not his alphabet nor ever heard of a written constitution, can vote. The foreigner, who knows nothing of our language or form of government, but with the despotic ideas or servile vassalage of the Old World, can vote. The negro and the alien, neither of whom can read or write, walk hand in hand to the ballot-box and exercise every political manhood privilege; the ballot for which our race and nation have struggled for more than a thousand years, for which they have reddened the page of history with the details of more than a thousand bloody conflicts in their efforts for liberty and equality, while the right is denied to more than half of men who have been citizens of the State and who possess four fifths of the wealth and have nine tenths of the intellect and education of the State. In other words, one hundred thousand whites disfranchised by the most reliable estimates and controlled by the negro and a small minority white vote. If these are the gentleman's ideas of "laws impartially administered," God forbid that he should legislate or sit in judgment upon me and mine.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown you the history of this Government, and I submit if I am not justified in my opinion as expressed, that the members from the State of Tennessee do not represent, and therefore cannot express, the voice of the people of Tennessee. To-day there are more white men disfranchised in that State than in any three unconstructed States in the South. We have shown that we got the State of Tennessee in the Union in 1866.

Now, of course, we have the paradise and smiling Utopia that my distinguished friend has painted upon the political canvas in the speech we have been reviewing.

Alas for human calculations! Let us examine the facts. In the fall of 1867, only last year, a difficulty sprung up between George Brownlow and the mayor of Nashville as to a municipal election provided for by law in the charter of the city of Nashville. Governor Brownlow insisting upon our construction and the mayor, under the written opinion of the leading lawyers of the Nashville bar, maintaining a different construction. Governor Brownlow summoned his State militia, which he had scattered all over the State, (as provided for by the Legislature under his recommendation,) to Nashville. The mayor and citizens were armed and prepared for a bloody resistance. Civil war within the State government was threatened by these oppressed citizens, and all they asked was for the United States to stand aside and let them settle it among themselves. Wiser counsels, however, prevailed, and the President and General Grant were telegraphed to, and I append their reply herewith, dated September 24, 1867, ordering General George H. Thomas, with national troops, to Nashville to keep the peace:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 24.

Your dispatch of this date has been received. The following instructions have been sent by General Grant to Major General Thomas, Louisville, Kentucky.

The mayor, city attorney, and president of the common council of Nashville express great fear of collisions at the time of the charter election, twenty-eighth, (28th.) Go to Nashville to-morrow, to remain until after the election, to preserve peace. If you think more troops necessary for that purpose, order them there from the most convenient point in your command.

The military cannot set up to be the judges as to whose set of election judges have the right to control, but must confine their action to preventing or putting down hostile mobs. It is hoped, however, by seeing the Governor and city officials here referred to your presence and advice may prevent disturbance.

Please keep me advised of condition of affairs.

By the President: ANDREW JOHNSON.

U. S. GRANT, Secretary of War ad interim.

Hon. W. MATT. BROWN, Mayor of Nashville.

I also append, for the information of this House, the correspondence between Major General George H. Thomas and W. Matt. Brown, the mayor, which speaks for itself, to wit:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT CUMBERLAND, NASHVILLE, September 28, 1867.

I have the honor to invite your attention to the following extract from your correspondence, as reported in the morning papers: "And General George H. Thomas having notified me officially, in writing, that he would use the military power of the United States in sustaining the Governor of the State in forcibly preventing a peaceable election," &c.

Referring to my communication, you will find that I did not so inform you. I did say that "a proper interpretation of General Grant's telegraphic orders is to sustain the State authorities in the execution of their orders."

I will further say that the troops under my command will not be used to prevent a peaceable election. On the contrary, they will be used to preserve peace. And, with that view, the troops are here to preserve order, peace, and quiet at the polls.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE H. THOMAS, U. S. A.,

Major General Commanding.

Hon. W. MATT. BROWN, Mayor of Nashville.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, TWELVE O'CLOCK, NASHVILLE, September 28, 1867.

SIR: At the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of this day I received your communication of this morning, in which you quote these words from my communication to the public in to-day's paper: "And General G. H. Thomas having notified me officially in writing that he would use the military power of the United States in sustaining the Governor of the State in forcibly preventing a peaceable election," &c., and add, "referring to my communication you will find that I did not so inform you."

With deference, I cannot concede the correctness of this last assertion. The Governor of the State had issued a proclamation, in which he had distinctly announced that he would use the militia placed under his control by the last Legislature to execute the franchise law in the pending municipal election, and to prevent the holding of the election by the judges appointed by the board of aldermen.

Subsequently, by an order directed to General Joseph A. Cooper, commanding the State Guards, the Governor directs him to bring immediately to Nashville all the troops, infantry and cavalry, you can command, "to enforce the franchise laws." Immediately upon receipt of this order General Cooper, by published proclamation, warns all parties to desist from any attempt to hold any election in violation of the franchise law." Thereupon I, in my official capacity, in order to prevent civil strife between the citizens of the State and the militia, applied to the President of the United States, distinctly stating that it was not the wish of the authorities of the city of Nashville to prevent the judges appointed by the commissioner of registration from holding an election under the charter as heretofore; all questions arising to be submitted to the legal decisions of the courts. You, General, were thereupon sent here with instructions such as we all thought would enable us peaceably to exercise our rights.

Afterward, upon some private telegrams from yourself to General Grant, with the contents of which we were not made acquainted, another dispatch was received from General Grant, which was not so clear in its terms. Thereupon I addressed you a communication as mayor, copying this last telegram, suggesting the difficulty of construing it, and asking you to "inform me explicitly whether you deem it your duty under the order received by you to uphold General Cooper and his militia in their threatened attempt to prevent the peaceful holding of the election heretofore ordered by the corporate authorities of Nashville." Your answer was in these words: "In reply to your inquiry, whether you (I) deem it your (my) duty under the order you (I) have received to uphold General Cooper and his militia in the threatened attempt to prevent the peaceful holding of the election heretofore ordered by the corporate authorities of Nashville, I have to say that the proper interpretation of General Grant's telegraphic order is to sustain the State authorities in the execution of their orders."

Now, these orders were not merely to hold an election under the franchise law, but to prevent any other election; and the object of our communication, expressed in the clearest and most unmistakable terms, was to know whether you upheld them in their threatened attempt to prevent the peaceful holding of the election ordered by the corporate authorities. And your answer is that your orders are "to sustain the State authorities in the execution of their orders." We submit to your better judgment whether your words admit of any other interpretation than the one put upon them; and if we cannot rely upon your better judgment, we submit the same to the candid judgment of the public. Instead of undertaking to keep the peace, we understood you as deciding that your orders left you no discretion.

We cannot think, General, that you have resorted to the language used for the purpose of misleading. We must suppose that you meant what your words plainly import. But, General, it is not yet too late to rectify the error, if it be one. You may still permit us to hold our election to-day, late as it is, or permit us to hold the election at a future day.

The code of Tennessee provides, section thirteen hundred and seventy-eight, that the franchises of a corporation shall not be forfeited or discontinued by a failure to hold the election at the proper time, but the same may be held at any time thereafter, by giving five days notice in the mode prescribed. If you, General, desire to see equal justice done, you have nothing to do but to notify us that you will see that we are permitted to hold such an election, without interference from the State militia, and we will at once take steps for holding it. We ask you distinctly whether you will protect us in the exercise of this right. The election (so called) which is now being held is clearly illegal and void in the judgment of the corporate authorities and the best lawyers in Nashville.

We do not intend to recognize its validity. All we ask of you, if we have misinterpreted your meaning, is that you now permit us to hold an election according to law. We think we have the right to ask to this request a prompt and unequivocal answer.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
W. MATT. BROWN, Mayor.

Major General GEORGE H. THOMAS, Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT CUMBERLAND, NASHVILLE, September 28, 1867.

SIR: In reply to your communication of this date, received at two o'clock p. m., I have to state that I did not inform you officially in writing, as stated by you in your communication to the public, published in the papers this morning, that I would use the military power of the United States in sustaining the Governor of the State in forcibly preventing a peaceable election, &c.; but I did state in that communication that the proper interpretation of General Grant's telegraphic orders is to sustain the State authorities in the execution of these orders.

GEORGE H. THOMAS, U. S. A., Major General Commanding.

Hon. W. MATT. BROWN, Mayor, &c.

It is only necessary to add that the military of the United States backed Brownlow's militia, and with bayonets, in violation of all law, forced an election under the registration law; preventing the running of a ticket of the people even, and by the bayonet forced a new mayor on the people of Nashville who had hardly lived there long enough to be counted a citizen, and by the military militia of Governor Brownlow took forcible possession of the office, ejecting the mayor, as will be seen, by order of Brigadier General J. A. Cooper, October 2, 1867, herewith appended.

Mr. Speaker, I might very safely rest my case here, having established, in my judgment, every proposition I made. I prefer, however, to bring my proof down to April 21, 1868, but a few weeks ago. The next witnesses I introduce, and for convenience I group them, are the eight members of Congress on this floor from Tennessee, and first among them is my honorable friend, Mr. MAYNARD, himself, whose card, addressed to Governor Brownlow, dated 21st April, 1868, I find in the Chronicle of this city, in which they advise him to again organize at once the militia of the State to keep the peace, and I herewith append that interesting document as a pungent commentary upon the utopian dreams of my friend, whose edifying speech we listened to last December. I also attach the comments of the editor of the Chronicle, (as they are short,) with the publication of this card:

"Law and Order in Rebellion.—No better evidence could be given of the state of society in the South, even where, as in Tennessee, established government exists, than the fact that the loyal Representatives of that State have found it necessary to urge the Government to call the militia into active service, as will be seen in the following important document. We may readily infer what horrors would ensue in case the White House apostate now on trial should be allowed to pursue his infamous career. If such things are done in the green tree, what will be done in the dry?

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 21, 1868.

DEAR SIR: As constituents identified with you in the success of your administration, we beg leave to call your attention to what cannot have escaped your notice, the disorders prevalent in certain localities of our State. Lawlessness and violence have attained alarming proportions. Peaceable citizens are terrified by threatening missives; the sanctity of their homes is invaded, often in the hours of sleep; their property is consigned to the flames; some are seized and scourged and otherwise cruelly maltreated; others are shot dead, or hanged, or subjected to some other form of murder and assassination. Punishment rarely follows, and in most instances no form of legal redress is resorted to. On the contrary, the victims of these outrages are maligned and their characters defamed by the perpetrators, whose conduct finds many to connive at, and not a few openly to justify it.

Upon you, as the First Magistrate and peace officer of the State, devolves the duty, under the constitution and the laws, of seeing these disorders suppressed. Not the statute law merely, but the common law, even without legislative enactment, clothes you with very high powers. You do not bear the sword in vain. The safety of the people is the supreme law, and nothing less than the exercise of all the physical and moral force of the State, by summoning to your aid, if need be, all the good people of every age, sex, color, and condition, will satisfy its imperative requirements.

The community must be protected at all hazards and at whatever cost. Happily for our beloved State, the exercise of this extraordinary authority has seldom been required; so rarely, indeed, that some are possibly unaware of its existence. We refer to it, therefore, not only by way of admonition to evil-doers, but to shield you, so far as our counsel can do it, from the imputation of transcending your just and legitimate powers in taking all necessary measures to suppress the maladies afflicting the people.

We respectfully suggest the propriety of organizing and arming, under the recent act of Assembly, a small militia force, with judicious and competent officers, to be stationed at points where the civil law is found the least efficient, to repress and punish high-handed crime. We know your indisposition to impose unnecessary burdens upon our people, already oppressed with debt and impoverished by war; and have the utmost confidence that you will exercise your great official powers within the limits of necessity as defined by the demands of humanity. While we hope not to see our State government driven to dependence upon national protection, we, at the same time, hope soon to see the moral influence of the national Government exerted in its behalf or against its enemies.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

HORACE MAYNARD,
JOHN TRIMBLE,
SAMUEL M. ARNELL,
W. B. STOKES,
JAMES MULLINS,
R. R. BUTLER,
JOSEPH S. FOWLER,

His Excellency WILLIAM G. BROWNLOW,
Governor of Tennessee.

How pleasant for brethren to dwell together in unity.

Mr. Speaker, I close by submitting the question to the earnest and patriotic men of all parties: Has the State of Tennessee a republican form of government to-day?

Thanking the committee for their patient attention and courtesy, I yield the floor.

National Debt.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN BEATTY,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 15, 1868,

In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BEATTY. Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest evils resulting from the war is the national debt. How to manage this debt at present and get rid of it in the future involves questions which cannot be too thoroughly considered by the Representatives of the people. Managed however skillfully it will continue a great burden to the country. Unwisely managed it must lead us to national bankruptcy.

At this time the people are looking with intense anxiety to Congress, apprehensive lest it may take some step in reference to the debt which will prove disastrous, yet hopeful that it may determine on some plan which will enable them to carry the burden with greater ease, and open up in the early future a way to get rid of it forever.

This debt amounts now, in round numbers, to $2,600,000,000. It matters not by whom the bonds are held; it is enough to know that the country owes the debt and it must be paid.

Much the larger portion of this debt will soon be represented by five-twenty bonds, which the Government has wisely reserved the privilege of paying any time after five and before twenty years from the date of their issue. In reference to the kind of money in which these bonds may be paid, the time of payment, the rate of interest which should be allowed on Government securities, and the kind of money in which the interest should be paid, there exists an essential difference of opinion among honest men.

JOHNSON-M'CULLOCH POLICY.

One party, respectable in numbers and influence, contends that the five-twenty bonds, according to law and equity, are redeemable only in coin.

PLATFORM OF THE OHIO REPUBLICANS.

Others hold that these bonds should be paid in any currency of the country which may be a legal tender when the payment is ordered.

SCHEME OF THE OHIO DEMOCRACY.

Another party, holding that they may be paid in the legal-tender currency of the country, and opposed, as they say, "to extending the time of payment," propose to issue an amount of greenbacks sufficient to pay off the entire sum represented by these bonds. To the latter proposition the objections are innumerable, and some of them of the most serious character. The first is the violation, which it proposes, of the solemn pledge of the Government made substantially in previous acts, and definitely in the act of June 30, 1864, as follows:

"Nor shall the total amount of United States notes issued or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000, and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for redemption of temporary loan."

As an indication of the deplorable consequences certain to follow a departure from this limit, and as an illustration of the utter folly of those who favor the scheme under consideration, I read from Richard Horner Mills's "Principles of Currency and Banking," in reference to the practical workings of a similar scheme which doubtless had distinguished and learned advocates in its day:

"FRENCH ASSIGNATS.—Systems of currency have been from time to time established which, confiding the issue of the circulating medium either to the State or to private companies, have provided no limit to such issues but the discretion and caprice of the issuers. Such was the scheme of the French assignats in the year 1790. At the first issue of these assignats the amount was limited by law to 400,000,000 francs, but in spite of this enactment in the space of six years the issue amounted to no less a sum than 45,579,000,000 francs. So great was the depression occasioned by this over issue that in the year 1798, an assignat professing to be worth 100 francs, four pounds, (or about twenty dollars of our money,) was currently exchanged for five sous, six deniers, or rather less than threepence, (or about six cents American money,) and this, too, notwithstanding a law punishing with twenty years' imprisonment in irons any one who should be convicted of the offense of taking assignats at less than par. The ultimate result was that 32,835,000,000 francs, of the nominal value of £1,313,000,000 sterling, was left as mere waste paper in the hands of the holders. Such depreciation as this amounted practically to the rescinding of every contract in the country."

The impracticable schemer who would tell a farmer that if he were to use a hundred half bushels instead of one to measure his grain that it would increase the quantity in his bin would be laughed at for his folly. The man who thinks that wealth can be created in any other way than by laborious delving in the earth and skillful adaptation of the varied productions and acquisitions of labor to the wants of life is an impracticable dreamer. The man who supposes that the Government, by the use of the printing press at its command, can at pleasure create wealth, is certainly not blessed with common sense. Notwithstanding all that may be said to the contrary, it is substantially true that a paper dollar is only valuable so far as it represents a gold dollar. Calculating money at the rate of four per cent. interest, a dollar payable fifty years hence without interest is worth less than fourteen cents payable at that time with interest; payable in forty years less than twenty cents; in thirty years less than thirty cents, and in ten years less than sixty-seven cents. The extent of the depreciation of paper depends on the certainty or uncertainty of its final payment, the time which must elapse before payment and the interest which it bears to time of payment. The public mind, taking all these things into consideration, discounts the paper which it takes, and this discount is the depreciation.

The depreciation of our present United States note is about forty per cent. If with less than four hundred millions there is a depreciation of forty per cent. from the true standard, what would be the depreciation if the amount exceeded two thousand millions? Would it not amount to eighty or ninety per cent.? What would be the expenses of Government as measured by this standard? What would be the taxes? A farmer under such a system would be compelled to carry his money to the county treasurer by the wagon-load, and in bags instead of in his pocket. But it is said that it will pay debts. Who would give credit and be compelled to take this depreciated paper in return? Who that had farm or stock, or anything valuable, would exchange it for such trash, which neither bore interest or any evidence that it would ever be paid? But it is said the amount would not exceed two thousand millions. How do we know it would not? It is said Congress would make that pledge; but Congress has already made such a pledge, and if it violates this pledge may it not violate that? Therefore, who would believe Congress? Who can doubt that the increase of Government expenses, as measured by the debased standard, would render additional issues necessary, and that these issues would continue until the paper ceased to circulate and the business of the country brought to a dead lock?

The act of June 30, 1864, is the embankment that protects us from a flood which threatens to overwhelm and utterly prostrate every material interest of the country. It stands up to-day between our people and bankruptcy. Disregard this pledge and you not only rob the bondholder, the holder of greenbacks, but also the widow and orphan of their annuities, the laborer of his salary, the soldier, the soldier's widow and soldier's children of their scanty pension. Those who favor this scheme would, in addition to the present sum, throw upon the country within the next five years over seventeen hundred millions of paper money, worthless as a medium of exchange, worthless as a measure of value, worthless alike to farmer, merchant, manufacturer, or laborer, so depreciated, cumbersome, and unwieldy, that it would be thrown away like the continental currency of our fathers as trash, which retarded and prevented, rather than facilitated, exchanges. The end would be a grand repudiation of all contracts between the Government and the people and between man and man. But suppose we grant that this currency would not depreciate to the extent described, and suppose, what is very improbable, that ten years hence it still retained some value, have you any doubt but that some patriotic and honest gentleman, who had an eye to the votes of his district, would rise in his seat and argue in favor of its repudiation upon the ground that capitalists had bought it up for a song, and therefore it would be a great outrage to require the people to be taxed for its redemption.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

National Debt—Mr. Beatty.

Ho. of Reps.

If it needed an additional kick to send it to the rag-bag, it would in this way finally receive it. Repeal the act of June 30, 1864, and commence the further issue of greenbacks, to be governed simply by "the discretion or caprice of the issuers," and you will go back to specie payments with such tremendous force as to crush every commercial and industrial interest of the country. You may then look for the years of the lean kine, in which manufacturers would fail, merchants become bankrupt, credit annihilated, and laborers thrown out of employment; years in which cries would go up from thousands of famishing and desperate men, who, rather than suffer their wives or children to perish of hunger or cold, would bid defiance to all law and take whatever their necessities required. In our cities riot, debauchery, and crime would darken the day and make the night hideous, during which no property would be secure, and no person could hope to lie down in safety; and when these calamities shall have culminated, the storm of passion, misery, and crime abated, and order again restored, the nation would find that by this act of consummate folly it had lost the accumulated wealth of more than half a century. It is said, and I have no doubt truly, "that the distress and suffering occasioned by the depreciation and final worthlessness of the assignats in the time of the French revolution exceeded a hundredfold that caused by the prison and the guillotine."

The advocates of this scheme forget that our departure from the coin standard under ordinary circumstances would have been most unwise, and that we were driven from it by the necessities of the time. Becoming familiarized with the Government greenbacks they insanely imagine that an increase in the quantity of this money will in some way increase the commodities whose value it is intended to measure. They can conceive that lengthening the yardstick would in no wise increase the cloth to be measured, but appear blind to the fact that an increase in quantity of the measure of values cannot increase the value to be measured, nor can they conceive that the measure itself may be made so extremely long as to be unwieldy and utterly worthless as a measure.

PAYMENT OF THE FIVE-TWENTIES.

The proposition to continue the five-twenty loan, and ultimately to pay it in gold, is objectionable because it continues a burden undiminished, when we have the right, as well as the ability, to make it lighter, and put it in a form more satisfactory to those who are compelled to carry it. The loyal people, rich and poor, who stepped forward in the time of the nation's trial and manifested their confidence in the ultimate triumph of loyal arms by purchasing Government bonds, are entitled to the gratitude of the country and to the honest profit which resulted from their investments. They have lost thus far nothing by their loyalty. In fact those who had most confidence in the final success of our arms made, and deserved to make, the greatest pecuniary gains. The war is over and we can make better terms now, simply because that which many before considered doubtful is now a realized certainty.

The depressed and struggling operator, engaged in some new enterprise, the final success of which many doubt, is compelled to obtain money upon the best terms he can. He must pay for the risk which the lender assumes. He does this cheerfully, thankful that there are those sufficiently adventurous to take the risk. But when he emerges from his embarrassment; when he has demonstrated his ability to pay, and his credit is above suspicion, if a sensible business man, he considers the propriety of effecting a new loan upon terms more advantageous to himself. This is business like; and it is right. He proposes to injure no one, to violate no contract, or to turn his back upon no friend. He was from the first confident of success, and reserved the right to pay at the expiration of a certain period if he found it to his interest to do so. He now chooses to make payment, and if he has not money enough of his own he proposes to borrow at a lower rate for the purpose. No one can question his right to do this. It is an honorable, manly, and sensible transaction. This is simply what the Government should do; that is, effect a loan at a lower rate of interest, pay off the matured debt, and the five-twenties so soon as the option in the bond will permit.

It is said, however, that these bonds are redeemable in coin only, and that it is impossible to obtain coin to pay the debt as proposed. Here I take issue with the objector, and deny that these bonds are payable only in gold. The act of February 25, 1862, authorizing the first issue of United States notes, declares in the first section that these notes—

"Shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin."

The act provides further that they—

"Shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt."

The second section of this act provides for the issue and sale of five-twenty bonds, "redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, after five years, and payable twenty years from date." It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of these bonds for "the coin of the United States, or for any of the Treasury notes that have been or may hereafter be issued, under any former act of Congress, (demand notes referred to,) or for United States notes that may be issued under the provisions of this act."

The acts of July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863, providing for further issues of greenbacks, both reiterate that "they shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts." All these laws were passed before these five-twenties were sold. Thus we find the law authorizes the issue of the greenbacks, and gives them power to pay all debts, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt. Then it authorizes and provides for the contraction of a debt; or, in other words, we find first, authority given to create a money which shall pay all debts; second, authority given to contract a debt. Is it possible, therefore, to resist the conclusion that this debt may be paid with this money?

It is said, however, by those who differ with us on this question, that the act of February 25, 1862, provided that any holder of United States notes depositing any sum not less than fifty dollars, or some multiple of fifty, should receive an equal amount of five-twenty bonds, and it is therefore claimed that these bonds cannot be redeemed with a currency which by law has a right to demand conversion into bonds. The act here referred to authorized the issue of greenbacks with this right of conversion. The greenbacks were issued and taken by the people, the bonds were not; and before the bonds were sold the act of March 3, 1863, was passed, which declared that—

"The holders of United States notes, issued under and by virtue of said acts, (February 25, 1862, and July 11, 1862,) shall present the same for the purpose of exchanging the same for bonds as therein provided, on or before the 1st day of July, 1863, and thereafter the right so to exchange the same shall cease and determine."

After the passage of this act, which also provided for a further issue of greenbacks, the five-twenty bonds were sold, and of course all who desired to take advantage of the right of conversion did so before July 1, 1863, and received from the Secretary of the Treasury five-twenty bonds in exchange for their notes. Those who preferred not to do so held the greenbacks with the full understanding that the right to convert them had ceased. Those who bought the bonds did so after the passage of the act which settled definitely the power of the greenback over the bond.

But it is said that the agents of the Government declared the bonds were payable in gold. If this be true it was simply the unauthorized opinion of the agents, which might have been honestly entertained, but in this case could in no wise bind the principal. At the time many believed they would be so paid, and why? Not because the agent said so, not because the law contemplated or provided for such payment, but simply because they thought that before the bonds matured the Government would be ready to resume specie payments. This opinion, unwarranted by anything in the loan laws, was found to be erroneous; and because it prevailed to some extent is no reason why we should be bound either in law or in equity to do what we never agreed to do.

Jay Cooke, an honest and able financier, advertised and sold these bonds. His opinion as to the termination of the war, the resumption of specie payment, better, doubtless, than the opinion of most men, was, however, not infallible. As a warning to all not to trust too fully to what could then only be mere conjecture was the plain simple notice in the bonds, that they were "redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after five years, and payable twenty years from date." And the greenbacks for which they were exchanged bore the conspicuous notice, staring all men in the face, so palpable that the "wayfaring man, though a fool, could not err therein," that they were a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

Can there be any doubt, therefore, in view of the law and the facts, that these bonds are payable in lawful money of the country; and is the bondholder injured by this conclusion? Certainly not. We have paid him thus far a good round interest. We propose to continue the payment of the interest until we redeem the bond. We propose to pay him money which has fully as much, if not more, purchasing power than that which he gave us for the bond. Can he have any ground for complaint? The broker who has been loaning money at two per cent. a month, may be somewhat loth to receive payment of the principal, because he regards it a profitable investment, and would be glad to continue it; but he certainly cannot refuse the money when tendered, nor can he consider himself injured because the debtor finds he can do better elsewhere.

It is asked by those who hold that these bonds can only be paid in coin, what is meant by the word "dollar," which the greenback promises to pay? I answer a gold dollar. These greenbacks must ultimately be paid in gold, but until they are so redeemed they are by law a legal tender in the payment of all debts, &c.

Because the "dollar" referred to in the greenback is so many grains of gold, it does not follow by any means that the "dollar" referred to in the five-twenty bonds, in the appropriation bills, in the laws giving soldiers bounty, widows pensions, or Government employes salary, must also be a dollar in gold. The "dollar" referred to in all these acts is the legal-tender "dollar" of the country. That foreign capitalists were governed by the letter of the law in the purchase of these bonds is evidenced by the fact that while bonds bearing less interest are now and have been selling at par our bonds have never brought more than seventy-five cents in any European market. I know that those who insist upon the redemption of these bonds in coin denounce those who differ with them as repudiators and violators of the faith of the nation. But these harsh words fall lightly, simply because they prove nothing, and proceed generally from the banking institutions and men who took advantage of the law making greenbacks a legal tender, to redeem notes in a depreciated currency which they had promised to pay in coin.

A NEW CURRENCY BOND.

Taking it for granted, then, that law and equity authorize the payment of these bonds in lawful money, I would suggest:

1. That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to reissue the full amount of United States notes which he has withdrawn from the circulation, and use the notes thus issued to pay off, as far as possible, the first series of the five-twenties, commencing with the first number, and calling them in in their order.

2. That a new bond be issued, principal and interest to be paid in the currency of the country, which may be a legal tender when such payment is ordered, making the rate of interest of the bond whatever the average legal rate of the several States may be for first-class securities, after deducting from the same an amount equivalent to the average rate of taxation in the several States.

It may be said that this bond would not sell. I think otherwise; there never was a more popular bond with the people than the seventy-three Treasury note. It may be claimed that the popularity of this bond arose from the fact that it was convertible into a six per cent. gold-interest bond. In my opinion very few of the original purchasers cared for the option, and at maturity did not seek to avail themselves of it, but sold the bonds for currency. A similar bond running for a longer term, bearing a lower rate of interest, with the understanding that the currency should remain undiminished, would sell as rapidly as the five-twenties would mature.

Thus money would be brought into the Treasury which would again flow out to the people in payment of the old bonds. The practicability of this measure can be easily and cheaply tried. If it fails entirely the loss will be trifling. If it succeeds but partially it will amply remunerate for all expenditures. If it proves successful, the bonds finding ready sale, it will save many millions to the Government. At all events, the effort to obtain a cheaper loan, whether successful or not, would satisfy the country that there existed an honest desire on the part of Congress to lighten the burden of the people. If it failed they would be to some extent responsible for the failure, and could not thereafter as justly complain. If the people, then, complain that the Government is paying too high a rate of interest Congress could say to them: in obedience to your wishes we have put a bond on the market bearing a less rate of interest, and stripped of the objectionable features of the old bond, and we now ask you to supply us with the money in exchange for the new bond to pay off the five-twenties.

It may be said the people have not the means to buy the new bond; but this is answered by the fact that the people and not the capitalists originally bought a large, if not the larger, proportion of the old bonds. If it is claimed that more can be made out of money invested in farms, merchandise, or manufactures, it will suggest the unfairness of the complaint made against those who make less out of money invested in bonds. By issuing this new bond in the denominations of fifty dollars and upward, you will give every man who pays taxes an opportunity to secure his fair proportion and place himself in a position where he will feel that just in proportion to the amount which his property is taxed to pay interest to others the property of others is taxed to pay interest to him.

The common sense of the people rejects with scorn the idea that a superior currency must be paid to one class of creditors and an inferior to another. Money good enough to pay the interest on a note of an individual should be good enough to pay interest on a Government bond, the interest on ordinary debts, contracted in every-day transactions; should be as sacred as the interest upon the extraordinary debts of the Government. The Government discredits and depreciates its own paper when it acknowledges that it is money for some purposes and not for others, for this action must necessarily contribute to make it an imperfect medium of exchange and an uncertain measure of value.

NECESSITY FOR DEFINITE ACTION.

It is claimed that the increased production, resulting from the disbandment of the Army and return of our citizen soldiery to industrial pursuits, and the consequent decreased consumption on the part of the Government, led to a reduction of prices, and thus caused the depression in all branches of industry which prevails throughout the country. But this, I apprehend, is only partially true. The return of peace, and withdrawal of the Government from competition for further loans, by restoring confidence and rendering money more accessible to the people, would, under ordinary circumstances, having encouraged industry, stimulated legitimate speculation, and gone far toward maintaining prices at the old standard. Nor do I believe the present stagnation in business and stringency of the money market arise so much from a deficiency of circulation as from a general uneasiness and uncertainty on the part of the people as to the future action of Congress in reference to the currency. If it is to be contracted, no one desires to invest in produce, in real estate, or merchandise, because in the event of contraction such investments must necessarily be unprofitable. If Congress proposes to inflate, no one desires to sell, because property sold now could not be replaced for anything like the same money after inflation.

We are just in that situation where the buyer is afraid to buy and the seller afraid to sell, for both are anxiously waiting for Congress to settle down upon a definite and permanent policy. The business of the country had become adjusted to the currency of 1865-66, and had the Secretary of the Treasury not interfered with the amount then in circulation, and given the people ground to apprehend a further serious reduction, every industrial interest would, in my opinion, have continued buoyant and prosperous. The capitalist is now afraid to lend, because if the Pendleton scheme is adopted, and the land flooded with greenbacks, he will get returned to him not half the value he gave. He prefers, therefore, to keep his money in hand, locked up and inoperative, so that at the first appearance of the coming flood he may put his money in realty, and allow others less sagacious than himself to bear the loss resulting from depreciation. The intelligent borrower is afraid to borrow, because if the contraction mania which possesses the Secretary of the Treasury prevails he will be compelled to pay back money which will have perhaps twice the purchasing power of that he borrowed. You rob the creditor when you inflate, and you rob the debtor when you contract. Give steadiness of value to the currency and you will do justice to both. In reference to the evils resulting from inflation and contraction I read from a report of Sir Archibald Alison:

"Any rise in the discount of the Bank of England has been followed by increase of crime and civil suits. This is attributable to great increase in the transactions of the country, which originate in the circulation being much and often unduly stimulated; then followed by a sudden contraction of the currency, which disables persons from the performance of obligations which have been entered into. Thus one state of things produces a multiplication of contracts, and the other produces a disability for the fulfillment of them that throws people out of employment, and reduces them to a state of want, and makes such a number of people idle that crime increases, disease augments, and everything goes wrong together."

The Secretary's Fort Wayne speech was the first note of alarm. The contraction of $4,000,000 per month which followed was evidence to the people that the theories therein expressed would be carried into effect, and that danger was imminent. To those who cannot conceive that so small a contraction, and a speech apparently so unimportant, can so greatly disturb the entire business of a nation, I refer the consequences of sudden and perhaps unfounded alarm as given by Mr. Huskisson:

"The consequences of sudden alarm cannot be measured; they baffle all ordinary calculations. Cash is then withdrawn; not because the circulation is excessive, but for the purpose of meeting possible demands, or for the purpose of hoarding. Each new calamity produced by such a state of things contributes to spread and increase the general apprehension."

Mr. Mills remarks:

"Prudence and intelligence in such a crisis avail nothing. Traders have been not inaptly compared to nine-pins, in which those who are not themselves struck are yet brought down by their neighbors in their fall, and by the failure of one the most remote may be affected through many intermediate steps."

This speech of the Secretary was the first intimation of approaching danger. The contraction of the currency which followed staggered and almost prostrated the business of the nation, not so much for the reason that that contraction made a deficiency of the circulating medium, but because it occasioned among the people an impression that there would be a deficiency. It was, to use the language of Mr. Mills, in reference to the commercial distress in England in 1847, "a case in which credit and confidence having been first shaken, ruin was brought to many by an apprehended scarcity of that circulating medium which they then had in excess, but that their alarm prevented them from making it available."

Allay all apprehension by restoring to the country the money which has been withdrawn, and by announcing that as the business of the country has adjusted itself to this volume of currency it shall remain; that you propose to let gold and silver grow up to the currency, and not to drag the currency down to it. Allow gold and silver to continue a commodity to be bought and sold like other metals, until by the natural increase of the population and wealth of the country, and by the development of our almost inexhaustible mines of the precious metals, the coin and the greenback shall at length correspond in value. Then the Government can resume specie payments, but need not necessarily withdraw the greenbacks from circulation. It can redeem them in gold on demand, and can give them out again to those who choose to take them instead of coin. The resumption of specie payment might be slow, but it would be gradual, certain, and without check or damage to the country.

Our business men, all men in fact who borrow, loan, or use money, would have a definite and permanent basis upon which to make their calculations. Here are $400,000,000 to be continued, without addition or diminution, and to be received by the Government in all cases, and disbursed in every instance, except where the law has specifically provided for payment in coin, and to continue a legal tender in the payment of all debts. In the mean time Government recognizing no other money, and regarding gold simply as an article of trade, so long as it is held above the greenbacks in value, to be bought whenever required in the open market of the lowest bidder. It is impossible for me to think that gold would advance or the greenbacks depreciate under this arrangement. In my judgment, if Congress should announce this as the fixed, stable, and irreversible policy of the Government, every industrial interest would thrill with new vigor, the farmer, mechanic, manufacturer, and laborer would be quickened into new life, and the Republic move onward in a career of prosperity without check or hinderance.

HO. OF REPS.

ONE MODE OF RESUMPTION CONSIDERED.

A proposition has been made by my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] to resume specie payments at a certain period in the future. The time fixed upon for complete resumption is June 1, 1871. This plan, if adopted, would amount practically to immediate resumption. The effect would be discounted; a general break down of all prices to the gold level would follow, as was the case in England in the very instance cited in support of my colleague's proposition. "In May, 1819, the law was passed fixing the time and mode of resumption," and "specie payments were fully resumed on the 1st of May, 1821, two years before the time fixed by law." This sudden transition from an inconvertible to a convertible paper currency was doubtless a profitable arrangement for the few men in England who owned the revenues of the nation, and whose rents, annuities, and salaries were thus greatly enhanced in value; but it bore with crushing weight upon the laboring poor as well as upon the men of moderate means—the mechanics, tradesmen, farmers, who were in debt for their tools, their merchandise, their implements of husbandry. These found the value of the articles necessary for the prosecution of their various pursuits, as well as the products of their labor, suddenly stricken down in value, while their expenditures, their debts, the bond of the creditor, remained undiminished.

I admit that gold is the solid basis upon which to build, but I would not rush thither upon the prostrate forms of the debtors of the country. If my colleague's plan should be adopted, the debts of the debtor would remain undiminished, while his resources, his ability to pay, would be lessened from fifty to one hundred per cent., and every creditor, bondholder, holder of greenbacks, would have added to the value of promissory notes, bonds, and greenbacks from fifty to one hundred per cent. It would place one half of our people at the feet of the other half, where they must lie prostrate or undergo the humiliation of seeking relief in the courts of bankruptcy. In considering this question of resumption we should not forget the private debts of the people, or the debt of the nation, which is the public debt of the people, and that common justice requires that the measure used in the contraction of these debts should be the measure used in their liquidation.

We were forced to adopt this new standard. That its adoption worked injury to very many is undoubted. To use an illustration of my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] "the man who loaned $1,000 in July, 1861, payable in three years, was compelled to accept at maturity as a full discharge of the debt, an amount of currency equal in value to $350 of the money loaned." We are not to blame for the loss resulting to this creditor, the sacrifice was necessary to save what to him was more valuable—the life of the nation. We cannot, however, now plead a like necessity for compelling the debtor who has borrowed $350 to pay back $1,000. We were forced to permit the one. If we permit the other, we do it voluntarily. Nor is it necessary, so long as peace continues, that either debtor or creditor should suffer, the only injury which can come to the creditor now must proceed from inflation—to the debtor from contraction. The financial distress of our own and of other countries in the past did not, I apprehend, arise so much from their first resort to paper money as from not stopping when they had issued enough. Their troubles grew mainly out of the overissue. They were deluded by the impracticable schemes of such men as John Law, and after rushing to the furthest limits of inflation became frightened and rushed back to the other extreme, beggaring one class of men in going out, and crushing another class in their return.

In conclusion, permit me to refer more fully to my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

ENGLISH PRECEDENT.

"I have not been," he remarked, "ambitious to add another to the many financial plans proposed to this Congress; much less have I sought to introduce a new and untried scheme. On the contrary, I regard it a strong commendation of this measure that it is substantially the same as that by which Great Britain resumed specie payments after a suspension of nearly a quarter of a century. The situation of England at that time," he continues, "was strikingly similar to our present situation; paper money had been issued in unusual volume, was virtually a legal tender, and had depreciated to the extent of twenty-five per cent. Every financial evil from which we now suffer prevailed there and was aggravated by having been longer in operation." My colleague here refers to years immediately preceding May 1, 1819, at which time the law providing for the resumption of specie payments was passed. In reply to his statement in reference to the condition of England before, at the time, and after the passage of this law, as well as to the effect which the law had upon the commercial and industrial interests of the country, I will read from Alison's History of Europe:

"The consequences of this abundant supply of the currency in Great Britain had been an extraordinary degree of prosperity to the country in the last months of 1818 and the first of 1819. In a word, the British empire in the whole of 1818 and the commencement of 1819, was beginning to taste the blessed fruits of peace and prosperity, and industry, vivified and supported by a currency at once adequate and duly limited, was flourishing in all its branches, and daily discovering new channels of profit and enterprise at the very time when scarcity of money on the continent was involving all classes in unheard-of disaster."

Now, in May, 1819, when the British empire was in this prosperous condition, and that, too, after a suspension of nearly a quarter of a century, Parliament passed a law substantially the same as that proposed by my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD;] and what was the result? I read again from Alison:

"The effects of this extraordinary piece of legislation were soon apparent. The industry of the nation was speedily congealed as a flowing stream is by the severity of an Arctic winter. The alarm became universal—as wide-spread as confidence and activity had recently been. Prices in consequence rapidly fell; that of cotton in particular sank in the space of three months to half its former level."

"This sudden and prodigious contraction of the currency rendered the next three years a period of ceaseless distress and suffering in the British Islands. The effect upon prices was not less immediate or appalling. They sank in general within six months to half their former amount, and remained at that low level for the next three years. Imports sunk from nearly thirty-six million pounds in 1818, to £29,769,000 in 1821; exports from £45,000,000 in the former year, to £35,000,000 in the latter. Distress was universal in the latter months of 1819, and that distrust and discouragement was felt in all branches of industry; which is at once the forerunner and cause of disaster." * * * "The contraction of the currency and consequent fall of the price of agricultural produce fifty per cent. fell with crushing effect upon a country (Ireland) wholly agricultural, and a people who had no other mode of existence but the sale of that produce. This had gone on now for nearly three years, (1819 to 1822,) and its effect had been not only to suck the little capital which they possessed out of the farmers, but in many instances to produce a deep-rooted feeling of animosity between them and their landlords, which was leading to the most frightful disorders."

In short, this scheme which my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] proposes to have us adopt, brought England from prosperity to the lowest depths of adversity, and filled the land with such terrible distress that Parliament could no longer remain deaf to the cries and importunities of the people, and in 1822 was compelled to repeal the most injurious parts of the act of 1819 by passing a law permitting the issue of one pound notes, and making them a legal tender everywhere except at the bank of England. "This," says the historian, "coupled with the grant of £4,000,000 Exchequer bills, which Government were authorized to issue in aid of the agricultural interest, had a surprising effect in restoring confidence and raising prices."

SPEECH OF HON. J. MULLINS,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 18, 1868,

On the bill relieving R. R. Butler from political disabilities.

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to submit a few arguments, founded upon well-established facts, touching the pending contest for a seat in this Congress between Hon. R. R. Butler, contestee and member-elect from the first district of Tennessee, and Hon. Joseph Powell, contestant. And it is well to here respectfully state that in the course of my remarks I shall not consent to any interruption by any gentleman on this floor.

It is with no little degree of painful regret that I rise to enter a most solemn protest against the admission to a seat on this floor of a gentleman who presents to this honorable body the prima facie evidence of a right and title thereto. Especially does it afford me pain when I consider that this gentleman, who so confidently asserts his right to a seat in this legislative assembly, is a Tennessean, a fellow-citizen of the same great State in whose representation in the national Council I have the honor to participate. And, sir, the task becomes still more disagreeable when I remember that the gentleman was elected by the suffrages of a loyal, nay, a Radical constituency, who acknowledged him one of the leaders of the great Radical Republican party of Tennessee.

The only apology that can be offered on behalf of his constituency for thus electing a man whose previous record is one of disloyalty and instability is, that during the progress of the war the individual votes and doings of the members of the rebel legislature of Tennessee were seldom ever published, and the people were therefore kept ignorant of Mr. Butler's conduct as a legislator. Since the war, and at the outset of his congressional campaign, Mr. Butler denied his record in advance and thoroughly blinded and deceived the people by his strenuous protestations of loyalty and Radical faith; and gained their entire confidence by his deep-laid schemes, his honeyed sophistries, and the subtle persuasions of his seductive eloquence.

Here then, sir, is a gentleman who claims a seat in the Congress of the United States, who was duly elected by a majority of the loyal people of his district, and who presents to you his certificate of election signed by the Governor of Tennessee, and bearing upon its face the great seal of the State. But, sir, notwithstanding all these prima facie evidences of the gentleman's eligibility, there are many facts contained in the record of his conduct during the rebellion which ought forever to exclude him from all participation in the affairs of this Government.

I am prepared to show how, in the course of the rebellion, this gentleman, availing himself of the many advantages of the chameleon, and assuming the characteristics and instincts of that loathsome saurian, deceived the people with his ever-changing hues; one while showing to the Union people the splendid tints of the loyal "blue," and another while displaying to the rebels his true color, the tawny gray! I shall show how, in the course of his political intrigues, he accommodated himself to every change that characterized the progress of the war; how, in the palmiest days of the rebellion, when the cause of the Union seemed most doubtful of success, and when the efforts of all true patriots were most needed, this Christian gentleman, this model patriot, anticipating, no doubt, the honors, the glories, and the emoluments of successful rebellion, dedicated himself in the capacity of a State legislator to the cause of "southern independence," and gave his sanction and support to almost every important measure that was adopted in the court of "King Harris" for the maintenance of the war and the promotion of rebellion against the Constitution and laws of the United States!

I shall also show how, when the pulse of the great rebellion, which had hitherto beat so high and so full, began to fail and grow feeble; when its hopes began to fade and to droop; when its once plethoric constitution began to sink and give way from loss of blood; when its "peculiar institution" had vanished, and, in short, when the whole frame of the monstrous giant began to quiver and sink in the throes of a disastrous death, this sprightly, sagacious patriot well knew how to adapt himself to existing circumstances; he did not forget the advantages of the many-colored lizard; his hue, which had so recently discovered the peculiar magnificence of gray chivalry, began gradually to change with the status of affairs to the soft splendors of the loyal "blue." The first unmistakable symptoms of Mr. Butler's disloyalty to the Government, and his espousal of the cause of secession, became apparent in 1861, when, pursuant to a call of Governor Isham G. Harris, for an extra session of the General Assembly of Tennessee, of which Mr. Butler was then a member, which extra session was for the purpose, as set forth in his proclamation, of legislating upon subjects touching the then incipient rebellion, and, among other things, for the perfecting of an act of secession, and an alliance of the State of Tennessee with the seceding States of the South, Mr. Butler made his appearance at Nashville among the other members, and, though at that very time under a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States and of Tennessee, voted for the following resolutions marked Exhibit No. 7, in the printed evidence before me, which exhibit is a certified copy of that in the House Journal of that Assembly.

SATURDAY MORNING, December 14, 1861.

Senate resolution No. 59, on the subject of a reconstruction of the Government of the United States, was taken up, and Mr. Jones offered the following resolutions in lieu:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this General Assembly that the separation of those States now forming the confederate States of America from the United States is, and ought to be, final, perpetual, and irrevocable; and that Tennessee will, under no circumstances, entertain any proposition from any quarter which may have for its object a restoration or reconstruction of the late Union on any terms or conditions whatever.

Resolved, That the war which the United States are waging against the confederate States should be resisted with the utmost vigor and energy, and until our independence and nationality are unconditionally acknowledged by the United States.

Resolved, That Tennessee pledges herself to herself and to her sister States of the confederacy that she will stand by them throughout the struggle; that she will contribute all the means which her resources will supply, so far as may be necessary, to the support of the common cause, and will not consent to lay down arms until peace is established on the basis of the foregoing resolutions.

Mr. Jarnagin offered the following amendment to the resolution in lieu:

Resolved further, That this assembly spurns with utter indignation the proposition which has recently been made in the Congress of the United States to appoint commissioners on the part of the Government to meet commissioners on the part of the confederate States, with a view to the reconstruction of the Union.

Pending which, on motion of Mr. Kennedy, the house adjourned to half past nine o'clock Monday morning.

In voting for these resolutions, Mr. Butler not only declared his sympathy with the cause of secession, but palpably, willfully, deliberately and without restraint, violated his oath to support the Constitution of the United States! But his treason does not stop here. This was only the initiative step in his mad career. After the secession resolutions of May 6, 1861, were passed, and the unwilling State of Tennessee had become, by their treachery, a member of the southern confederacy, Mr. Butler voluntarily became a candidate, was reelected, and became an actual member of the avowed rebel legislature of 1861-62, and took upon himself, voluntarily, an oath to support the pretended constitution of the so-called confederate States.

I, Andrew J. Fletcher, secretary of State of the State of Tennessee, do certify that the foregoing is a copy of an extract from the house journal of the confederate legislature of Tennessee, of 1861-62, the original of which is now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my official signature, and by order of the Governor affixed the great seal of the State of Tennessee, at the department in the city of Nashville, this 11th day of December, A. D. 1867.

A. J. FLETCHER,
Secretary of State.

On the 3d of December, 1861, Mr. Butler offered a resolution tendering the hall of representatives to the presidential electors, in which to cast their votes for rebel president and vice president; which resolution Mr. Butler supported with his vote.

TUESDAY MORNING, December 3, 1861.

"Mr. Martin offered the following resolution, No. 82: Resolved, That the hall of the house of representatives be tendered to the electoral college on Wednesday, the 4th instant, to hold the election for president and vice president of the confederate States of America.

"Mr. Butler offered the following resolution in lieu: Resolved, That the hall of the house of representatives be, and is hereby, tendered to the presidential electors on to-morrow, from eleven o'clock a. m., and that they are hereby requested to meet in said hall to cast the vote for president and vice president.

"Mr. Robb moved to amend the resolution in lieu by inserting after eleven o'clock to half-past two o'clock.

"Which was adopted; and the resolution of Mr. Butler was then adopted in lieu of Mr. Martin's, and the resolution as thus amended was then adopted—yeas 47, nays 7.

Representatives voting in the affirmative are: Messrs. Bowden Brooks of Jackson, Brooks of Weakley, Butler, &c.

This is another fair specimen of the gentleman's loyalty and devotion to the cause of his country! Mr. Butler offered a resolution, December 5, 1861, instructing the senators and requesting the representatives of Tennessee in the rebel congress to procure the passage of a bill appropriating the fund seized by the authorities of Tennessee belonging to the United States for the payment of claims against the United States held by "citizens of the confederate States" for carrying the mails and taking the census of 1861.

THURSDAY MORNING, December 5, 1861.

"Mr. Butler offered house resolution No. 83, as follows:

"Whereas there are many citizens of the confederate States who have just claims against the United States for carrying mails and taking the census of 1860: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That our senators in congress be, and are hereby, instructed, and our representatives requested, to secure, at as early a day as possible after congress shall convene, a bill providing for the payment of said claimants, and they ask congress to appropriate the fund seized by the State authorities of Tennessee belonging to the United States to the mail contractors and census takers of Tennessee who have claims against said Government; and that the secretary of state be, and is hereby, requested to forward a copy of this resolution to our senators and representatives when congress assembles.

"Which on motion was referred to the committee on confederate relations."

On the 15th of February, 1862, Mr. Butler voted for a bill granting power to the banks of Tennessee to remove their location in order to escape being captured by the Union armies:

House journal of the Tennessee Legislature, session of 1861-62.

SATURDAY MORNING, February 15, 1862.

"On motion of Mr. House the rules were suspended, and senate bill No. 89, to grant power to the banks in the State of Tennessee to remove their location if they apprehend danger from an invading army, and for other purposes, was taken up and passed its third reading—yeas 56, nays 0.

"Representatives voting in the affirmative are—Messrs. Britton, Brooks of Jackson, Brooks of Weakley, Bunch, Butler, &c.

Under this act the Bank of Tennessee was removed South, which bank contained among its assets about ten millions of money belonging to the people of the State, and a large part of it constituting a fund appropriated to the education of the children of Tennessee. This money was all converted into confederate bonds and notes for the support of the rebellion, and consequently was lost irrevocably to the people, the rightful owners. The trifling sum of about four hundred and forty-six thousand dollars out of the bank's assets of above eleven millions was all that was recovered to the State at the end of the war. Thus it was that the gentleman, by voting for this measure, not only contributed to the cause of treason by securing this money to the use of the pretended confederate government, but cheated the poor children of the State out of their educational fund and the people out of their just rights. Mr. Butler amended and voted for a bill to amend "An act to abate the suits of aliens," passed July 1, 1861, which bill provided that so much of the said act as required the suits of all citizens of the United States (the "aliens" mentioned in the bill) then pending in the courts of Tennessee, to be dismissed, should be repealed; that said suits might be prosecuted to final judgment, and that such final judgment should inure to the benefit of the so-called confederate States under the "sequestration law."

A bill to amend "An act to abate suits of aliens," passed 1st July, 1861.

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That so much of said act as requires suits then pending in behalf of citizens of the United States to be dismissed is hereby repealed, and said suits may be prosecuted to final judgment. This act shall take effect immediately.

Indorsed: Mr. Butler. Strike out "immediately," and insert "from and after its passage."

Amendment to house bill No. 9, to be inserted immediately after the words "final judgment," which judgment shall inure to the benefit of the confederate States, under the sequestration law, and that fact shall be stated on the record.

Indorsed: "Adopted October 12."

Thus it will be seen that the gentleman, by giving his assent to this measure, defrauded many loyal citizens of the northern States of their just claims against the merchants and other citizens of Tennessee, and appropriated the money to the use of the rebellion.

On the 11th of October, 1861, Mr. Butler gave his vote for a bill to amend an act passed June 25, 1861, entitled "An act to raise and equip a provisional force, and for other purposes," which bill was passed.

"House Bills on second reading.

"House bill No. 6 was read a second time, and the amendment recommended by the committee, striking out the first section of the bill, was, on motion of Mr. Martin, of Wilson, concurred in, and the bill passed—yeas 53, nays 13.

"Representatives voting in the affirmative are: Messrs. Butler, Carr, Carter," &c.

This "provisional force" was raised, organized, and equipped for the purpose of repelling the invasions of the Union armies upon the soil of Tennessee.

When, in 1861, at the request and by the authority of the Government of the United States, the Union men of upper East Tennessee had burned the bridges of the East Tennessee and Virginia railroad in order to retard the movements of the rebel armies in Virginia; and when the rebel authorities at Nashville and throughout the State were mad with rage and thirsting for the blood of those brave patriots who so daringly struck the blow, Mr. Butler, upon the floor of the house of representatives at Nashville, in the strongest terms and in a spirit of the bitterest malignity, denounced the perpetrators of that most righteous deed, and declared that they ought to be hunted down like wild beasts and brought to condign punishment.

Who ought to be brought to condign punishment? Those brave, dauntless Unionists who, at the behest of their Government, and although being in the very heart of the rebellion, dared to strike a blow for their struggling country? To what punishment should they be brought? To the punishment of the rope, the bullet, and the gibbet! And not a few, alas! of those brave men did suffer such a punishment for that act of injury to the rebel cause.

Some time in 1861 or 1862, when the rebellion was at the highest of its vigor and its prospects of success were brightest, Mr. Butler addressed a certain letter from Nashville to Colonel J. G. Fellers, of Carter county, Tennessee, than whom there is not a more honorable, loyal, and patriotic gentleman in East Tennessee. This letter set forth, in substance, that the independence of the southern confederacy was then a fixed fact; that it was useless for the people of East Tennessee to adhere any longer to their Union principles; and that now, while a fair opportunity offered itself to redeem their characters, so odious to their secession neighbors, they should forever renounce their fidelity to a Union which no longer existed, and join hand and heart with their patriotic fellow-citizens of the South (the rebels) in the cause of southern independence!

He therefore proposed to Colonel Fellers that if he would aid him in enlisting enough men in the counties of Johnson and Carter to constitute a full regiment for the rebel service, of which force Mr. Butler was to be colonel, he (Colonel Fellers) should be lieutenant colonel of such regiment. Colonel Fellers was highly incensed at such a proposition and treated it with utter contempt.

Mr. Butler subsequently made propositions verbally to Hon. E. Simerley, another Union man of Carter county, who can testify to such fact. Now, if the gentleman, as he tries to establish, intended only to deceive the rebels with the pretense of raising such regiment for their service, and when organized to send them through the lines to the Federal Army, why did he not communicate such intention to Colonel Fellers and Mr. Simerley when he made them the propositions? They were Union men, they were worthy of his confidence, and the propositions made were strictly private. They would never have betrayed him in such a design; and how could he have expected their cooperation in such an enterprise without communicating to them at first his alleged true intentions? No, sir; the gentleman was evidently in grave earnest as to raising a regiment to serve the rebel government; the circumstances will not admit of any other conclusion. The letter I have mentioned was read at that time by several reliable persons, by whom, as well as by Colonel Fellers himself, its contents, as just stated in substance, can be thoroughly established.

These are some of the many samples of the gentleman's acts of disloyalty and hostility to the Government of the United States for which he now professes so much deep reverence and devotion.

Such is the gentleman's record up to February 15, 1862. About this date, Sunday, February 16, 1862, to the great consternation and surprise of Harris and his legislature (of which Mr. Butler was then a member) the news of the fall of Fort Donelson reached Nashville. Instantly the whole city is thrown into the wildest confusion and dismay. The bells of the different churches, in which rebel congregations had gathered to pay their hollow devotions to the God of the universe by invoking the destroying wrath of Heaven upon the armies of the Union, were sending forth their wildest peals of alarm. The rebel citizens, horrified, dismayed, and pale with terror, are running from street to street, not knowing where to hide their guilty heads, as though the archangel of God was sounding the last trump of the resurrection! Harris and his band of guilty conspirators hastily convene at the capitol; the city of Memphis is fixed as the scene of their future operations; a precipitate flight is next agreed upon, and that devoted body of southern patriots is at once dissolved. The capitol is plundered, and its archives and movable property conveyed to the cars. A confused, terrified, surging multitude, consisting of his rebel excellency, his late august assembly, and his many citizen adherents, assemble in hotch-pot at the railroad depot; a victorious Union Army is thundering almost at the very gates of the terror-stricken metropolis.

The cars are boarded in hot haste, the signal given, and off they fly on the wings of steam toward the city of Memphis. Nashville is soon entered by the loyal and victorious troops of General Buell, and the stars and stripes once more float from the capitol of Tennessee! But in the midst of these great events, so pleasing and so glorious to every loyal patriot of Tennessee and the whole country, where do we find this Union-loving gentleman who so persistently lays claim to a clear and irreproachable record? Did he embrace the opportunity that beckoned him to fly to the arms of his friends in the Union Army at Nashville? Did he throw off the galling yoke of rebel oppression and duress which he claims to have been forced to wear, and did he place himself under the protecting ægis of the Government he now professes to adore? No! Instead of gladly remaining in Nashville with the few faithful that were found there to welcome the advent of the loyal conqueror, and to greet with triumphant shouts the starry folds of that dear old ensign of American liberty, he fled like a guilty criminal who dreads the stern justice and retributions of the law, and we next find him more than three hundred miles from Nashville away up in the mountains of East Tennessee among his constituency! Why did he fly from Nashville at the approach of the Federal Army? Were they not his friends? Was not their cause his cause? Was he not a Union man? Had he not consented to become a member of the rebel legislature under Governor Harris merely to check and retard as much as possible a series of legislative enactments so destructive to the lives and property of his loyal constituents, and to protect with the influence of his position the Union people of Tennessee? Had he ever done a single act voluntarily to the injury of the Union cause? Did he not love the Union and revere the Government of our fathers, and did he not worship its flag? Was not his escutcheon bright, his record clean and unimpeachable? Undoubtedly the gentleman claims such a record. But if all this is true, why did he fly? That is the question, and there is the rub. No, sir! He fled from his loyal countrymen because of the secret though terrible condemnations of a guilty conscience, which makes cowards of us all! He dreaded to face the majesty of his Government, which he had offended and injured, and a just and expected punishment for crimes which he knew he had committed!

He fled to the bosom of a loyal constituency, it is true. But did he long remain there? Did he share with them their misfortunes, their perils and hardships?—did he conceal himself, as they had to do, in the dens and coverts of the rock-ribbed mountains to escape the vengeance of those blood-thirsty minions of treason who were daily plundering the community and murdering the inhabitants. No, sir. Instead of this, where do we next find him, and what is he doing? Contrary to everything we might naturally expect of a Union man, as he professes to have been, we find Mr. Butler, in obedience to the call of the rebel Governor Harris to convene at Memphis, stealing from his Union friends at home, and sneaking, like a sheep-killing spaniel, away around to the south of Nashville, through Alabama and northern Mississippi, and making a circuit of near a thousand miles in order to reach Memphis, the then new confederate capital of Tennessee, where he again joined his rebel coadjutors in their dark conclaves to plot, as usual, against the life of this Republic.

Sir, can there be any clearer evidence of the gentleman's voluntary complicity in the crimes of rebellion? Could any stronger or more overwhelming proof be desired to establish the guilt of his intentions? Yet in the very face of this dark record he took and subscribed the following oath which is required by a law of the State to be taken by candidates for Congress:

I, R. R. Butler, do most solemnly swear that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the Government of the United States for the purpose or with the intention of aiding the late rebellion, nor have I, with any such intention, at any time given aid, comfort, counsel, or encouragement to said rebellion, or to any act of hostility to the Government of the United States.

I further swear that I have never sought or accepted any office, either civil or military, or attempted to exercise the functions of any office, either civil or military, under the authority or pretended authority of the so-called confederate States of America, hostile or opposed to the authority of the United States Government, with the intent and desire to aid said rebellion; and that I have never given a voluntary support to any such government or authority. So help me God.

R. R. BUTLER.

Sworn to and subscribed to before me, this 21st day of June, A. D. 1867.

JONATHAN LAWRENCE,
Justice of the Peace for Jefferson county.

Sir, how could the gentleman escape the condemnation of a court of justice upon a charge of perjury with such evidence as this before them? Have not the honorable Committee of Elections already pronounced him "guilty" in declaring him unable to take an oath which, in substance, he has already taken? Does he not already stand convicted before the country of violating a law which forbids men to swear falsely? How can the gentleman, after having voluntarily become a candidate for the rebel legislature of 1861-62, and after having voluntarily taken an oath, as a member of that body, to support the pretended constitution of the so-called confederate States; after having voted for the appropriation of men and money to the rebel cause, and voluntarily proposed various measures looking to the promotion of the rebellion; after having made a speech in the house denouncing Union men for burning the bridges of the rebels at the request of the United States Government, and declaring that they should be hunted down and brought to "condign punishment;" after having attempted to draw Union men into the design which he had formed of raising a regiment for the rebel service; after having fled from Nashville at the approach of the Union Army, joined Harris and his legislature at Memphis, and persisted thereafter in legislative acts hostile and injurious to the United States Government—how can he solemnly swear before Almighty God that he "never sought nor accepted any office, either civil or military, or attempted to exercise the functions of any office, either civil or military, under the authority or pretended authority of the so-called confederate States of America, hostile or opposed to the said United States Government, with the intent and desire to aid said rebellion, and that he never gave a voluntary support to any such Government or authority?"

Whatever doubts might be entertained in favor of Mr. Butler's intention as a Unionist up to the fall of Fort Donelson and capture of Nashville, they are completely dissipated when we consider his shameful refusal to remain at Nashville within the Federal lines, his disgraceful flight, and his subsequent presence at Memphis in the rebel legislature.

But, sir, however revolting the gentleman's record of political crimes, as thus far traced, may appear, I do not hesitate to say that its facts must sink into utter insignificance when taken in comparison with what I have yet to charge and to prove by the printed evidence at hand.

In this age of Christian civilization, in this land of Bibles, whose humanizing influences flow out like streams of living water to soften and to soothe the wicked hearts of men, to teach them to love peace and gentleness, to hate crime, and to elevate them to that sublime standard of virtue to which God originally intended and still desires mankind to attain; in this glorious era of Divine revelation which teaches man his true relations to his fellow-men and to his God, which warns him of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, and which points him continually to that bloody cross on which an agonizing Saviour expired for his sins; what, I ask, does a Christian community in this age think of a man who can coolly and deliberately plot, and by trifling rewards procure the assassination of his fellow-being? Such, sir, is the charge I prefer, and propose to prove against the gentleman who claims a seat in the great council of this nation; and here is the proof:

"Question. Please state if Johnson county, where said R. R. Butler resided, was not infested by a rebel company of home guards, commanded by William K. Waugh, and if you, while in the United States Army, was not ordered to come to said county, and while in said county if it did not become necessary to kill said Captain Waugh, and if you did not kill him, and what took place between you and said Butler relative to said killing?"

"Answer. Johnson county, where said Butler resides, was infested by a rebel company of home guards, commanded by William K. Waugh, and while belonging to the United States Army I was ordered to come into said county; and while there it became necessary to kill said Captain Waugh; and I did kill said Captain Waugh; and after I returned to the Federal Army I told said Butler that I had killed said Captain Waugh; he told me I had done the best thing I ever did in my life, and told me to go to the store in Knoxville and help myself to the finest pair of boots in the store; and I did so.

"Further deponent saith not."

"Question. You say in your book (page 239) that Sam. McQueen, Greene Moore, and other rebels of Johnson county, had entered into a conspiracy to kill all the Union men of Johnson county and burn their houses. Please state if R. R. Butler did not come to you at Knoxville and agree if you would go through the rebel lines and go to Johnson county and kill said McQueen, that he would make you a present of a fine military suit, and if you did not agree so to do?"

"Answer. He did agree, if I would go through and kill McQueen, he would give me a suit of military clothes; I did go through the rebel lines and made the effort, but failed."

In these two instances Mr. Butler according to his own proof, is legally and morally guilty of the subornation of assassination, and is, therefore, just as much an assassin as those who committed and attempted to commit the infamous deed!

In the history of all great criminals it is their first and greatest aim to conceal, by every artifice that devilish ingenuity can fabricate, their dark deeds of villainy and murder. However vile and depraved, however lost to all sentiments of common humanity, they dread to be held up in the glaring light of truth to the gaze of mankind, as a spectacle of ignominy, and an object of universal execration. But this gentleman, unlike the common villain, despising the shame and condemnation of public opinion, disdaining the contempt of all good men, scorning the spirit of Christian civilization, and mocking at the law which punishes the assassin, comes up before the Congress of the United States, and with a bluish, shameless face, with all the brazen effrontery of a devil incarnate, points to the bloody garments of his murdered fellow-man, and says, "This is my deed; this is my recommendation to a seat in Congress; this is the proof of my loyalty!"

Will this honorable body accept the gentleman's complicity in the crime of assassination as a proof of his loyalty and as a virtue? Will they admit to a seat in the Congress of the American Republic a man who is shown to be a traitor, a perjurer, and an assassin? If this is the course you propose, if this is the precedent you intend to establish, go exhume from a dark and ignominious grave the decaying bones of the assassin who, in an hour of national rejoicing, struck down our beloved, our lamented Lincoln, and plunged the nation into the depths of a mighty sorrow; gather up his bones, build a splendid mausoleum to his fame, place them in its sacred vault, and in letters of gold, let this epitaph perpetuate his glory: "To the memory of Booth, the assassin of an American President!" Rest not till you have rescued from the condemnation of all mankind, and exalted to honor and to glory the memory of every murderer, every assassin that ever stained with his deeds of blood the historic page! The victims of the gentleman's unholy revenge were rebels, it is true; they may have richly deserved death as a penalty for their offenses. But was there not a free and open field in which the gentleman might have displayed his valor and fleshed his maiden sword in honorable warfare? Or if he did not choose this method of chastising them, were there no laws of the land of which the gentleman might have availed himself as a means of his vengeance, instead of resorting to a crime blacker than treason itself, of which no man but a coward was ever known to be guilty.

And how peculiarly ill does it become the gentleman to allege their rebellion, with all its attendant crimes, as the reasons which impelled him to procure their assassination! Is he not, in a great measure, responsible for their disloyalty in his various treasonable acts in the Legislature; in his public expression of treasonable sentiments; in his proposition to raise and become the colonel of a regiment of his fellow-citizens for the rebel service? Is it not reasonable to suppose that by such an example, by such encouragements, many of his countrymen would become rebels? And yet the gentleman voluntarily brings up and displays to the world his complicity in their murder as a recommendation to a seat in this Congress, and as a proof of his loyalty! I have said what I have said not out of any motives of a personal character, but from a sense of duty to my constituency and to my country; and if the gentleman is offended I feel that I am not responsible; it is his record that has spoken, not I. I believe that the test-oath is a barrier absolutely necessary to the purity of the national council, and no man who cannot take it without swearing falsely ought to be admitted to a seat as one of its members.

Contested-Election Case.

SPEECH OF HON. L. S. TRIMBLE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 20, 1868.

The House having under consideration the contested-election case of McKee vs. Young, from the ninth congressional district of Kentucky—

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not expect in the time that is allowed me to be able to discuss either satisfactorily to myself or so as to do justice to its importance, the question under consideration. It involves the right of the people of the ninth congressional district of Kentucky to a Representative of their own choice in the Congress of the United States. The Constitution of the United States fixes all the qualifications necessary to entitle a member to a seat on this floor:

"Sec. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers."

John D. Young, more than twenty-five years of age, a native-born citizen of the State of Kentucky, and at the time a citizen of the ninth congressional district of the State of Kentucky, elected a member of this House by a majority of 1,479 votes cast for him in conformity to the laws of Kentucky, with the certificate of the Governor of Kentucky, in due form of law, presents himself at the bar of this House, and offers to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution, with the additional oath known as the test-oath, as follows:

"That hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation:

"I, A. B. do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: so help me God.

"Approved July 2, 1862."

The oath of office prescribed in the Constitution of the United States, as follows:

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution, but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under the United States."

That requires a member of Congress to swear that he will support the Constitution. This is the qualification fixed by the Constitution itself, and is all that Congress ever had a right to ask at the hands of John D. Young or anybody else to entitle him to a seat as a Representative in this House. The framers of the Constitution, in my judgment, never intended or expected that the right to a seat on this floor would be touched by the Legislature of the country. They fixed the qualifications in the Constitution itself, which neither Congress nor any power in this country has a right to add to or diminish. Congress can add nothing to the oath. Hence I maintain that the test-oath prescribed and required to be taken by members of Congress is in violation of the Constitution, and therefore void. And while I say this, I would not, as a member of this House, take that oath unless truthfully and conscientiously. Nor do I believe John D. Young would take it unless he could do it truthfully and conscientiously. He presents himself here and asks to be admitted. He proposes to take your test-oath. He is met at the threshold and told to depart. Congress becomes the keeper of his conscience, and says to him you shall not take this oath nor occupy the position the people of your district elected you to fill.

This principle has been established and maintained by this Government from the commencement of it up to this time. It has been sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of Garland ex parte, which will be found in 4 Wallace, page 333.

Congress, by an act passed January 24, 1865, extended the provisions of the act of July 2, 1862, so as to require the oath therein prescribed to be taken by lawyers practicing in the courts of the United States. That act was declared by the Supreme Court, upon solemn adjudication, after thorough argument, to be unconstitutional, not only because it was in conflict with the inhibition against the passage of bills of attainder, but because it was to all intents and purposes an ex post facto law, besides being in contravention of that clause in the Constitution vesting the pardoning power in the Executive. But there is another and far weightier reason for holding the act of 1862 unconstitutional, when sought to be enforced as to members of Congress, and that is, that it superadds qualifications, or, which amounts to the same thing, prescribes disqualifications for Representatives unknown to the Constitution, which in the very nature of things

Congress has no power to do. That decision, it is true, only applied to attorneys-at-law; but the principle applies, with great force, to a member of Congress. This principle was early recognized by Congress in the case of Barney vs. McCreery, from Maryland, and reaffirmed in the cases of Fouke vs. Trumbull, and Turney vs. Marshall, from Illinois. In the latter case the distinguished chairman of the committee at that time, Mr. BINGHAM, says in his report:

"By the Constitution the people have the right to choose as their Representative any person having only the qualifications therein mentioned, without superadding thereto any additional qualification whatever. A power to add new qualifications is equivalent to a power to vary or change them."

This was the language of Mr. BINGHAM as chairman of the Committee of Elections. Can any proposition be clearer? That Congress cannot add to or diminish the requirements of the Constitution, either in the qualifications or in the oath of office. The Constitution is the great Magna Charta. It is the supreme law of this land in war and in peace, for rulers and people. I ask that it be obeyed. Obliterate your odious test-oath, and let it no longer stand as a monument of partisan legislation.

But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot hope that this House will concur with me in this opinion. You act, in the language of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, your great chief, outside of the Constitution. I will proceed to argue this proposition, and yielding, for argument's sake, the full force and effect of the act of July, 1862, known as the test-oath act, I propose to invite your attention to the testimony elicited against Mr. Young, and on that testimony, in my judgment, if carefully weighed and considered by members and the rules of law applied that would be applied to the meanest and poorest criminal in this land, this House must render a verdict in favor of John D. Young and admit him to his seat. So far as the charge of giving aid and comfort to the rebellion is concerned, or any act that would preclude him from taking this oath, the evidence totally fails.

Now, what do they prove? What is the evidence? Take the strongest points relied upon by the friends of McKee—I will not say the committee, for they have said otherwise—for with them I propose to deal, as presented here, and apply the rule of law to them. Mr. Henry H. Ewing swears that Judge Young was at Prestonburg in 1861, long before the passage of this test-oath law, and when there was no law either of Congress or of the State of Kentucky preventing Mr. Young being at Prestonburg. The witness swears that confederates were organizing there, and he saw Mr. Young. He says:

"I do not know that he had a gun there. He showed me a gun standing in the porch of the house where he was staying, and asked me to take care of it. He said, 'There is a good gun; take care of it.' He never spoke to me about going into the rebel army."

This is the whole evidence in relation to the gun connecting Young with the gun. The witness at that time was not in the rebel army, and did not join the rebel army for more than one year after that time. Upon that testimony Mr. Young is told that he cannot take the oath truthfully, and that he must depart hence. There is no evidence in this record to show that Mr. Young took that gun there, that he owned it, or had anything to do with it. Nor is there any proof that this man Ewing intended to join his fortunes with the confederacy—none whatever. It was during a time of excitement in Kentucky, and Mr. Young might have been as loyal a man as any in Kentucky, and his motive, for aught I know, or the proof shows, might have been to give that gun to that man to prevent its going into the confederate service to be used against the Government of the United States. This man Ewing may have been a Union man at the time.

There are thousands of men in Kentucky who in 1861 opposed secession and revolution with all their power, and who afterward united their fortunes with the confederacy when a change of policy was adopted, as they conceived, and you now admit. Moreover, the testimony of numerous witnesses shows that Mr. Young went to Prestonburg for the sole purpose of getting out of the confederate camp his brother-in-law, the brother of the partner of his bosom, and keeping him out of the confederate service. Was that giving aid and comfort to the rebellion? Was it not bringing within the lines of the Federal authorities a man who he was fearful would join the rebellion? It was clearly an act of direct and positive loyalty and aid to the Federal Government and against the confederacy. So far, therefore, as that circumstance in relation to the gun is concerned I do not think that it will weigh one feather with the House. It should not. It cannot with any fair mind disposed to do justice.

What next? Another witness swears that two years afterward he voted against Judge Young because he believed that Judge Young aided to break up that camp, and came very near doing it at that time. Did that aid the rebellion?

What else do you have against Judge Young? Mr. Nickell swears that he was in Owingsville, in Bath county; that he was brought in there as a prisoner; and some man that they called Judge Young, a man he did not know, told the confederate officer to go to a certain house where there was a Union soldier, to arrest him. What does the witness state in each of his examinations? That the only time he ever saw Judge Young—"if this was him"—was that time at Owingsville. Nowhere does he say that he knew that to be Judge Young; but he puts in this "if;" "if this was him."

If there is any doubt upon this question, in my judgment that doubt is the property of John D. Young, and not to be given to the party seeking to deprive him of his seat here. Judge Young should not be required here to prove his innocence; reversing the principle of law, a principle of law as old and as just as the law itself.

I will not comment upon the character of this infamous witness Nickell; that has been ably done by my colleague [Mr. GOLLADAY] and by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR], a member of the Committee of Elections. I leave you to take his evidence, and give it the strongest force you can give it; and he exonerates John D. Young, because he does not identify him as the man who made the suggestion at Owingsville.

But it is said and argued in this case that the sympathies of John D. Young was not with the Federal authorities. In my judgment this House is estopped from making that argument in this case, for the Committee of Elections declared in the first cases reported from Kentucky that sympathy cannot preclude a man from taking his seat in this House. That report was made by Mr. Cook December 3, 1867, in which they say:

"That while mere want of active support of the Government or a passive sympathy with the rebellion are not sufficient to exclude a person regularly elected from taking his seat in the House."

The committee will not, I hope, ignore this sentiment and report.

Now this proceeding, so far as John D. Young is concerned, is one of great importance. It brands him as unworthy to hold any office in the gift of the United States, and if the constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth amendment shall become the law of the land, which I earnestly hope it never will, it will deprive him from holding any office within the gift of the people of his native State. He has the right, and the voters of that district have the inalienable right to the protection the laws of the United States and the State of Kentucky so plainly guarantees to them—their right of suffrage—and I, as one of the Representatives from Kentucky, demand that the rules of law shall be applied to his and their case according to your own decisions and as applied to all cases heretofore. You cannot deprive any man in this country of the right to his property, his life, or his liberty, or vote, without giving him a right to a trial by a jury of his peers, and giving him the benefit of all reasonable doubts as to his guilt or innocence.

He has a right, too, to have at your hands, as well as the voters sought to be disfranchised, the unanimous verdict of a jury declaring them guilty of violating some law the penalty of which is disfranchisement. This is no mere majority matter. It is one of the rights of an American freeman that cannot be taken away from him. But in this instance by a bare majority of this House it is proposed to take from over 2,200 voters of that district the right of suffrage, to take from John D. Young his right to a seat upon this floor. I ask you to apply the same rule to John D. Young that you would apply to yourselves. And if words and declarations that might be construed into aid and comfort of the enemy can be used to deprive a member of his seat here, then the same rule should be applied to Mr. Young that is applied to persons from the North.

While I have but little hope that this House will recognize the Constitution by giving to the ninth district of Kentucky John D. Young, the Representative of their own choice, thus acknowledging the principle our forefathers fought for, they offered up their lives and shed their blood in vain unless they established the principle that representation and taxation should go together. Can this great principle be less valued to-day than in 1776? No, sir; it will glow and burn until again enshrined in the hearts of every patriot in this great land. Sir, the Constitution will be preserved. The Republic must and will live.

I now turn to the report of the committee made in this case on the 23d day of March, 1868, eight months after that case was referred to them by order of this House. After that honorable and able committee had gone to Kentucky, investigated the case to their satisfaction, returned to this city, heard all the arguments on both sides, and considered the evidence maturely, they reported to this House that John D. Young was not entitled to his seat. They further reported unanimously—

"That Samuel McKee, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in this House from the ninth congressional district of Kentucky, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative."

Mr. UPSON. Let me correct the gentleman from Kentucky. I dissented from that report, and it is therefore not unanimous.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. Unanimous, then, with the exception of the gentleman from Michigan. I do not desire to do him or any other member upon this floor any injustice. I, however, so regarded it, and so received it. I believed there was no dissent at that time; that, in fact, there was no dissent until within the last month.

Mr. UPSON. If the gentleman will read the report of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McCLURG] he will see he stated that I dissented at the time.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. It is far from me to do the gentleman injustice.

Mr. KERR. I simply desire to say, in reference to the remark of my colleague on the committee, that at the time the report was submitted I understood him to concur in that report with the understanding if thereafter he should conclude it was his duty to dissent he could do so and file a minority report.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman has reference to the Missouri report. I did dissent from this report.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. At any rate there is the record. It was unanimous, with the exception of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan and the two gentlemen who made their minority report, concurring with me in the tenor of my remarks, that John D. Young was entitled to his seat upon this floor. I ask them if they will not stand by this report to-day and the principles enunciated in this report? What new light has beamed upon these gentlemen to show that Colonel McKee is entitled to this seat as having been elected by the qualified voters of that district? I propose to argue the legal proposition presented and to draw deductions from the facts elicited in this case. I propose to show, by the constitution and laws of the State of Kentucky and by the laws of the Congress of the United States, that John D. Young received a majority of 1,479 votes. I propose to show further that Mr. Green received 800 and odd votes, and if this House, in violation of the laws of Kentucky, and in violation of the constitution of Kentucky, shall turn out John D. Young and put Mr. McKee in they will disfranchise 2,300 and odd voters of the ninth congressional district of Kentucky, who are as much entitled to vote under the laws of Kentucky as Colonel McKee, myself, or any one else.

Now let us see what that committee did on that subject:

"After an examination of the testimony the committee are not willing to say that more than 752 rebel soldiers voted for Mr. Young. Of those 88 are hereafter rejected in the entire vote of various precincts for other causes, which would reduce the vote of the rebel soldiers to 666. But the committee finding that there is no law of Kentucky disfranchising rebel soldiers have not been able to see how those votes can be rejected."

This elects Young. Will this House usurp the power and elect McKee? If you do, you had as well abolish all constitutions and laws and elections in Kentucky and elsewhere. Let the candidates announce themselves here and make the canvass before you, and not before the people.

Now, sir, let us examine the law applicable to the report made by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. Cook.] That presents to the House two propositions which he alleges gives to Colonel McKee this seat, first, 625 votes of rebel soldiers were cast for John D. Young, the votes of those who had no right to vote; and second, 883 votes or majorities were cast for John D. Young at precincts in that congressional district, at precincts where the officers of the election, or some of them, were rebels and rebel sympathizers. Under the construction of this report the votes of all confederate soldiers must be deducted; as also the precincts where the majority for John D. Young was 883, and where there was rebel officers, one or more at each precinct, were officers of the election must be deducted. This would elect Colonel McKee by 41 votes. That is the theory; that is the proposition; that is the resort to which they are driven to make a report at all that Colonel McKee is entitled to a seat upon this floor.

Now, let us see what the constitution of Kentucky says on the subject who shall be a voter. It says:

"Every free white citizen, of the age of twenty-one years, who has resided in the State two years, or in the county, town, or city in which he offers to vote one year next preceding the election, shall be a voter; but such voter shall have been, for sixty days next preceding the election, a resident of the precinct in which he offers to vote, and he shall vote in said precinct and not elsewhere."

That is what the constitution says; and in my judgment there is no power in Kentucky in the legislative or executive department to add to or subtract one iota from that provision. The only way that that can be reached is by amendment of the constitution. The framers of the constitution of Kentucky never intended that this great boon of American freemen, the right of suffrage, should be tampered with by partisan legislation. They fixed it in the constitution itself, intending it should stand until changed in the same way and manner by which it was incorporated therein. I am supported in this declaration by the decision of the highest tribunal of my State upon the act known as the "expatriation law" of that State, passed March 11, 1863. Now, what does that law declare? Bear in mind this law could have had no application to many persons who joined the confederate forces prior to its passage. That law only attempted to disfranchise those who remained in the confederate forces after its passage or joined after its passage. All others were expressly exempted from the provisions of the law. The act will speak for itself.

The Kentucky Legislature passed this bill March 11, 1863, by a two-thirds vote over the veto of Governor Magoffin:

"An act to amend chapter fifteen of the Revised Statutes, entitled Citizens and Aliens."

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted, &c., That any citizen of this State who shall enter into the service of the so-called confederate States, in either a civil or military capacity, or enter into the service of the so-called provisional government of Kentucky in either a civil or military capacity, or having heretofore entered such service of either the confederate States or provisional government shall continue in such service after this act takes effect, or shall take up and continue in arms against the military forces of the United States or the State of Kentucky, or shall give voluntary aid and assistance to those in arms against said forces, shall be deemed to have expatriated himself, and shall no longer be a citizen of Kentucky, nor shall he again be a citizen, except by permission of the Legislature by a general or special statute."

"SEC. 2. That whenever any person attempts or is called on to exercise any of the constitutional or legal rights and privileges belonging only to citizens of Kentucky he may be required to negative on oath the expatriation provided in the first section of this act and upon his failure or refusal to do so shall not be permitted to exercise any such right or privilege."

"SEC. 3. This act to be in force in thirty days from and after its passage."

To give you a faint idea as to how this act was executed in my district and other parts of Kentucky, at the August election, in 1863, I give you one of the many infamous military orders issued and executed at that time.

Brigadier General Asboth's order, (McPherson's History Rebellion, page 313:)

"COLUMBUS, KENTUCKY, July 29, 1863."

That no further doubt may exist as to the intent and meaning of Special Orders No. 159, dated headquarters sixteenth Army corps, July 14, 1863, it is ordered that no person shall be permitted to be voted for, or be a candidate for office, who has been or is now under arrest or bonds by proper authority for uttering disloyal language or sentiments."

This was to cover the case of L. S. TRIMBLE, then illegally under arrest at Henderson, Kentucky, and a candidate for Congress.

County judges within this district are hereby ordered to appoint as judges and clerks of the ensuing August election only such persons as are avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion; and are further ordered to revoke and recall any appointments of judges and clerks already made who are not such loyal persons.

Judges and clerks of elections are hereby ordered not to place the name of any person upon the poll-books to be voted for at said election who is not avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, or who may be opposed to furnishing men and money for the suppression of the rebellion.

The following oath is prescribed and will be administered by judges of elections to voters and to such candidates as reside within the district:

"I do solemnly swear that I have never entered the service of the so-called confederate States; that I have not been engaged in the service of the so-called provisional government of Kentucky, either in a civil or military capacity; that I have never, either directly or indirectly, aided the rebellion against the Government of the United States, or the State of Kentucky; that I am unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, and am willing to furnish men and money for the vigorous prosecution of the war against the rebellious league known as the confederate States: So help me God."

Any voter, judge, or clerk of election, or other person who may evade, neglect, or refuse compliance with the provisions of this order, will be arrested and sent before a military commission as soon as the facts are substantiated.

By order of Brigadier General Asboth:
F. M. HARRIS,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Under such orders in Kentucky Congressmen were elected to vote, and did vote, for the thirteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution. I refrain from comment.

But, sir, why argue upon that law? The Legislature of Kentucky, after the war was over and peace had returned, blotted out that infamous statute and placed every citizen of Kentucky in the same position that he was before that statute was enacted by the Legislature. But in the meantime the Supreme Court had the question before them, and they decided that law to be unconstitutional and void: Here is the repeal of that unconstitutional act:

"SECTION 1. That an act entitled 'An act to amend the fifteenth chapter of the Revised Statutes, entitled "Citizens, Expatriation, and Aliens," passed March 11, 1862, be and the same is hereby repealed, and all persons who may have lost any constitutional, legal, or other right or privilege by operation of said act shall be, and are hereby, restored to the full and free use and enjoyment of the same, as completely as if said act had never been passed.

"SEC. 2. This act shall be in force from its passage, and may be pleaded in bar of any prosecution on any indictment, or other penal proceedings growing out of said act."—Myers's Supplement, p. 687, appendix.

Then why argue about this proposition? There can be no question that every one of the voters named and reported upon here had just as much right to vote as Colonel McKee and myself.

But what else do we find in this report? It is proposed to throw out six hundred and twenty-five voters who had been in the rebel army. The evidence does not warrant the committee in coming to that conclusion. I do not believe the proof shows that more than about three hundred and fifty or four hundred confederates voted for John D. Young, and in regard to many of them it is only hearsay testimony. That is the character of evidence by which he is sought to be deprived of a seat on this floor.

Now, what is the other proposition? It is that the Legislature of Kentucky have declared that no man who was in the confederate service should be an officer of election in that State. Now, sir, I deny that the Legislature of Kentucky ever could have passed such an act. There was no such law on the statute-book at that election. Long prior to the rebellion, when we had two great political parties in Kentucky nearly equally divided, the Legislature passed a law requiring that the judges of election, clerks, and sheriffs should be taken from each of the two political parties. It was merely directory to the county judge to select the officers of election from the two great parties. But in 1860 it so happened that there were three parties in the country, namely, the Douglas, the Bell and Everett, and the Breckinridge party. Under the law it was impossible to give to each political party one of the judges when there were only two judges. But after 1860 and 1861 there were but two parties, the Democratic and the Abolition or Radical party; and after the close of the war, for the purpose of avoiding any trouble the Legislature passed the act just read which restored every citizen to all his rights as fully as any citizen enjoyed them.

The last legislation of Kentucky was amnesty to all. This enabled the judges to give to the two political parties one of each upon the board of election. They recognized no secession party in the State of Kentucky at that time; there was none, and all our people arrayed themselves under the banner of one or the other of the great political parties of the country. And nothing could have been further from the intention of the Legislature of Kentucky than to deprive any one of his rights under the constitution of the State—either his right to vote or of his right to act as an officer of election as fixed by that constitution. Sir, the argument that they so intended is monstrous. It does violence to the enactments of the Legislature of the State, and violence to the candor of the gentlemen or their knowledge of the laws of Kentucky.

Sir, the Committee of Elections declared in their report that the absence of an active support of the Government was not sufficient to exclude a regularly elected member from taking his seat in this House. When they declare that, so far as members are concerned, surely a man's sympathies cannot exclude him from acting as a clerk, sheriff, or judge of elections in Kentucky.

Sir, there is no law of the Government of the United States, or of the State of Kentucky, that disfranchises a single one of these persons named in this report, or disqualifies them from holding the office of judge of election; not a single one. You cannot do it under the war power, for here is an express declaration of the Congress of the United States, long prior to this election, that this war was over and that there were no longer any belligerents or rebels in this country. That is the fact. Here was a recognition by Congress itself indorsing the proclamation of Andrew Johnson in 1866, as follows:

"SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That section one of the act entitled 'An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes,' approved June 20, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, continued in full force and effect for three years from and after the close of the rebellion, as announced by the President of the United States by proclamation bearing date the 20th August, 1866."—Statutes-at-Large, 1866-67, page 422.

Now, let us turn to the evidence for a moment upon which these precincts are to be excluded from the count, and over 2,200 of the voters of the ninth congressional district of Kentucky disfranchised. The first that I shall allude to is in the county of Fleming. They exclude the vote of the precinct known as Centreville. Here is the testimony of Dr. Maguire, the only testimony and witness relied on:

"Question. Do you or do you not know if the men named in your last answer, Mason Caywood, W. H. Cord, John N. Proctor, David Adams, Charles Darnall, and Thomas Butler, are, and were during the late rebellion, 'rebel sympathizers'?"

"Answer. My personal knowledge extends only to John N. Proctor and David Adams. As to them I answer yes. Mason Caywood and William H. Cord have been, and are publicly known as southern sympathizers, and in favor of the so-called southern confederacy, both during and since the war."

He does not say he knows their position—Caywood and Cord, judges at Centreville—but gives rumors as to how they stood.

Now, Caywood is a man I have known from my boyhood. He was an honored representative in the last Legislature of Kentucky, and was as much entitled to vote or to act as a judge in that election as I am, or any other citizen in the Commonwealth of Kentucky who lived in that district. And yet, upon the mere impression made up by Dr. Maguire, by rumors, that precinct is to be disfranchised, which gave Judge Young 182 majority. Without this Young is still elected by 91 votes. If a man can be deprived of his seat here upon such illegal and flimsy testimony as that, who on this floor can feel any security or any guarantee of his right to a seat in this House? Is there a Democrat in the land who could feel secure in his right to a seat here? Nay more, are there not thousands of Republicans who have been charged with sympathizing with the rebellion, if that be a sufficient ground to exclude men from seats here and make illegal elections held by them? Where would your Chief Justice Chase, President Johnson, and many of your most distinguished men I could name be? Where would General Grant be?

I heard him in my own district denounced from one end of the town to the other as a "Copperhead" and a "traitor," and he has been charged, too, in the Senate with making a white-washing report in regard to the southern States. Who escapes such charges in times of high political excitement such as we have passed through? I ask you, then, to discard all such testimony, and to give it the weight to which it is entitled. You could not convict either one of these men of any offense in Kentucky or any other State unless by a unanimous verdict of a jury, and upon evidence that is legal and competent. How, then, can you deprive a whole precinct of its vote upon such testimony as this—nothing but rumor and hearsay?

In regard to the Orangeburg district, Mason county; what is the evidence? That precinct gave Mr. Young 67 votes; and the committee throw those votes out. The following is the testimony of Mr. Ballock in regard to W. D. Coryell, sheriff of election in that district:

"I know W. D. Coryell to be an out-and-out rebel. I heard him thank God for the destruction of the Union troops at the battle of Bull Run; he never claimed to be anything else but a rebel; he was elected magistrate at the election held May 4, 1867; when he acted as sheriff he accepted said office, and is now acting as justice of the peace of Mason county."

Now, this is the whole testimony upon which that precinct is denied its voice and its votes in favor of Mr. Young. In regard to the other officers of election the witness says:

"I am acquainted with J. D. Mayhugh and Richard P. Tolle, who acted as judges at the Orangeburg precinct, in Mason county, at the May election, with W. D. Coryell, who acted as sheriff, John Roe, who acted as clerk, and have been acquainted with them for many years. Mayhugh, Tolle, and Roe claimed to be conservative Union men."

These three officers of the election are constitutional Union men and one a rebel sympathizer, as proved by the testimony of the witness of the contestant himself. That is the testimony upon which these people of Orangeburg precinct, in Mason county, are to be deprived of their right to vote. You may, and I hope will examine this whole testimony. You will find it hearsay and uncertain, unreliable in every respect. The sole testimony bearing upon the point in issue at this precinct is the sympathy of W. D. Coryell. You are forced to throw out this precinct or you still elect Young.

Now, if this House will not recognize what I have shown to be the constitutional right of the people of Kentucky to vote, if you will not recognize the acts of Congress since this has been a Government in regard to this question, if you will not regard the decision of your own Committee of Elections of the 23d of March last, a unanimous decision with one exception, if you will not recognize any of those great principles which declare the right of the State of Kentucky to say who shall and who shall not vote at her elections, if you will not recognize any of these authorities, yet there is one authority which may be considered by Congress as a sort of higher law, a authority which I think I have a right to demand that this House shall respect. It is an authority which was enunciated at Chicago on the 20th of May last, of which convention the honorable Speaker of this House is one of the nominees.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to see that the pledge of your convention is carried out and executed in this instance. What is that principle so enunciated? It is a principle which recognizes the right of Kentucky, or the right of any of the loyal States of this Union, to say who shall or shall not vote. I refer to the second article of the platform of that convention, which is as follows:

"2. The guarantee of Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained, while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

The first part I do not indorse at all. The last, that clearly leaves the question of suffrage with the loyal States, I do indorse as far as it goes. Kentucky has never been out of the Union.

I ask you, then, to stand by that declaration of principle; I ask this House to stand by that resolution, and to give effect and efficacy to the constitution of Kentucky and to the laws of Kentucky, none of which are in violation or contravention of any act of Congress. By that constitution and by those laws each of these 2,370 odd voters, 800 and odd of whom voted for Greene, is entitled to representation upon this floor, and should not be represented by having placed in that seat a gentleman who did not receive the votes of the majority of the people of that district.

HO. OF REPS.

Kentucky Contested Election—Mr. Adams.

40TH CONG... 2D SESS.

Now, I have no doubt the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cook,] in making this report, did not at heart intend to do injustice to Kentucky. I have no doubt that after his visit to Kentucky, after the welcome which he received there, and the observations he made of the law and good order prevailing there, he would not intentionally do injustice to Kentucky. He says:

"The evidence shows conclusively that in many parts of this district at the time of the election legal voters were prevented from voting by threats and intimidation; many witnesses testified that they wholly abstained from voting lest they should endanger their personal safety, and the proof shows these fears to have been reasonable."

The testimony abundantly shows this to be untrue.

And in my judgment this does great injustice to and is a libel upon that honorable Commonwealth and that district. They are a law-abiding people, and if there have been any violations of law in Kentucky the Democratic party there as a party has suffered under the infamous expatriation laws. My friends here were driven from the ballot-box at the point of the bayonet. I myself carried a prisoner by the military out of my district under the behest of a military tyrant. Under the pretext of executing this infamous expatriation law of Kentucky, every outrage has been committed in Kentucky known to the calendar of crime. Under it there have been foisted in this House of Representatives from Kentucky men elected by the bayonet who aided in carrying out the constitutional amendment which deprived citizens of Kentucky of their right to their property, without whose votes the first or thirteenth amendment to the Constitution could not have been carried through this House.

If there is any one anywhere who has the right to complain it is upon the other side, the true constitutional Union men, the Democracy of Kentucky.

Kentucky Contested Election.

SPEECH OF HON. G. M. ADAMS,
OF KENTUCKY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 22, 1868,

On the contested-election case of McKee vs. Young, from the ninth congressional district of Kentucky.

MR. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I cannot, of course, hope that anything which I may be able to say is likely to influence the action of the House in this case; but, sir, interested as I feel in seeing the people of my State, in common with the other States, represented here by the man of their choice, and unwilling that the right of my colleague to this seat, and of his constituents to choose their own Representative shall be here denied, I desire in his name, and in their behalf, to protest against this whole proceeding from beginning to end, and especially against the resolutions now under consideration, in opposition to which I propose to submit a few remarks.

Before, however, alluding to this particular case, I desire to call attention to the extraordinary course which has been pursued with reference to the other members elected from the State of Kentucky, against whom, I hope I may be pardoned for saying, the most flagrant and unjust discrimination has been made by the majority on this floor. What, sir, are the facts? On the 3d day of July last, seven of the members duly elected and accredited from that State, were refused seats upon this floor. All of them against whom any charge of disloyalty was made, no matter how vague and indefinite the charge, were at once refused admission until their loyalty should be investigated and reported upon by a committee to whom their credentials were referred. And not only was this the case with those against whom the charge of disloyalty was made, but three of those members, Mr. BECK, Mr. JONES, and Mr. GROVER, against whom no such charges were made, and against whose qualifications no objection could be urged, were also refused admission, and their credentials likewise referred to this committee for investigation and report. It may seem strange that these three gentlemen against whom nothing could then be urged and against whose admission you have since decided that there was no good ground for objection, should have been thus deprived for many months of the seats to which they had been constitutionally elected; but it is nevertheless true that at the time their credentials were thus referred no charge of disloyalty or disqualification had been made against them, and no member of the House then professed to know himself or to have information from others that any such charges could or would be made against either of them.

When, however, the Tennessee delegation, all of whom were known to agree politically with the majority on this floor, presented themselves in November following, a different rule entirely was observed. Charges of disloyalty were distinctly made, and the evidence upon which the charges were founded presented to the House against two of the members from that State, Colonel STOKES and Mr. MULLINS. Against the former was produced his famous letter of May 10, 1861, known as the Duncan letter, in which he commends Governor Harris for his preparations to resist the armies of the Union, and declares that he has enrolled his name as a volunteer for that purpose. Against the latter was produced the certificate of an officer of the Federal Army, declaring that he heard Colonel MULLINS in 1861, in a public speech encouraging and exhorting the young men of Tennessee to enlist in the rebel army, saying that he himself was prevented from doing so only in consequence of his infirmity and old age. And yet, these two gentlemen are at once admitted without even an investigation of these charges.

Sir, I cannot understand, and the country will not be able to understand why the charge of disloyalty should not exclude members from one State as well as from another. And especially why these members from Tennessee, thus charged and thus convicted of disloyalty, should be willingly admitted, while members from Kentucky, whose loyalty is unchallenged; and whose qualifications are unquestioned should, at the same time, be excluded. I allude to these things now, Mr. Speaker, not so much by way of complaint as for the purpose of showing to what an extent party feeling and political prejudice seem to have controlled the action of the House on these subjects, and for the purpose of appealing to the majority here to discard all such considerations in the investigation of this case, which I hope may be decided according to the requirements of justice, of reason, and of law. I know the partiality which, from political considerations, the majority in this House naturally feel for the contestant in this case, and I am aware of the prejudice and opposition which, for the same reason, is felt against the member-elect, Judge Young. But, sir, I beg to remind the House that this is not a political question, and is not to be decided according to our preferences or our feelings, but a question of right to be determined by this House in accordance with fixed laws and established precedents beyond which it cannot go for the gratification of any personal or political feeling.

The committee have, in this case, made two different reports, the first on the 23d day of March last, after several months' deliberation with all the facts of this case before them, in which they say that Judge Young has a majority of 5 votes, even assuming to be correct certain positions taken by the contestant, but as to the correctness of which they are careful not to express any opinion, as such opinion

(if consistent with their former rulings) must have been adverse to positions assumed by the contestant. They, however, further report that 8 persons who voted for Judge Young are proved to have been deserters. Thus leaving the House to infer, what they themselves were unwilling in terms to declare, that Judge Young's legal majority was only 5 votes, which might be overcome by excluding the 8 deserters named.

This report, however, not being deemed sufficient, the case was a few days since recommitted and accordingly a second report was made, declaring the contestant McKee elected by a majority of 41 votes. This last report not only differs widely from the first, but is in direct conflict with the opinions expressed by the committee in other cases. And I must say that they have in this case shown a facility for changing their opinions and for shifting around from one position to another such as I have never seen exhibited by any body of honest men charged with the investigation of so important a question.

It is admitted that the returns show the election of Judge Young by a majority of 1479. Let us see, therefore, how the committee dispose of this large majority and bring about the election of the contestant McKee. First, they report that of those who voted for Judge Young 625 were engaged in the rebellion, who are therefore disqualified from voting. But, sir, this class of persons have under the constitution and laws of Kentucky, the right to vote; and if the people of Kentucky have the right to determine who shall vote at their elections then there can be no doubt or question as to the legality of these votes. And as to the right of each State to regulate the question of suffrage for themselves it is a doctrine so well settled and so long and so universally admitted that no argument seems necessary now to establish its correctness.

It will certainly be admitted that the States originally had the right to control this subject, as, indeed, they had the right to control all other subjects by which they were to be affected. It is true, that in the adoption of the Constitution some of the original rights possessed by the States were surrendered for the common good of the country and many of them delegated to the General Government; but the right to regulate the question of suffrage for themselves is one of the original rights which has never been thus delegated or surrendered, and of course still remains with the States, where alone it can properly be exercised.

Besides, the Constitution itself is explicit upon this point. It says:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Thus showing that it was not intended that the General Government should ever establish any qualification for voters except such as the States might require in the election of members to the State Legislature.

But, sir, in addition to this, I would commend to the consideration of the Republican side of the House one of the resolutions adopted by the national Republican convention, which recently met at Chicago, to which my colleague [Mr. TRIMBLE] has already alluded, and which, I imagine, all Republicans, at least, will regard as good authority on this subject. It says:

"The guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained; while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

Here the Republican party declare that while Congress had the right to enfranchise the negroes of the South, the question of suffrage in the loyal States belongs not in Congress, but to the people of the States to regulate for themselves. How, then, can any man who belongs to that party and stands pledged to support the principles therein proclaimed afford to stultify himself by voting for these resolutions which propose to interfere directly with the question of suffrage in one of the loyal States. But whatever may be the opinion of this House in regard to the right of Congress to control this subject and to disfranchise these persons it is sufficient to say it has never exercised this right or attempted to pass any law for that purpose; and there is not to-day in existence any law, either of the United States or of the State of Kentucky, which makes these votes illegal or authorizes their rejection. These resolutions, therefore, assume not merely the right of Congress to interfere with the question of suffrage in the States, but the right of this House to do so without any law of Congress whatever upon the subject.

I am aware, sir, that many of the Republicans on this floor claim the right of Congress to regulate the question of suffrage in the States, and since their refusal to vote down the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] to inaugurate negro suffrage in all the States of the Union, I have supposed that a majority of them advocated this doctrine; but, sir, I had not supposed that any man outside of a lunatic asylum would for a moment contend that this House, acting alone and independently of the Senate, and without any law whatever to authorize it, has the right in any way to interfere with this subject. And yet this is the position this House must assume before it can exclude these votes or admit the contestant McKee to this seat. If this House can say who shall and who shall not vote in the State of Kentucky, then it can enfranchise the negroes of that State, and can deprive the people of Kentucky of the right to exercise any control whatever over that subject.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] tells us that the rebels are all disfranchised, but he fails to show under what law and by what authority it was done. He seems horror-stricken at the idea that rebels who have been in arms against the Government should now be allowed to vote in the election of those who are to make its laws, and yet he knows that the reconstruction measures, passed by a Republican Congress and supported by himself, expressly recognize the right of rebels to vote in all the southern States, not only for members of Congress, but also upon questions much more grave and important. The gentleman and his party have been constantly demanding that they should adopt certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and will they now contend that the very class of persons whom they have repeatedly called upon to amend the Constitution have not now the right to vote for members of Congress who are to be controlled in their legislation by the very Constitution which they have by their votes helped to modify and amend? Such a proposition, sir, is simply ridiculous. And it only remains to be seen whether the majority on this floor will now attempt to regulate a question which they have in their party platform declared they had no right to control; and whether they will now attempt to reject votes the legality of which they have recognized in their own laws.

In addition to the 625 rebel votes, it is claimed that 8 deserters voted for Judge Young, who are also disfranchised, making in all 633 votes, which, it is charged, are illegal and ought, therefore, to be rejected. But even if these 633 alleged illegal votes be rejected it still leaves Judge Young with a majority of 706 votes, the legality of which are not questioned. But it is charged that at ten voting precincts, which gave Judge Young an aggregate majority of 882 votes, the laws of Kentucky were not complied with because some of the election officers had been engaged in or had adhered to the rebellion.

In the first place, sir, there is no proof that any of the officers at seven of the precincts named had ever in any way adhered to or even sympathized with the rebellion.

It is simply proved that certain persons were engaged in the rebellion of the same name as those whom the poll-books show to have acted as officers of the election, but they are not identified as the same persons. For example, the proof shows that in Belhel precinct, Bath county, one of the ten precincts named, there is a certain R. M. Sharp who had been engaged in the rebellion, and the poll-books of that precinct show that a man named R. M. Sharp acted as sheriff of the election; but there may have been two men of this name in that precinct, for it not unfrequently happens that there are two and sometimes even three men of the same name in one voting precinct; and the proof does not show that R. M. Sharp who officiated at the election is the same R. M. Sharp who had been in the rebellion.

"I submit, therefore, that such proof as this does not establish the fact that any of these election officers had been connected with the rebellion. It is a circumstance which creates a suspicion that such is the case, but it is not such positive proof as would be deemed sufficient to settle any question even in a magistrate's court where not more than a sixpence is involved, much less to settle a question upon which it is claimed the rights of a whole district depend.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the laws of Kentucky which prohibits this class of persons from acting as officers of elections. The statutes of Kentucky, upon which the committee place such a construction, are as follows:

"An act to amend section one, article three, chapter thirty-two, title 'Elections,' of the Revised Statutes.

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That hereafter, so long as there are two distinct political parties in this Commonwealth, the sheriff, judges, and clerk of election, in all cases of elections by the people under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and under the constitution and laws of Kentucky, shall be so selected and appointed as that one of the judges at each place of voting shall be of one political party, and the other judge of the other or opposing political party; and that a like difference shall exist at each place of voting between the sheriff and clerk of election: Provided, That there be a sufficient number of the members of each political party resident in the several precincts, as aforesaid, to fill said offices. And this requirement shall be observed by all officers of this Commonwealth who have the power to appoint any of the aforesaid officers of election, under the penalty of a fine of $100 for each omission, to be recovered by presentment of the grand jury."

"MARCH 15, 1862.

"An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend section one, article three, chapter thirty-two, title 'Elections,' of the Revised Statutes,' approved February 11, 1858.

"SECTION 1. That in construing the act approved February 11, 1858, to which this is an amendment, those who have engaged in the rebellion for the overthrow of the Government, or who have in any way aided, counseled, or advised the separation of Kentucky from the Federal Union by force of arms, or adhered to those engaged in the effort to separate her from the Federal Union by force of arms, shall not be deemed one of the political parties in this Commonwealth within the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment.

"SEC. 2. This act to take effect from and after its passage."

It will be observed that the law does not apply to rebels as individuals but simply declares that they shall not as a class be considered one of the political parties of the State from which a part of the election officers shall be selected. It is not declared that this class of persons shall never act as officers of elections, provided they belong to one of the recognized political parties. The requirement is that the officers of elections shall be selected from a party which is recognized as one of the political parties in the State. And no matter what a man's past opinions or associations may have been, if he belongs at the time of his appointment to one of the recognized political parties of the State he is qualified to act within the meaning of these laws. It must, therefore, in view of all these things, be admitted by every candid mind that there has been no violation of these laws in the ten precincts named.

But suppose there had been such a violation of the law as is complained of by the committee, there would then be no good ground for rejecting the vote of these ten precincts. These laws are merely directory in their character, and do not provide that a failure to comply with their requirements shall invalidate an election. A penalty is imposed upon the appointing officer who fails to comply with the requirements, and is the only consequence which the law itself provides shall result from such failure. This House would therefore certainly have no right to set aside the election in these precincts unless it should appear that one of the contending parties had been prejudiced by the failure to comply with these laws.

And finally, admitting that these laws have been disregarded, and that the failure to observe them renders void the election in the precincts named; conceding, for the sake of the argument, all that the committee claim in this regard, and even then I contend that no such result would follow as the election of the contestant. It is admitted that Judge Young has a majority of 706 of the legal votes cast, to say nothing of the 633 votes claimed to be illegal. And if an election has been so irregular and so illegally conducted that the will of the majority cannot be recognized and carried into effect, the only course left would be to have another election, that the majority might have an opportunity to give expression to their choice in the manner prescribed by law.

Nothing could be more unjust than to force upon the majority a Representative whom they have declared they do not desire. Upon this point the honorable chairman of the committee, in his report in the case of Smith vs. Brown during the present session, uses the following language:

"The will of the majority, expressed in conformity with established law, is the very basis on which rest the foundations of our institutions, and any attempt to substitute therefor the will of a minority is an attack upon the fundamental principles of the Government, and if successful will prove their overthrow. The committee shrink from this attack, and therefore they recommend the adoption of the following resolutions."

And yet that gentleman is willing in this case to substitute the will of the minority for that of the majority. He shrinks not now from the perpetration of an act which he then regarded as an attack upon the fundamental principles of the Government. He is understood to have given this report his sanction and approval, though he has not had the hardihood boldly to advocate it in this House.

I am not prepared, sir, to believe that this House will for the gratification of their personal preferences or party feelings undertake thus to deprive the people of this district of the right to choose their own Representative and force upon them a man whom they have not only rejected and repudiated, but whom they to-day execrate and despise. If the majority on this floor should so far forget themselves as to do this, and shall thus violate every sense of justice, renounce their own laws, and repudiate their own public pledges, then the honest masses of the people will, in my opinion as they should do, repudiate them, and at the ballot-box declare them unworthy to sit in an American Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the right of representation by the free and uninterrupted choice of the people is the highest and most sacred right to which the American people are entitled. It is a right which cost our ancestors years of privation, of suffering, and of blood; a right of which they were justly jealous, and which they certainly intended to secure, and doubtless thought they had secured to the people of this country, when they declared in the Constitution of the United States that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States."

"That the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen every second year by the Legislature thereof."

And

"That no State without its own consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Here the right of the people to choose their own Representatives is distinctly declared, and the right of representation by such choice seems to be more securely guarded than any other right guaranteed by the Constitution; for while that instrument may in other respects be amended by a three-fourths majority, no amendment depriving any State of its equal suffrage in the Senate, can be made while the State itself objects. Yet, notwithstanding these declarations, we are asked to refuse admission to a member who, as I have shown, was duly elected; and who, I am now prepared to prove, possesses all the qualifications contained either in the Constitution or any law ever yet passed by Congress.

Sir, I deny the right of this House to refuse admission to a member under such circumstances as these. If it have this right where does it get it? It possesses no original and inherent powers, and can exercise none but the delegated and enumerated powers conferred. It has not even the right to an existence, and could not even sit here to-day but for the fact that the Constitution so provides. If, therefore, it possess this power of exclusion, the authority must be somewhere given, and if so, where, I ask, is the grant? We will doubtless be told that by the Constitution each House is made the judge of the qualifications of its own members, and that therefore it is competent for this House to admit or reject a member, as it may think proper; but, sir, this does not confer the right to determine what the qualifications shall be, but merely the right to judge whether the member possesses the qualifications required. The right to judge of qualifications does not include the right to prescribe new qualifications, but simply the right to judge of those already prescribed. The language of the Constitution is:

"That each House shall be the judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members."

It will be observed that by this clause each House is as much and to as great an extent the judge of the elections and returns as of the qualifications of its members. Therefore, whatever construction is placed upon the right to judge of qualifications must also be placed upon the right to judge of elections and returns; and if being the judge of qualifications confers the right to say what those qualifications shall be, then being the judge of the elections and returns also confers the right to say how the election shall be conducted and what the returns shall be. But who has ever supposed or who will now contend that this House has anything to do with determining the manner in which elections shall be conducted or the mode in which the returns shall be made? On the contrary, the Constitution expressly declares that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof."

Thus showing clearly that all questions relating to the conduct of elections are to be determined not by this House, but by the Legislatures of the respective States. And in judging of the election of a member this House cannot undertake to determine how such election should have been conducted, but simply to judge whether it was held in conformity with the mode prescribed. Neither can it in judging of the qualifications of members undertake to determine what those qualifications shall be, but simply to judge whether the member-elect possesses the qualifications prescribed, for the power to judge is as great in the one case as in the other.

But, again, the Constitution, as I have heretofore shown, distinctly declares that Representatives shall be chosen by the people; but if this House may arbitrarily admit whom it pleases and reject whom it pleases, then the right of choice is not with the people as the Constitution declares, but is here in this House. Now, it will certainly be admitted that there are some questions about which the people have the sole right to choose, and upon which their choice is final, and if so, what are they? Why, sir, the right of choice which is given them by the Constitution clearly implies the right to choose whom they please, subject only to the limitations and qualifications therein contained; and if this House can add one additional qualification why may it not add another? If it may impose one additional limitation why may it not impose any other? Where, sir, is the limit? Where does the jurisdiction of this House cease, and where does the choice of the people begin? If this House can interfere with the choice of the people in one particular, then it can equally interfere in any other; and thus effectually deprive them of any choice in the election of those who are to represent them; for of what value or importance is the right to choose if this House can at its pleasure refuse to admit the member chosen? The necessity for some fixed and definite standard of qualification for members, with which this House cannot interfere, must be apparent to every one; for otherwise, what this House may require might be very different from what would be required by the next, and thus leave the people always in doubt whether they were choosing a member possessed of the required qualifications. Indeed any other rule would transfer the choice of Representatives from the people themselves to these Halls.

Hence the founders of this Government declared in the Constitution what qualifications should be required. And when the Constitution declares that no person shall be a Representative who does not possess certain qualifications the fair inference is that any one who does possess the qualifications named may be a Representative. The maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, must, if ever, apply in this case.

And on this point I am glad to call to my assistance the opinion of a Republican member now on this floor, no less distinguished than the honorable gentleman from Ohio, Judge BINGHAM, who as a member of the Thirty-Fourth Congress presented to the House in behalf of the Committee of Elections a report in the cases of Turney vs. Marshall and Fouke vs. Trumbull, in which he uses the following language:

"By the Constitution the people have a right to choose as Representatives any person having only the qualifications therein named without superadding thereto any additional qualifications whatever."

If the opinion then so forcibly expressed by that gentleman and which, I hope, he is now prepared to stand by and defend, be correct, it follows that this House is bound to admit any person whom the people may elect, provided he have the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution. What, then, are the qualifications required by the Constitution? It says that—

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen."

That Judge Young possesses all the qualifications therein named no one will deny. But, in addition to this, Congress on the 2d day of July, 1862, passed a law prescribing an oath of office which is generally regarded as an additional qualification. Waiving all question as to the constitutionality of this law, which need not be here discussed as my colleague is willing and prepared to comply with its requirements, let us see what this law provides. It is as follows:

tary, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation: I, A. B. do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have never sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office, whatever, under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear (or affirm) that to the best of my knowledge and ability I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter, so help me God; which said oath, so taken and signed, shall be preserved among the files of the court, House of Congress, or Department to which the said office may appertain. And any person who shall falsely take the said oath shall be guilty of perjury, and on conviction, in addition to the penalties now prescribed for that offense, shall be deprived of his office and rendered incapable forever after of holding any office or place under the United States."

It will be observed that this law does not declare that no man shall hold an office under the Government of the United States who has engaged in or aided the rebellion, but simply provides that he shall first take an oath that he has not so aided the rebellion; and when he has taken that oath he has done all that this law requires. But it is claimed that this House has a right to first inquire and judge for themselves whether a member can truthfully and honestly take this oath. Where does this House get the right to institute any such inquiry? The law itself does not provide for any such thing; and it is only by virtue of this law that the right to do so is claimed. A party at law is required to make affidavit to certain facts before he can get an attachment; but when he makes such affidavit, whether true or false, he becomes entitled to his attachment; and so in this case a man is required before entering upon his office to take a certain oath, and upon taking that oath he has, so far as anything in this law is concerned, the right to enter upon the duties of his office.

But we are told that the spirit and intention of this law is to keep out of office those who have aided the rebellion; and this may be so; but if so, the means which it provides for ascertaining this fact is the oath of the officer himself.

The framers of this law evidently supposed that cases might arise in which parties would swear falsely in taking this oath, and they therefore provided a remedy for such cases; but what is that remedy? Not that this House or any other tribunal before which the oath is to be taken should first inquire and determine whether the party can truthfully take it, but that the person who falsely takes it shall be guilty of perjury, and in addition to other penalties imposed for this offense shall, on conviction, be removed from office. If an investigation is first had in every man's case, then the oath of the man himself becomes unnecessary. It will, however, be asked if a man who has engaged in the rebellion falsely and corruptly take this oath, and thus gain admittance to this floor, whether we would be compelled to let him sit here, perjured as he would be, until he could be removed by the slow and tedious process of an indictment and conviction in the courts. I answer no. In such a case it would be the right, as it would be the duty, of this House to expel him as an unworthy and dishonorable member, and I, for one, should not hesitate to vote for the expulsion of any such man.

But, Mr. Speaker, even if this House had the right to institute such an inquiry, there is nothing in Judge Young's past history which prevents him from truthfully and honestly taking this oath, as the proof in this case abundantly shows. It is true that Judge Young had sympathies with the southern people, but the proof shows that he was strictly a State-rights man, and would, no doubt, have followed his State had she united her fortunes with the rebellion; but when Kentucky decided to remain in the Union he felt that it was his duty as a good citizen to stand by her in that position. After the most thorough and searching investigation of his whole course during the war, in which his opponents brought to bear the most infamous and corrupt appliances, there is absolutely nothing proved which shows that he was ever in any way identified or connected with the rebellion. This branch of the case has, however, been so thoroughly discussed by my colleagues that I shall not occupy the time of the House on this point.

I will, however, notice the testimony of one of the witnesses, Greenup Nickell, which contains the strongest evidence presented against Judge Young. He swears, in substance, that in 1863 he was captured by a band of rebels and carried by them to the town of Owingsville; that as they entered the town there was a general rushing out of the citizens to see them, and among the citizens who came out was one whom he heard some one call Judge Young, and who pointed toward a certain house saying, to the rebels, that in that house there was a Yankee soldier, and to "go for him." He does not pretend to be acquainted with Judge Young, or, indeed, ever to have seen him; and does not know whether the man he heard called Judge Young, and who pointed to the house, was the member-elect or not. There is no proof, therefore, that the member-elect is the same man described by Nickell, and such a supposition is directly in conflict with the conduct of Judge Young during the whole of the war, as shown by the proof in this case. His Union neighbors not only acquit him of ever having encouraged rebels to arrest or in any way harass Union men, but also testify that he was always active in using whatever influence he had to protect and assist them; often sacrificing his own comfort, and in many instances his own property, to secure theirs. Besides, it is proved that this man Nickell is a man of notorious bad character; and even if his statement was positive as to Judge Young, I submit that the evidence of such a man should not be permitted to outweigh the oath of Judge Young, whom the proof in this case shows to be a man of spotless integrity, whose character is above reproach.

But, Mr. Speaker, even admitting the truth of this charge, (which I think I have shown has no foundation,) how much worse would Judge Young's case be than that of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STOKES,] who is now a member of the Republican party, and was admitted to his seat without a dissenting voice from that side of the House in the face of the following letter, which he himself acknowledges to have written:

LIBERTY, May 10, 1861.

DEAR SIR: I have just learned from a friend that there is some gross misrepresentation going the rounds in your section in regard to my position in this trying crisis, and for the benefit of yourself and others I write this.

I have been a zealous advocate of the Union up to the time of Lincoln's call for seventy-five thousand troops; that being in violation of law, and for the subjugation of the South. I commend Governor Harris for his course, and for arming the State and resisting Lincoln to the point of the bayonet, and have enrolled my name as a volunteer to resist his usurpation. I have, in Congress and out, opposed coercion and all forced measures, believing that it was better to recognize the independence of the "southern confederacy" than to attempt to coerce them back.

I have always opposed secession, but claim the right of revolution and the right to resist the oppression of the Federal Government, and to throw off their allegiance to the same when that oppression becomes intolerable. That time has now come. I have been, and am now, for standing by the border slave States, for they are to be the great sufferers during the conflict. I am opposed to being tacked on to the southern confederacy at present, (except as a military league.) But when peace is restored, if the two nations cannot live in peace, let all the fifteen slave States elect delegates, meet in convention, frame their constitution, and submit it to the people for their ratification.

The South ought to be a unit during the war, by all means. I had announced myself as a candidate for reelection, but on seeing Lincoln's proclamation for troops abandoned the canvass at once, and I am no candidate. I claim to have done my duty in trying to heal our difficulties and restore peace. That having failed, I shall now march forward in the discharge of my duty in resisting Lincoln, regardless of false charges, or what not, by those who are trying to put me down. Time will tell where we all stand, and who have been faithful.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain, yours truly,

WILLIAM B. STOKES.

Mr. JOHN DUNCAN, McMinnville, Tennessee.

Here we find this gentleman in 1861, when the fires of civil war were being kindled, adding fuel to the flames which afterwards swept over the country, spreading ruin and desolation in their path. When the State of Tennessee was about drifting from her place in the Union we find him in the ranks of secession, shouting for the cause of the rebellion. When the Union men of his own State needed encouragement and assistance, and had the prayers and sympathies of the Union men everywhere, we find him enrolling his name as a volunteer in the ranks of their enemies. Why does he write this letter? He had, he says, been grossly misrepresented; he had been charged with being a Union man, and in order to correct this impression, in order to set himself right before the country; in order that no one might thereafter mistake his position; therefore he writes this letter. He had once been a Union man, but when he saw Lincoln's proclamation calling for troops he was a Union man no longer.

He commends Governor Harris for his preparations to resist Lincoln at the point of the bayonet, and has enrolled his name as a volunteer for that purpose. The gravest charge presented against Judge Young (which, however, he denies, and as to which the proof is not positive and the witness not credible) is that he encouraged a squad of rebel soldiers to arrest a Yankee soldier, saying to them to "go for him." But Colonel STOKES not only encouraged his people to do the same thing, but had enrolled his name as a volunteer to "go for" Yankee soldiers also. How, then, can any man who voted for the admission of Colonel STOKES now vote to exclude Judge Young?

SPEECH OF HON. HORACE MAYNARD, OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 4, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes—

Mr. MAYNARD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Under all forms of government the assessment and collection of taxes is the highest exercise of administrative authority. The law comes to the citizen with imperative tone and exacts from him, whether he will or not, a portion of that which belongs to him, "Stand and deliver, at your peril," like the cry of the highwayman. That is the nature of the transaction; it adheres to the thing itself, no matter what the form of government or who may be the governed.

The revenues of the State are necessary to its existence, and they must be had. The law as it now stands upon the statute-book gives an authority that the Committee of Ways and Means do not by this bill propose to increase. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] last night intimated a doubt whether this authority would ever be very efficiently exercised in a Government like ours. I do not entertain that doubt. The experience of the last six years has demonstrated this, if nothing else: that a free government, a popular government, is the most efficient of all forms of government. We have seen larger armies assembled, we have seen them wielded on the field with greater efficiency, and when the war was over dispersed more quietly to their homes, than was ever before exhibited in the history of nations.

Let the people understand that a certain amount of revenue is to be raised by taxation, let them see that it is equally, fairly, and justly imposed, and honestly collected and appropriated, and you will have the moral sentiment of the country on your side. Every honest man in the nation would be a self-constituted detective to see that the Government is not defrauded of its just receipts.

I have said that the bill now before us does not propose to increase the administrative powers that are conferred on officers concerned in the collection of the revenue. Had I time I could show by a comparison between this bill and the laws now upon the statute-book that in many respects the severity and rigor of former legislation, so far as it affects the tax-payer, are very considerably mitigated.

Let me instance. As the law now stands, when the assessor imposes a burden upon the tax-payer, however illegal and unjust, and the collector goes to enforce it, the tax-payer is without remedy. He is barred utterly and forever from any appeal for relief to the courts of the country. On the other hand this bill provides that in the case of one called upon to pay an internal tax, as in the case of one paying duties on foreign importations, he may pay under protest, and then if he deems proper bring suit to recover back the money which he supposes has been improperly exacted from him.

I might go further in illustration, but at this stage of the debate I will not refer to other portions of the bill which show the same general fact, that so far as it affects the tax-payer, instead of bearing upon him with increased rigor, it very much relieves the severity of the present law. The trouble is not with the power which the law now confers upon the officers of the revenue for the purpose of enforcing the collection of the taxes. The difficulty is that those powers are not accompanied by a proper degree of responsibility. And under any circumstances, and in any condition, power without responsibility is simply despotism. It is this that constitutes the intolerable oppression of oriental tax-gathering. Where there is no responsibility to the people they are liable to be oppressed. Where there is no responsibility to the Government it is sure to be defrauded.

In the present condition of things our taxes are collected by a body of officers, assessors, and collectors who are practically irresponsible both to the Government and to the people. They are removable only by the concurrence of the President and the Senate, a concurrence which, at the present time, is as matter of fact almost impossible. The President charges that the Senate improperly refuses to confirm his appointees. The Senate retorts that he makes no proper appointments for them to confirm. And between the two there is no responsibility. The result is a troop of worthless officials, incompetent, unfaithful, oppressive. Honest tax-payers are over-burdened because the dishonest escape. Fraud perpetrated and connived at pervades the entire revenue service. The rogues hold carnival. Whatever of honesty there is connected with the service, and there is a great deal, is paralyzed, practically helpless.

The same thing is true of the assistant assessors and assistant collectors, and to a still higher degree of that brood of inspectors who are swarming like locusts over the land, making unlawful seizures wherever they may, and exacting that most odious of all collections known by the name of "black mail." The natural consequences have followed, honest industry has been driven from the field and given place to knavery and its harlot crew. The public servants have become debauched, and that ingenuity which, properly directed, would have achieved valuable results, has been largely employed in cheating the Government. I know of no branch of business in which the upright dealer who, in good faith, pays his taxes can successfully compete with a dishonest rival who pays none. He must either give up his business or stoop to villainy. A few will do the one; the many will gradually give way to the other. Officials whose duty it is to see will find it more profitable to be blind. Their pay for being faithful will not compare with the bribes offered for being unfaithful. Corruption is organized, and the revenue is diverted from the Treasury into the pockets of the organization. The legislative halls are approached, and justice itself is sold in open market, thus turning against the Government the moneys so iniquitously plundered.

We have heard a great deal of what has come to be known as the "whisky ring." That is simply a combination of dishonest and irresponsible officials with dishonest and unscrupulous manufacturers and dealers, one part of the combination furnishing the official power, and the other part furnishing the means upon which to operate; a combination that wages war against the industrial interests of the country, and has so far succeeded in driving honest men out of the manufacture of distilled spirits that, six months ago, the Secretary of the Treasury informed a committee of gentlemen who waited upon him that he was not informed whether there was any considerable amount of that business carried on in the country by honest men. Illicit distillation is connived at. False returns are made and accepted. Worthless bonds are given and received for the storage, transportation, and export of spirits. Fraudulent permits are granted and a fraudulent use allowed of such as were fair on the face. Facts are certified which never occurred. Books are kept without any regard to the state of the business they profess to record. False gauging, false inspecting, false warehousing, aid in the work of fraud. Liquors are withdrawn clandestinely and removed from official custody. Casks filled avowedly for exportation are emptied and sent abroad refilled with water, their original contents thrown, without tax, upon the market. Fire has been invoked as an agency to conceal frauds by destroying the means of detection. Perjury has laughed to scorn the safeguards of official oaths. In a word, dishonesty has triumphed over the law and all the honest agents engaged in its execution. The revenues from this source have fallen off until they are little better than nominal. Immense fortunes have been realized; and, if current reports may be relied on, vast sums have been forthcoming to secure results favorable to the interests of this formidable and villainous combination.

What is the consequence? The establishments of the honest distillers throughout the country we hear are closed, and their manufactures lying in bond waiting for a rise in the continually falling market, until it shall reach a point commensurate with the tax and the actual cost of manufacture, the hope of any profit having long since been abandoned. What is true of distilled spirits is true to a very great extent of tobacco, of petroleum, and of various other industrial interests. When an honest manufacturer, seeing himself defeated and thwarted by these combinations all around him, comes here to Washington for relief, he goes directly, and of course, to the White House, to the President, in the first instance. The President, engaged in the reconstruction of the rebel States, a high measure of administration which he regards as paramount to all others, has very little time to hear his complaints, and sends him down to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury, intent on the early resumption of specie payment, refers him to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as we saw from his testimony, read here last night by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. Eldridge], is but a subordinate officer, and he refers him back again to his chief. He has made recommendations time and again, and those recommendations have not been regarded. And so, after the man has for days been passing between the White House and the office of internal revenue, stopping, as he goes, at the Treasury building, he returns home disheartened, unable to find any one responsible for this great machine for collecting the revenue, nobody before whom he can lay his complaint with any prospect of a hearing, or who will give him any hope of relief. That is the state of things at this time. Everywhere is presented a divided responsibility; and a divided responsibility is no responsibility.

Now, the feature of this bill which I propose to discuss comes in here, not for the purpose of giving increased power to the agencies employed in collecting the public revenue, but to fix upon those agencies a degree of responsibility which does not attach to them in the present state of the law; I refer to the provision contained in the first section, which erects the internal revenue collection into a separate and distinct department. This unquestionably we have a right to do, just as several years ago we erected the agricultural affairs of the country into a separate department, and a few years previous created a new department for the management of the Indian, Pension, Patent, and Land Offices. It does not follow that we make it a department of equal dignity with the State Department and the Treasury Department, or either of the other Departments. We make it a separate department. Gentlemen have said that we thereby create a head of Department, and consequently a new Cabinet officer. There is in our form of government, so far as I am aware, no such thing known as a Cabinet officer. The Cabinet is a body of such heads of Departments as the President chooses to invite into his political councils for the purpose of consultation on affairs connected with his administration. I believe it was not until Mr. McLean was Postmaster General, and during General Jackson's administration, that the head of the Post Office Department was invited to a seat in the Cabinet. Up to this time it had not been a political office. Some gentleman, perhaps, can correct me, if I misstate when it was that the Attorney General first took his seat at the council table of the President. If my memory serves it was at the same date, and Mr. Berrien, the incumbent. The head of the Department of Agriculture has never yet been asked to that board, so far as I am aware. The head of the Department of Internal Revenue may or may not be invited to take a seat as a Cabinet officer, just as the President may or may not think proper. That is no part of the purpose of this bill, and does not belong to it.

At this point, I may remark that some criticism has been made upon the present head of what is now a bureau of the Treasury Department, the office of internal revenue. I do not propose to defend that officer or to attack him. We have had since the internal revenue system was inaugurated four commissioners. The first was a gentleman who is an honored member of our own body at this time; the second was a citizen of Pennsylvania; the third served but a brief term; the fourth and the longest continued in office is the present incumbent. I believe it is conceded on all hands—at least I have never heard it controverted—that the Commissioner is an honest man. That is certainly something; it is a great deal. By his long connection with this department, from nearly the very first, he has come to be better informed respecting it than any other person with whom I am acquainted—probably better than anybody in the country. In reorganizing this department it was deemed by the Commissioner important that we should have the benefit of his experience, his acquaintance with the working of the department, and especially his acquaintance with the subordinates in that department, so that he might select those who were honest and efficient and reject those who were dishonest and inefficient. Consequently it is contemplated and so provided that he shall continue in his present place under the existing law until the new bill is perfected and passed and until it is vitalized by the appointment and qualification of a head, practically until he has a successor.

If in the opinion of the President and the Senate he shall not prove adequate to the exigencies of the department after it is organized and gets to work, it will not be difficult to substitute another in his place.

It is objected that his authority to appoint the various subordinates gives him an undue patronage. How much higher will be his authority or greater his patronage than is now exercised by the collector of the single port of New York? How will it compare, pray, with that enjoyed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Postmaster General? Why, sir, his authority is nothing compared with that of the military commander of a large department during the war. The collection of the internal revenue, as I have said, requires a high degree of executive authority; and it must be exercised in such a way as to throw the responsibility directly on some one. Let this officer be held responsible for the manner in which this department is carried on; then every unfaithful or dishonest official being subject to removal by him, if he does not make the removal he is held responsible by the President; he is held responsible by public sentiment; and especially is he held responsible by the political party to which he may happen to belong; because there is nothing which would so quickly bring reproach and obloquy upon any political organization as dishonesty and infidelity in the collection and disbursement of the public revenues.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another reason why the patronage connected with this department should be taken away from the Chief Executive of the United States. Under our system of government the executive power is a very great one, guarded, hemmed in, restricted at various points, but still a power which, for the last forty years, has been continually and rapidly on the increase. As between the executive and the legislative department of the Government the power of the executive department has been constantly increasing, while that of the legislative has been as constantly decreasing in its influence upon public affairs. I will not stop to inquire the reason of this; I merely assert the historical fact. The last Administration, that of Mr. Lincoln, charged with the carrying on of an immense war, had no tendency to diminish the exercise of executive authority. The present Administration, under the charge of an officer having a most exaggerated estimate of the executive authority, was unfortunately brought at a very early period into direct and immediate conflict with the legislative department. That conflict went on until it was manifest that one or the other must take precedence or consent to fall into the rear. This House thought there was no alternative but to surrender the constitutional authority which it conceived belonged to itself, or to resort to the only constitutional remedy left, that of impeachment. Accordingly impeachment was raised and carried to the bar of the Senate. Though sustained by a majority of thirty-five votes to nineteen, it still lacked one vote of the two thirds necessary to a technical conviction; but it is not to be inferred that impeachment was a failure; that it accomplished nothing. While it did not effect the removal of the accused from office, it procured a declaration from both Houses of Congress that the legislative authority of this Government is paramount; that they who make the law exercise a higher function than he who executes the law. One thing, at least, has been established, that it is possible for this House to bring a President to trial; possible for the Senate to try him, and the power to acquit implies the power also to convict. On this subject spoke William Pinkney a half century ago:

"Of this, however, I feel assured, that if it should ever happen that the President is found to deserve the punishment which impeachment seeks to inflict, and this body should accuse him in a constitutional way, he will not easily escape. But be that as it may, I ask if it is nothing that you have power to arraign him as a culprit? Is it nothing that you can bring him to the bar, expose his misconduct to the world, and bring down the indignation of the public upon him and those who dare to acquit him?" (Speech in the House of Representatives upon the bill to carry into effect the British convention of 1815.)—Wheaton's Pinkney, 537.

Let all whom it may concern read and take note.

The same constitutional necessity which compelled a resort to impeachment had compelled much previous legislation, looking to the limitation of executive power within the bounds prescribed by the Constitution. Many prerogatives which rested on no better support than a very questionable precedent, some quite exceptional use of executive authority, have been laid under the stern interdict of positive law.

This bill has been prepared with the same intent and for like purpose, to curtail the executive power. It sedulously takes from the President all control over the internal revenue of the country save the nomination of the responsible head of that Department. To any one not intoxicated with the prospect of himself wielding this extraordinary patronage, through the President of his own choice, such a reform could not but be more desirable, as well as more feasible, than the limitation of the presidential office to a single term by constitutional amendment. Thus political reasons combine with financial reasons to segregate the internal revenues from the other departments of administration, and to make their assessment and collection as independent as possible of of extra-official influences, and directly responsible to an enlightened public judgment.

SPEECH OF HON. S. SHELLABARGER, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 1, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1095) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867—

Mr. SHELLABARGER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I think that it is not often that we are called upon to vote upon a question that is surrounded by more embarrassing circumstances than is this one now before us, not on account of the intrinsic merits of the treaty which we are considering, but on account of that which has occurred in regard to it. I admit that a few days ago my mind was not fully made up as to what was my duty in this case.

There is on the one side of the question these considerations: first, that one which has been just appealed to by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] in his eloquent remarks; that is, that we are a land-stealing people by nature, and that our propensities and our manifest destiny are to steal land, until our "abutments," as the gentleman says, shall be the one on the Atlantic and the Pacific and also upon the Arctic and on the tropic seas. I know how that argument appeals to our Fourth of July natures; I know how that is calculated to carry us off in that direction, and how I am and everybody else is disposed to fall into that kind of thing. That is one thing we have to encounter in dealing with this matter. Our propensities as Saxons, our vanity as Americans, our pride as a great and progressing nation, our love of dominion, our lust of power, our self-glorification, our notions of what a great thing in diameter our country ought to be, and, above all, our ideas that it is as unpatriotic and out of fashion to hold that our future glory is not to be found in owning all the continents and the islands between, all impel us to take this land.

Another consideration is this: that we deal with Russia; and that man must be exceedingly deaf to the ordinary impulses of gratitude and of magnanimity who does not feel that in our dealing with Russia our conduct ought not only to be fair, but to be magnanimous. In what is usually set down as the most despotic Government in the world, in that Government has been found always a friend and an ally, and at no time in our history was that alliance more cordial or the support more stupendous which the very fact gave to us that Russia was our friend than it was during our late war. I say at no time in our history was the value of that friendship so appreciated and so inestimable as during our late struggle. And as I would not in dealing with any nation, so I would not especially in dealing with Russia, do aught that could be construed by the very utmost stretch of construction or of imagination into an unfriendly act toward her. I approach the matter of voting upon this treaty under the enormous pressure which that feeling brings upon my mind, that it might be deemed unfriendly on our part toward Russia should we not ratify, so far as our action is needed for the ratification, this treaty with this friendly Power.

Now, those two considerations impel me to vote for this treaty. But they are about the only two considerations which do impel me to do so, I admit. I do not refer to the value or the valuelessness of this territory. But what belongs to the other side of this question? Let me remind gentlemen here of what they may remember without being reminded of it; let me, by way of stimulating our memories, remind gentlemen that we now stand upon the threshold of a new event in the history of our Republic. In the ratification or approval by appropriation of this treaty we are about to inaugurate a policy which is absolutely without precedent in the history of the Republic. The eloquent chairman of the committee appealed to our pride and our ideas of future magnificence by alluding to the acquisitions of territory which we have heretofore made. But did the chairman remember, does my country remember, that this is the first example in the history of the Republic where we have sought to acquire a foreign territory not contiguous to our own Republic—the first instance in which we enter upon the policy of those other nations in the far past that went down under that policy of foreign acquisitions. To day, gentlemen, we stand here debating, and are about to decide whether it is wise for this Republic, stretching as it does from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and almost almighty in its natural resources and in all its elements of power, to step now for the first time upon the policy of acquiring possessions across the world far remote, and of creating a system of foreign colonies. Four hundred miles, or about that, separate us from this country that we propose to buy. For one, and of course I speak only for myself, I pause, I hesitate, I start back; nay, I have decided to refuse to be a party to the beginning of this policy. Mr. Speaker, I fear this system of foreign colonial possessions upon which we here enter will be against us. That it will be I venture to put the prediction down.

Upon this momentous matter the great republic of the past speaks to the great Republic of this age in sad but most significant language. I only state what the axioms of history teach me when I say that the Governments of the world which are strong and which endure are those which are compact—compact in their territory, compact in the genius of their institutions, compact in their language, compact in their laws, and compact in their love of country. Somebody said rather facetiously that the country was so large already that he could only love half of it at a time. There was philosophy at the basis of that remark. That country which is compact is strong. I will not, therefore, be a party to the beginning of a policy by which we propose to acquire territories away off, a policy which, it was said on yesterday by the chairman, [Mr. BANKS,] is to soon bring us the Sandwich islands, and ultimately all other countries we may deem we want.

But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding what has occurred in regard to this treaty, I want to show that we approach the vote upon this treaty under exactly the same responsibilities under which every Senator acted when he agreed to ratify it. I hold that this House is absolutely free in the matter of making appropriations for carrying out a treaty which cannot be executed except by appropriations.

To show that we are I now proceed to notice what under the Constitution are the relations of this House to such treaties as require for their execution, or whose execution affects the constitutional powers of this House.

Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for us as law-makers not to feel, in voting for or against the appropriation for carrying out this inchoate treaty, the great constraint upon our private judgments as to duty which is occasioned by the facts which have transpired touching it. That it has been nominally made and ratified; that formal possession of Alaska by the Executive of our Government has been ordered and taken; that the Russian Government has surrendered possession to us, and that in all these things we deal with a Government so friendly to us as is Russia, are considerations which almost impel us to go through with the treaty, however unfit to be made we may deem it. Mr. Speaker, the unpardonable vice of the action which has occurred in this matter is in the fact that the President, in making this treaty, did not, as was done in the case of Louisiana by Mr. Jefferson, make the treaty, in its express terms, dependent for its binding force upon whether Congress appropriated from our Treasury the millions which it stipulated to pay for this Russian ice. The inexcusable sin of the transaction is in the President's and Senate's assuming that they could draw money from our Treasury "by treaty" in the very teeth of the express words of the Constitution that this shall never be done except "in consequence of appropriations made by law."

I wish now, Mr. Chairman, to devote a few minutes to showing how absolutely self-evident it is that we, notwithstanding what has occurred touching this treaty, have the right, and are under the solemn duty, to vote for or against the appropriation, as we would had the treaty not been yet entered upon, and with sole reference to the question whether, as an appropriation of the people's money, this is one fit to be made.

In entering upon the statement of the views which support this proposition—and I can here attempt nothing beyond the merest statement of them—I shall state the two principles which dispose of the whole matter in the very words of others the most eminent in the knowledge of our constitutional law.

The first I state from Story on the Constitution, (section 1502,) where, in speaking of this treaty power of the President and Senate, he says:

"But though the power is thus general and unrestricted, it is not to be construed so as to destroy the fundamental law of the State. A power given by the Constitution cannot be construed to authorize a destruction of other powers given in the same instrument."

The other I take from the words of Judge McLean, (5 McLean 344,) in speaking of a treaty attempting to appropriate money. "A foreign Government" (in treating with ours) "may be presumed to know that the power of appropriating money belongs to Congress."

Now, let us assume that these two propositions are not the law, and that the President and Senate, as the repositories of the treaty-making power, can complete and make perfect, and perpetually binding, as "the supreme law of the land," any treaty they may choose to make with any nation touching any public affair affecting our relations with foreign Governments and their people, what is the plain and inevitable result to which this would bring us? Plainly it would overthrow the Constitution and the representative character of our Government itself.

Assume that the people and their Representatives, when called upon under other parts of the Constitution than that creating the treaty power, to enact laws executing such treaties as the President and Senate have deemed fit to make, dare not judge whether these laws are fit to be made, or, on the other hand, fatal to the Republic, and you self-evidently not only strike from the Constitution all these parts which confide the making of such laws to the Representatives, but you do worse; you compel the law-makers first to take oaths to support the Constitution and then compel them to overthrow it by forcing them to become the mere clerks or puppets of the President in making every law which may be promised and contracted for by any treaty he may make, however monstrously destructive it may be of all the interests of the people or of the powers of their Representatives. If you, sir, reply that it is not such monstrous, but only proper and constitutional treaties which the President is permitted to make, you give up the whole matter in issue, and I agree with you. But when a treaty is such that it requires for its execution, or in its execution affects the laws which by the Constitution Congress only can make, then in making every such law it is the Congress to which the Constitution intrusts the making of that law, which by the Constitution is compelled to decide whether these parts of the treaty which can only receive their life from enactments of law are proper and constitutional parts of a treaty, and, as such, fit to be carried out by law. Let us now apply to our Constitution the doctrine that Congress is compelled to make laws to execute every treaty, however improper to be made.

By the Constitution Congress alone has power to declare war. But suppose the President and Senate conclude with France a treaty, offensive and defensive, stipulating that whenever France shall be in war with Great Britain, then the United States will also make war on Great Britain, and that supplies for such war shall be voted by Congress! Would such treaty compel us to pass such law and declare such war? By the Constitution Congress alone can grant letters of "marque" and make rules concerning "captures on land and water." Suppose the President and Senate conclude with England a treaty that Congress shall issue in any war with England no letters of marque or reprisal, nor make any rules permitting captures of English commerce, and should stipulate for laws executing these terms of the treaty; would Congress be compelled to enact the law that in all future wars with England there should be neither "reprisals" nor "captures?" By the Constitution Congress alone can assent to a State's making war on a foreign State. Suppose a treaty by the President and Senate stipulates with Mexico that California may engage with Mexico in a war for the joint acquisition of what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr.

BANKS] tells us we must have, the Sandwich Islands, and that Congress shall vote $100,000,000 to aid California in this war! Can the President and Senate, by such treaty, compel us, as part of Congress, to "consent" to such a war and to pass such appropriation? By the Constitution Congress alone has the power to "lay duties" upon the importation of the productions of other nations, and Congress alone can consent to the laying of duties by any State on imports or exports. Suppose the President and Senate make with China a treaty that her productions shall be forever admitted into the United States on a duty of five per cent., and that Congress shall change our tariff laws to conform to this treaty; are we compelled, willing or unwilling, to so change the law? Or suppose the President and Senate agree with France that New York may forever protect her industry by levying upon French goods a duty of one hundred per cent., is Congress compelled by this treaty to "consent" (as it may) to this duty in favor of New York alone?

Congress alone has power to raise and support armies and maintain navies, but even Congress can appropriate money for such support for no longer term than two years. Suppose that the President and Senate by treaty agree with England that we will maintain on our northern frontier, for the preservation of order and during twenty years, an army of fifty thousand men, at an annual expense of $100,000,000, is the Congress thereby compelled to "raise and to support" this army and to "appropriate" these moneys and for this term "longer than two years?" By the Constitution all bills to raise revenue must "originate" in this House, and the only power of the Senate over them is to amend them. Now, suppose the President and Senate conclude a treaty with Russia that, for the purchase of her Asiatic possessions, which the chairman [Mr. BANKS] is already coquetting with, and persuading us to covet because we can go there from our New Russia "in two days in open boats," we will assess upon our people and pay to Russia a revenue of $1,000,000 each year for one hundred years, is this House forced by this act of the President and Senate to "originate" such a revenue bill. By the Constitution Congress only can borrow money on the credit of the United States. But could the President, by treaty, borrow of England the moneys to pay our public debt and compel Congress to pay ten per cent. interest therefor, because the treaty stipulated for ten per cent.? By the Constitution Congress alone can establish uniform rules of naturalization and admit new States into the Union, but could the President, by treaty, purchase all of the dominions of the Hottentots and agree that the Hottentots should, despite our naturalization laws and the exclusive powers of Congress to admit new States, become at once citizens of the United States and a new State of Hottentot, voters "in the Union?" By the Constitution Congress alone can regulate commerce with foreign nations. But could the President and Senate, by treaty, compel Congress to vacate all its power over commerce with foreign nations, and to either admit that commerce to come into our country free, or to be abolished entirely, or to be carried only in foreign ships, or to be subjected, in foreign ports, to ruinous levies; or whatever else the President and Senate might please?

If it be said that the cases I have supposed are extreme, and therefore prove nothing, I reply that they are, in their facts, no more extreme than the one now before the House, in which the President, the first time in our history, has assumed to purchase the territories of a foreign State, territories far separate from our own, to make their wretched inhabitants citizens of the United States, and without the assent of the people or their Representatives, to tax them millions of dollars to pay for these remote and frozen regions! No case, I submit, can, as a usurpation of the rights of this House, be more extreme than that one with which we now deal, where the President assumes first to acquire foreign territory, the power of the whole Government to do which was once denied; by which he assumes to acquire lands far removed from our shores; by which he assumes the powers of Congress over the naturalization of their people; by which he assumes to compel this House to originate bills to raise revenues to pay for these lands, and by which he appropriates by treaty from the Treasury moneys of the people, which can only be done "by law."

I have referred to so many parts of the Constitution to enforce the absurdity of the claim that the President and Senate can, through treaties and by pledging the national faith, compel from Congress whatever laws they may choose to covenant, for touching our foreign affairs, not because so many makes the absurdity more plain than it is made by the one with which we deal to-day, for they do not and could not. But I refer to them all to show where the sanction of this one strange and startling usurpation, if submitted to by this House, will lead us to, and how complete the ruin of the Republic and the overthrow of its Constitution will be, if, by sanctioning this act of wrong against our representative Government, we declare a rule and begin a policy the consequences of which the examples I have appealed to but faintly indicate. I implore you, Representatives of a free people, if this policy must here begin, and this treaty must be executed by us, that you give your act such expression and form as that it cannot be construed into an affirmance of such a rule, and that it will not be the introduction of such policies and ruins as these!

No, Mr. Chairman, no. What I have been contending against is not our law. That simple and universal rule for attaining the sense of every instrument which all the world recognizes and employs, and which requires all the parts of the instrument to be considered in construing each one, furnishes us, instantly, on its application here, the meaning of the Constitution upon the extent and limitations of the President's and Senate's treaty power. That meaning and rule is that, touching our foreign affairs, the President and Senate can make and finally ratify all treaties which, by their terms, do not involve or affect matters over which the other parts of the Constitution have given the control to Congress or to some other part of the Government. But, whenever a treaty does, in any of its parts, stipulate for that, the doing or not doing of which the Constitution has intrusted to the decision of Congress, then that part of the treaty so stipulating is inchoate and not binding upon the Government nor a pledge of its faith until assented to by some action of Congress. And, to adopt here the language of Judge McLean, the Governments who treat with ours are "presumed to know" that such treaties are incomplete until fully approved by Congress.

But, Mr. Chairman, I go on; and to make here the assurance doubly sure that, on this stupendously important question I rightly announce our constitutional law, I appeal to those who made the Constitution and to those to whom, throughout its history, we have looked for its just interpretation.

And, sir, first of all I prefer to bring before this House him who was most illustrious in first giving to the Constitution, in all its parts, those interpretations which more than all other aids beside, have helped to make that great instrument throughout harmonious, just, beneficial, and enduring; I mean Chief Justice Marshall.

In Foster vs. Neilson, (2 Pet. 245,) he says: "Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is consequently to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. But whenever the terms of the stipulation import a contract where either the parties engage to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not to the judicial department, and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court."

Next I cite the father of the Constitution, Mr. Madison. He made a powerful speech in favor of the resolution adopted during Washington's administration, and for which he, along with fifty-six others, voted. (See Annals of Congress of April, 1796, page 782.) The following is the resolution for which Madison and his compeers voted:

"Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution that the President shall have power, by and with the advice of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senate present concur, the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress. And it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

Next I call your attention to the author of the Declaration of Independence, Mr. Jefferson. In his letter to Giles (Jefferson's Works, vol. four, page 125) it will be found that he says:

"I am well pleased with the manner in which your House have testified their sense of the treaty. Randolph seems to have hit the true theory of our Constitution; that when a treaty is made involving matters confided by the Constitution to the three branches of the Legislature conjointly, the Representatives are as free as the President and Senate were, to consider whether the national interest requires or forbids their giving the force and forms of law to the articles over which they have power."

Mr. Randolph declares that—

"Where a treaty is made involving matters confided by the Constitution to Congress, the Representatives are as free as the President or the Senate were to consider whether the national interests requires or forbids their giving the forms and force of law to the articles over which they have this power."

I next beg the attention of the House and country to the declared law of the country as it has stood ever since 1796, expressed in a resolution of this House, and which gives express notice to all the nations which treat with us touching matters depending for their performance upon the action of Congress, in these words:

"That it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

I next beg the attention of the House to the language of Judge Tucker (Commentary on Blackstone, 389) upon this question, where he carefully states the law upon this important matter. He says:

"It may not be improper here to add something on the subject of that part of our Constitution which declares that treaties made by the President and Senate shall be a part of the supreme law of the land. Acts of Congress, made pursuant to the powers delegated in the Constitution, are to be regarded in the same light. What, then, is the effect of a treaty made by the President and Senate, some of the articles of which may contain stipulations on legislative objects, or such as are expressly vested in Congress by the Constitution, until Congress shall make a law carrying them into effect? Is Congress bound to carry such stipulations into effect, whether they approve or disapprove of them? Have they no negative, no discretion upon the matter? The answer seems to be that it is in some respects an inchoate act. It is the law of the land, and binding upon the nation in all its parts, except so far as relates to those stipulations. Its final fate, in case of a refusal on the part of Congress to carry these stipulations into effect, would depend on the will of the other nation. If they were satisfied that the treaty should subsist, although some of the original stipulations should not be fulfilled on our part, the whole, except those stipulations embracing legislative objects, might remain a treaty. But if the other nation chose not to be bound, they would be at liberty to say so, and the treaty would be defeated. A contrary construction would render the power of the President and Senate paramount to that of the whole Congress even upon those subjects upon which every branch of Congress is, by the Constitution, required to deliberate. Let it be supposed, for example, that the President and Senate should stipulate, by treaty, with any foreign nation, that in case of a war between that nation and any other the United States should immediately declare war against that nation, can it be supposed that such a treaty would so far be the law of the land as to take from the House of Representatives their constitutional right to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of such a declaration of war, and to determine and act thereon, according to their own judgment?"

I sum up all the legal propositions which I maintain in regard to the matter now before us in the language of McLean, from which I have already read, and which is as follows:

"A treaty is the supreme law of the land only when the treaty-making power can carry it into effect."

"Treaty which stipulates for the payment of money undertakes to do that which the treaty-making power cannot do; therefore the treaty is not the supreme law of the land."

"To give it effect the action of Congress is necessary. And in this action the Representatives and Senators act on their own judgment and responsibility, and not on the judgment and responsibility of the treaty-making power."

"A foreign Government may be presumed to know the power of appropriating money belongs to Congress."

Mr. Chairman, it is from these considerations that I conclude our national faith has not been, as it could not be, pledged to Russia that we would appropriate these millions. I conclude the votes we may cast upon appropriating these moneys places us in precisely the same condition as Senators with regard to their votes in ratifying the treaty. I understand the chairman of the committee to concede that. I am not permitted to defend myself before my constituents by saying, "The President and the Senate fastened this treaty upon us." They will point me to the provisions of the Constitution, to the authorities of all the eminent men who have spoken upon the subject. They will say, "No; as a member of the House you were as free as were Senators; and in voting to carry out this treaty you voted to impose upon your district $150,000 to be raised by taxation to pay for Alaska ice."

We are, in the sense of the Constitution at least, responsible for this appropriation in the same sense we would be if this bill were brought before us, as in the case of some other territorial acquisitions before the ratification of the treaty. And I am of the opinion, if the question here presented to us were, not only in its legal sense, but also as a matter of fact, whether we should enter upon negotiations for such a treaty as this, it would have few votes on this side of the House. I need not repeat what was so singularly well stated by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] who I was so glad to hear speak as he did as to what is the paramount duty of the hour. I allude to the overwhelming necessity for the most unscrupulous economy. If it were the last thing I had to say in the hearing of my fellow members it would be just to say our people demand of us, and if they cannot have it from us, they will have it from our successors, the most rigid, unscrupulous, unrelenting economy. That is not because our people are not liberal. They are proverbially liberal; nay, lavish; but it has just come to pass, on account of this most stupendous rebellion from which we have just escaped, we are the most indebted, considering our rates of interest, and the most taxed people on the globe; that we are overwhelmed with taxation, and the result of all that can be said on that subject is that the necessity for this economy is imperative.

The only other suggestion I wish to make is in regard to what seems to control the votes of the larger portion of members than any other, and that is what has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] and also by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] that this acquisition will bring to us the intervening British territory, which will be between the upper and nether millstones.

Mr. Chairman, if there is anything that has been recognized as controlling law in the dealings with each other of two great nations it is that whatever art or skill may be tolerated in dispatches and literature of the diplomats of the two nations there must be that directness and that fair play which men in the actions of these nations toward each other denominate by the word "honor." A great nation, proud of its power, its resources, its impending destiny, cannot afford to omit to be proud also of its honor. And, sir, the action of that nation is not honorable which seeks by sinister and covered indirections to attain an unfriendly end as against a nation with which we are on terms of friendship. Now, sir, what is said about this Alaska purchase putting British territory between the upper and nether millstones either means nothing; at all or else it means that by this means and these indirections we mean to constrain Great Britain to surrender these territories to us on terms on which we could not get it did we not have Alaska. The gentleman means by this process of "squeezing" between the upper and lower jaw, as he expressed it, to secure this territory by indirection, or it does not mean anything.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will simply say that I contemplated nothing more than that the large American population south of it and the large American population north of it, with the slight hold that England has on that country, will eventually gravitate into our hands.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will finish the remark I was about to make, and then allude to what the gentleman has said. I say, if the acquisition of British America is to be open, fair, direct, honest, the acquisition cannot be aided by the fact that we own Alaska beyond it. If our colony in Alaska is not to be the base of unfriendly acts against England, then the intervening British land will not, as a purchase, be cheapened to us by the fact that we have made it valuable by having what we are assured must soon be a prosperous and populous State "on ice" beyond these British lands. But if we do not propose to buy of England these lands, but to constrain England by the process of grinding between two millstones, I beg gentlemen to remember first, that we deal with Great Britain, and that Great Britain has not been in the habit of yielding her territories under constraint.

But gentlemen suggest that we are going to get a population there so large that it will invite intervening population. Now, I submit to the common sense of everybody whether there is anything in that. I suspect there will be no population there such as will invite intervening population. That never will be realized, from the inevitable laws of nature that have fixed icebergs there, notwithstanding the letters of the correspondent of the New York Herald and the old prophecies of French reviewers, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] tells us.

But if there were a population there, I beg to know whether it can ever be supposed that a state of things will occur so inviting to the migration of our people beyond forty-nine degrees into that country, as exists now in regard to those British lands that are far nearer to us? Near my own State they come down almost to my own doors. There is a vast country of inviting fertility and cheapness, under British rule, it is true. But still there is a vast country there, fields almost illimitable in extent and almost inexhaustible in fertility, and yet our people do not go there now. Why? Because it is not their country. Will gentlemen get up here and say our people will go to a country intervening between Alaska and the United States, while it remains British country, and yet admit that they will not go into the nearer and more inviting country at the very doors of our densest populations? Surely nothing was ever more utterly visionary than this.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Price.

40TH CONG. ... 2D SESS.

Purchase of Alaska.SPEECH OF HON. HIRAM PRICE,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 1, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1006) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867—

Mr. PRICE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The proposition now under consideration, stripped of all verbiage and removed from all ambiguity, is simply this: whether we, the Representatives of the people, the men whose duty it is especially to levy taxes upon the people, and as specially to see that an honest and economical disbursement is made of the money thus raised, whether we, thus situated and thus charged with important duties, are prepared in the present financial condition of the country to purchase any more territory or any other property not absolutely necessary to the life of the nation. I understand this to be the question with which we are brought face to face by the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the purchase of Alaska.

I listened yesterday attentively and with much pleasure to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, while he labored for an hour and three quarters to convince the House and the country that duty and interest both required us to complete this purchase. It is one of my weaknesses, sir, to bow, if not submissively, yet with great admiration at the feet of eloquence and oratory, and I could not help admiring the ingenuity with which he created his magnificent structure out of almost nothing. It is pleasant and refreshing to the mind, sir, to occasionally leave for a limited period the dry and dusty paths of toil that lead up the hill of difficulty, and in which we are continually meeting with such stubborn things as facts and figures, and to recruit our wasted energies in the green fields and cool shades which are to be found only in the domain of imagination and of fancy.

I think I pay no mean compliment to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs when I say that I found myself insensibly following him from the dead and heated atmosphere of this Hall to the cool shades and invigorating breezes of Vancouver; that with him I witnessed the selection of one of the forest trees of that region, and its transportation to Toulon, where an imperial commission was in session to decide upon the relative value of the timber of different countries for the masts of vessels; with him I saw it prepared and reared aloft as the mainmast of one of the largest vessels; and then in company with other vessels, when the sea was not calm nor the skies clear, but when the storm-king was abroad in his power, I saw these vessels with every inch of canvass that could be safely carried start upon the trial trip. With him I waited for the result and the decision, and with him my heart swelled with pride when the decision was given in favor of the timber grown upon the continent of America. It is true, sir, that my joy was slightly modified, when I remembered that as a rule that kind of timber is not found on fertile plains or in "wooded valleys warm and low," but upon the bleak mountain side, or on some beetling cliff, where for some half a century it has reared its head in defiance of the storms which have swept over and around it, and where a thousand times it has been bent like a bow by the power of the tempest, but each time springing back like a shaft has maintained its perpendicular, gaining by this discipline that strength and elasticity of fiber which are necessary to fit it to occupy the place of a mainmast to carry the sails of commerce and flags of nations.

But, Mr. Chairman, the eloquence of the gentleman from Massachusetts did not allow me to stop here, but carried me with him to Russia, the party who seeks to make the sale to us. I traversed with him the governments of Smolensk and Novgorod and Olonetz. I stood with him on the banks of the Volga and the Minsk and the Dnieper. He showed me how the inhabitants of some of those countries could manufacture canvass and bags and mats and even shoes out of the bark of trees; and I confess that for a moment I forgot that the reason why this material was used for these purposes was because of the barrenness of the soil and the inhospitable character of the climate, but when I awoke from the hallucination into which the witchery of his eloquence had thrown me I found a barren soil and a half civilized people.

But, sir, I was not allowed to remain long there. By a movement as quick and a change as sudden as ever was produced by Aladdin's lamp, we were standing upon the margins of the inlets, bays, and water-courses of Alaska. There the gentleman from Massachusetts pointed out to me the fish with which these waters swarm; no, sir, I beg pardon, not swarm, there is no room for them to swarm, they are piled up fish upon fish, pile upon pile, solid columns of fish, no human arithmetic can compute their numbers. And, sir, such fish, shad, salmon, cod, according to the description a foot and over through the shoulders, with sides and tails to match. As I stood there, Mr. Chairman, listening to the gentleman from Massachusetts, with fish to the right of me, fish to the left of me, fish all in front of me, rolling and tumbling, I had to acknowledge that the picture, as painted, made Alaska a good country for fish.

Well, sir, to sum up in a word the influence which the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts had upon me—and I presume upon others—I will confess that so attractive did he make it appear that almost unconsciously I was on the point of embracing the creations of his splendid fancy; but upon reflection and the exercise of sober second thought, when I come to strip it of the trimming and tinsel in which his imagery had clothed it, I found nothing but a cold, forbidding, ghastly, grinning skeleton, from which I turned with horror and disgust.

From the best information which I have been able to obtain I believe Alaska to be, in the language of an impartial historian, "very mountainous; some of them fifteen to seventeen thousand five hundred feet high, and volcanic, with a climate intensely cold and a sterile soil." But, sir, I do not propose to argue this question on that basis at all. I do not propose to discuss the question whether it is a desirable country or not. I care not, so far as this discussion is concerned and for the purposes of this argument, whether it be a good or a bad country; whether it be a volcanic country, with mountains rising seventeen thousand five hundred feet above the sea, or whether it contains smiling plains rivaling those of Italy. With me these are not the questions to be discussed; but what I propose to discuss is the question as to our right, our power, our obligation to perfect this treaty commenced by other powers of this Government; and a few of the reasons I propose to give are these:

First, sir, we do not want this territory, because as every one knows we have millions of acres of land now, more than we can properly care for or develop. Yes, sir, in the valley of the Mississippi alone there is land enough for an empire, uninhabited, unimproved, and its resources undeveloped because we have not the money to improve the channels and prevent the overflow of the rivers upon the banks of which those lands are situated. In the second place, Mr. Chairman, we have no money with which to make this purchase. I presume I need not inform this House and the country, that as a nation we are in debt, and in debt, too, to such an extent, as to cause considerable anxiety as to how we are to meet our honest obligations. These two facts, sir, it seems to me, ought to settle the question at once and finally, for if an individual who was pecuniarily involved to such an extent that he was compelled to renew his notes from time to time, and beg time from his creditors, should take money which he borrowed at an exorbitant rate of interest to purchase a piece of property which he had no kind of use for, he would be called by all honest and prudent men either a very weak or a very wicked man, and I hold, sir, that the same rule that applies to individuals is equally applicable to nations. We have not one dollar, sir, in the Treasury of the United States to-day that does not belong to our creditors.

Only twenty-four hours ago, on this very floor gentlemen were debating the question as to the practicability and the ability of this Government appropriating a few thousand dollars for the removal of obstructions in the rapids in the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. Gentlemen who are advocating the purchase of Alaska at an expenditure of $7,200,000 in gold, equal to $10,000,000 in currency, doubted only twenty-four hours since whether we had the financial ability to appropriate a few thousand dollars for the removal of obstructions to the navigation of the waters of the Mississippi and Ohio. Now, what kind of a river is the Mississippi? Have gentlemen thought of it who advocate the purchase of Alaska? It is a river reaching from the frozen regions of the North, through every variety of soil and climate until it loses itself in the ocean in the region of eternal summer. It grasps in one hand the land of snow and ice and in the other that of the olive and the palm. Such is the great river that the great Architect of the universe has donated to us free of charge with but one or two small obstructions in it to be removed by the hand of man. And yet we stand here doubting whether we have the financial ability to expend a few thousand dollars for the purpose of giving uninterrupted navigation through two thousand miles, the grandest river on the globe, forming the boundary for twelve States of this Union, each of them large enough for an empire, a river having capacity enough to bear upon its bosom the commerce of many nations. Gentlemen who doubt our ability to do that are to-day ready to vote $10,000,000 to pay for the icebergs of Alaska.

There are from fifty to seventy thousand Indians in Alaska, and from ten to twelve thousand white people of some kind. But, sir, who live on the banks of the Mississippi river, which we with some difficulty voted yesterday to improve so that the agriculturists of that great valley could get their products to the Atlantic sea-board? Who live there? Not fifty thousand Indians, not a few white men of doubtful color, but millions of intelligent, industrious, enterprising, thorough-going, reliable, loyal people, who to-day are making that valley the garden of the world and are prepared to make it the granary of the world. What is the object of improving the navigation of the Mississippi? Why, sir, that these same millions of agriculturists in the Northwest may produce cheap bread and meat for the toiling millions on the Atlantic sea-board. That was the object of that appropriation yesterday, and yet gentlemen know how bitterly, how determinedly it was opposed, and only passed by a very small majority. To-day, on the same floor, under the same circumstances, without a dollar more in the Treasury than there was then, we are prepared coolly to say that we have money enough to pay $10,000,000 in currency for Alaska. Well, sir, I think when gentlemen view these questions from a proper standpoint, they will agree with me that there is but one conclusion to be arrived at in the premises. Let us take care of what we have. Let us cultivate the soil that is already ours, over which the stars and stripes float to-day. Let us reclaim from overflow the lands lying on both sides of the lower Mississippi and remove the rapids from the upper Mississippi, so that the agriculturists and mechanics of that country may have a free market for their produce.

And I will say in this connection, before leaving the subject—and I wish gentlemen would remember this point—that the difference in the cost of transportation of the surplus agricultural products of the upper Mississippi alone in one year, between river navigation and a railroad transportation, will more than pay for all the appropriations that have been asked for in times past, that are asked for to-day, or that will be asked for in all the years of the coming future for the improvement of these rapids.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. PRICE. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman referred to some persons, I do not know to whom, who suppose our means are not sufficient to make these improvements. I would like him to say what his opinion is on that subject.

Mr. PRICE. I think that this nation has ability to improve her channels of commerce and protect her artisans and agriculturists, and develop to the fullest the resources of this God-given and noble country that we have been placed in possession of. It will pay back "some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold."

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire simply to say that I was with the gentleman on that question and differ with him on this.

Mr. PRICE. Then my friend indorses what I have said in reference to the Mississippi, and I am glad to have so good an indorser.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have much more land now, much more territory than we actually need, and much less money than our pressing wants demand, and yet this bill asks us to increase what we do not want at the sacrifice of what is absolutely necessary for the life of the nation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right at that point. I understood him to remark that we had a great deal more territory than we needed. I would like to have him tell us what portion of the territory of this country he would be willing to give away?

Mr. PRICE. No part of Wisconsin; I would not spare an inch of her.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is not quite answering my question. I wish he would tell us what territory we have that we do not need.

Mr. PRICE. With all due deference, sir, to gentlemen who advocate the passage of this bill, I must characterize such legislation as foolish, insane, and wicked, and I earnestly request gentlemen to use a little common sense in this matter, and to remember that "those who buy what they do not want will soon want what they cannot buy."

The $7,200,000 of gold which we pay in the first place is but the "beginning of the end." That is but the first loss; the second is $432,000 per annum interest on the purchase-money, for it must be remembered we borrow the money. The third loss is the expense of a territorial government, amounting to several thousands a year, to which must be added at least $2,000,000 per annum for troops to watch the Indians. Have we not Indians enough on hand now to take care of? or do gentlemen think we had better buy a few more thousand of them, and thus furnish a field for still further cash expenditures, a few more Indian agencies, speculations, &c.?

But we are told by gentlemen who advocate the passage of this bill that there are several reasons why this purchase should be made. One of these reasons is that it is a splendid country, producing the most luxuriant corn and the finest of fur. Now, sir, if this be true it is the only country heard of, since the ark rested upon Ararat, where good corn and fine fur could be raised upon the same acre. I fear, Mr. Chairman, that the gentlemen who thus paint the picture dip the brush in rather too strong colors.

Another and stronger reason which gentlemen give for the passage of this bill and the purchase of Alaska is that a refusal to do so may offend Russia. I trust, sir, I do not underestimate the friendship of Russia. I have not forgotten, and never shall forget, that she alone of all the important Powers of Europe stood by us amid the darkness of the trial hour through which we have just passed. I remember how gladly I hailed the appearance of her vessels of war in our waters when the English and French ports were open to our enemies to furnish their piratical crafts outfits and reinforcements.

I believe the demonstration made by the Russian fleet at that time was intended as a declaration to the English and French nations that if they moved beyond a certain point in their sympathy with the rebels the Russian flag would be twined with ours, and that, yard-arm to yard-arm, the American and Russian men-of-war would go into the contest against all comers.

Nor am I, Mr. Chairman, insensible to the fact that Russia has voluntarily struck the shackles from the limbs of millions of human beings. All these things I remember, and for all these things I honor her. But, sir, for all this I cannot consent to rob our own people. I cannot consent to take the money which is needed for the comfort of the widows and orphans and wounded soldiers of my own land and give it to Russia, noble, generous, and brave as she is.

Nor do I think so meanly of Russia as to suppose that because we refuse to do this she will withdraw her friendship. But, sir, if I know she would, yea more, if I knew that a refusal to vote this $7,200,000 would forfeit the friendship of every nation on earth, I would not vote it until our own brave defenders were paid the last farthing due them. Blood, sir, is thicker than water, therefore the just claims of our own people must be met before we enter into real-estate speculations with Russia or any other nation.

Why, sir, the tables of your committees are loaded to-day with applications for relief from wounded soldiers and widows whose husbands have offered up their lives upon the altar of the country and in defense of the Government which we now enjoy. Many of these, sir, are looking grim want in the face and contending in a hand to hand fight with poverty in its gauntest forms, and yet, sir, every claim is scrutinized with an exactness and a particularity that leave the applicant no hope of relief unless every minutia of the law is complied with to the letter.

All over this land are scattered the children of these brave defenders of the Republic. When these men laid down their lives upon the battle-field they expected the Government they died to save would feed, clothe, and educate their children. But, sir, this duty is being performed not by the Government, but by States, by benevolent societies and by individuals, because to any and all such claims the answer is, the Government is not able. Not able, sir! How does that sound from a Government that is willing to pay $7,200,000 in gold for an iceberg?

Think of it, and tell me where is our consistency, our honesty. Seven million dollars in gold! How many hearts would this lift from the verge of despondency? How many orphans' tears would it wipe away? How many widows' hearts would it make to sing for joy?

If this insane act should be consummated; if this $7,000,000 of treasure should be filched from the suffering and the sorrowing of our own land, to whom it is justly due, and squandered in this worse than useless purchase, we shall have cause to exclaim, "Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon," lest our financiers be treated with contempt and our legislators laughed to scorn.

But the argument most strongly urged, and upon which the friends of this bill rely principally for success, is that the treaty by which Russia agreed to sell Alaska to this Government is in the nature of a contract between two individuals, needing only execution, and that a compliance with the agreement and the execution of the contract is as binding in the one case as in the other. If this statement of the case were correct there would be no room for further argument, and all we would have to do would be to pay the money and make the best of our miserable bargain. But, fortunately for us, this is not the case. No contract binding on our Government to pay money can be made unless the whole people through their Representatives in this House consent and agree to it.

This safeguard to the financial interests of the country has been wisely imbedded in the foundations of the Constitution by the framers thereof, and Russia ought to have known—yes, sir, Russia did know—that the parties with whom she was contracting had no power to execute that contract, and that not one dollar of the people's money could be used for that purpose until the people through their agents in this Hall should consent thereto.

If it had been intended by the framers of the Constitution that the House of Representatives should of necessity make appropriations to carry out the provisions of any treaty, then, sir, the Constitution would have so specified, for it is well known that the manner of raising and spending money is very particularly described in that instrument. If an individual contracts with an irresponsible party he does so at his own risk, and must take the consequences. If the civilized world has yet to learn that no contract for the payment of money is binding upon this Government until agreed to and ratified by the people, through their immediate Representatives, it is about time that lesson was taught. This is a Government of the people, and of the whole people, and the day of our boasted freedom will be about at an end when we surrender the purse-strings to a few individuals, and thus centralize the power in a few men who are responsible to the people only at great distances and at long intervals.

All the people will then have to do will be to meekly bow their necks to the yoke and their backs to the burden, record the edicts of their masters, obey their behests, and from the fruits of their toil fill the coffers of their lords and masters to be squandered as fancy or pleasure may dictate.

The Constitution provides in express terms that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of law. Well, sir, who makes the laws of this nation? Can the President and the Senate make a law? Can the President and his Cabinet make a law? No, sir; none of these, nor all of them combined; but, sir, the Senate and this House can make a law without the aid or consent of the President or any or all of his Cabinet.

The idea or assumption that this bargain attempted to be made with Russia is a treaty, and therefore, as gentlemen say, a part of the supreme law of the land, is preposterous in the extreme. If it is a law, why come to this House and ask for action? If it is a law, they are authorized by the Constitution to take the money without further action. No, sir; it is not a treaty, is not a law, and the very fact of coming here to ask for our favorable action is a clear admission on their part that they know this. An attempt has been made to make a treaty, and the parties have gone as far as they could in that direction, but finding themselves suddenly arrested by the barriers of the Constitution they turn to us; where alone the purchasing power is vested, and request us, seemingly as a matter of course, to breathe the breath of life into their lifeless creation. We say to them, "Gentlemen, it cannot be done; we are nearly out of breath; if we give vitality to your progeny, some of those who have claims upon us for life will die." If they complain of this we must reply by suggesting that they ought to have made some calculations about their motive power before they commenced constructing their machine.

If it be true, Mr. Chairman, that because of this attempted purchase we are under obligations to vote away this $7,200,000 in gold, then by the same rule we may be required to-morrow to vote away seven hundred or seven thousand millions; and if these parties who make this requisition upon us have the authority to bind us by a bargain for Walrusia, they have the same authority to compel us to pay for old Russia and the balance of the world.

The Constitution of the United States very wisely puts the power of voting away money with the men who devise the ways and means of raising it by taxation. The people, through their immediate Representatives, say what shall be done with the money which they have themselves contributed.

The President may hold the sword; but, sir, we hold the purse, and are alone responsible to the people who sent us here for the use to which we put their money. Not our money, sir; not the President's money. No, sir; but the people's money; and when I discover that the people who pay the taxes wish to have their money invested in this way, I will be willing to vote for this $7,000,000 expenditure, but until I do make this discovery, my voice and vote will certainly be against it.

Mr. Chairman, if this that is called a treaty, but which I deny is one, makes it obligatory on us to vote this money, then I ask gentlemen who are advocating this measure what is to prevent the same parties who made this bargain from buying the balance of the world and compelling us to pay for it. If this doctrine be true, the nation is financially at the mercy of the President and Senate, and we, the immediate Representatives of the people, are nothing more than so many clerks, whose duty it is to obey their commands and record their edicts.

For one, sir, I do not subscribe to this doctrine. I believe that now is the time and this is the occasion to say to all parties, at home and abroad, that money wrung from the overburdened tax-payers shall not be paid out on real-estate speculations, nor for any other purpose, unless the Representatives of the people decide that it is for the interest of their constituents and in accordance with their wishes.

Money, sir, not only furnishes the sinews of war, but it is also the life blood of a nation in time of peace, supplying the vital forces of all the industries of civilized life, and contributing to the prosperity and happiness of the people; and the men of any party who wickedly and foolishly squander it, and thus lay unnecessary burdens upon the people, deserve, and must expect, to be hurled from place and power, and their places supplied by more prudent and deserving men.

Let us, sir, not seek to stretch our arms like seas to take in all the shores, but let us rather protect and preserve what we have, develop the agricultural, mineral, and commercial possibilities which we already possess, and thus make this nation the home of hundreds of millions of happy and prosperous people.

And now, sir, one word further: an attempt has been made by the advocates of this bill to compare it with the French indemnity treaty. I undertake to say, sir, that there is no similarity in the two cases; and he who can draw a parallel between them could make his fortune as a contriver of new inventions.

The French indemnity treaty was made to secure payment to our citizens for property which had been destroyed, and for which the French nation was liable. Our citizens had been deprived unjustly and by violence of their property, the property could not be restored to them, and the only thing that could be done was to agree upon the value of it and require payment. This was agreed upon between the two Governments, but the French nation delayed payment until the old Hero of the Hermitage was placed in the seat of power of this nation, when he declared in emphatic language that it should be paid, and it was.

But, sir, we have not destroyed any of the property of Russia or of any of her citizens. Alaska in all its hideous proportions and native cheerlessness, with her icebergs, her volcanoes, her three hundred and sixty days in the year of clouds and storms, her harbors, streams, Indians, and fish, are all there, just where they were and as they were when these negotiations commenced, and Russia is welcome, so far as I am concerned, to remain in peaceable possession of all that region until the last echoes of the tramp of time shall have died away among the hills of eternity.

Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. J. V. L. PRUYN,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 30, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867—

Mr. PRUYN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: On a previous occasion when this subject came up somewhat incidentally before the House I made some remarks in response to what fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] in reference to the treaty with Russia referred to in the bill before us. At that time I submitted extracts from Kent's Commentaries and from those of Judge Story on the Constitution bearing directly upon this question. I do not now propose again to cite those authorities at length, but simply to say that both those distinguished authorities looked upon it as a settled question that it is the duty of the House of Representatives to make appropriations to carry out a treaty which has been honestly and fairly made by the treaty-making power. Nor do I propose to say anything about Alaska, its extent, its character, its productions, its mines, its minerals, and its forests. A full statement on all these subjects was made to the House this morning in the very clear and able remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. BANKS.] Nor is it my intention to deal with the matter of dollars and cents; whether the sum named is too much to pay for the territory acquired by the treaty, and whether the President, the Department of State, and the Senate were misled in this matter. Within certain limits the question is one with which this House has nothing to do. I, for one, do not mean to share any part of that responsibility.

I approved of the treaty when made, and was happy to find that the Senate confirmed it by an almost unanimous vote. But the matter of the consideration to be paid was one for the treaty-making power to deal with and does not belong to us. And I submit that in a great question of territorial acquisition like the present we are not to judge of it by the standard of money only. Considerations of national importance, of safety, of peace, of future influence and power should be fully considered and weighed. But passing this by, not a word has been said in the course of this discussion by any member of the House by which the fairness of the treaty, or the honor and good faith of those who negotiated it, have been in any way questioned. Indeed, I understand it to be admitted on all sides that the treaty in all these points is beyond all cavil. We thus have the simple question presented to us, whether a lawful treaty made in the forms which the Constitution prescribes, and under such circumstances that the good faith and integrity of the parties making it cannot be questioned, shall be disregarded by us, or whether this House will make the requisite appropriation to carry out its stipulations. The treaty calls for an appropriation of $7,200,000. Seven millions was the price originally agreed upon, but a question having arisen in regard to some alleged grants or concessions on the part of the Russian Government the President required that the treaty on that point should be explicit and clear, and that the territory should be ceded without burdens or reservations. This was agreed to by Russia, and the sum of $200,000 was thereupon added to the original sum, making it $7,200,000. The treaty, after it had been confirmed by the Senate, was on the 20th of June, 1867, duly proclaimed by the President to the country, to the end that the same and every part of it should be observed and respected by the United States, and by the citizens thereof, and shortly thereafter Alaska was surrendered to us by the Russian authorities, and from that time has been in our possession and under our control.

The question before us is one of peculiar interest, and merits the most careful attention of the House. I do not agree with the chairman of the committee that we may go into the broad question of public policy in considering the treaty. I understood him in his opening remarks to say that we might look at it with reference to the history and the condition of the country, and might inquire whether it interfered with what may be called its policy in any respect in which it dealt with the affairs or interests of the country.

Now, mere policy is one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow. We must look at the question in a different light. Could the treaty-making power under the Constitution lawfully make the treaty? Their views of policy may lean in one direction, ours in another; but it does not follow therefore that we are right and they wrong, much less that we can overrule their judgment. The Constitution on this subject is broad and at the same time explicit. In speaking of the powers of the President it says:

"He shall have power by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur."

There it stops; there is nothing more of it. The power is as broad as language can make it. What a treaty was, I think was as well understood by the framers of the Constitution as by any men living. We had just passed through our revolutionary struggle during which a number of treaties of great importance had been formed by us with foreign Powers. They had been formed with deliberation and care, and excited great interest as to their terms; and when the Constitution used this language it used it in the broadest and most comprehensive sense.

We find treaties spoken of only once more in the Constitution, in the clause in which it is declared that the Constitution of the United States and the laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

It is claimed that this is somewhat qualified by what follows: "And the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." You may strike out the word "supreme" if you please, and say that the treaty is the law of the land. It amounts to substantially the same thing; or look at in another point of view and consider it, as many do, as indicating that it is to be considered as "supreme" only with reference to State legislation; that is, that the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the laws or constitution of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. It matters not which view you take the fact remains that a treaty is a law—a law made by the President and Senate, and just as much a law under the Constitution as any statute duly passed by the Senate and House of Representatives and approved by the President. The mode of making a treaty has been already pointed out. It is to be made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is a treaty on the part of the United States. The President and the Senate do not make it for themselves individually. It is made for the country, and in the name of the country. The criticism we have heard on this point it seems to me has no good foundation, and it is not to be regarded.

The great difficulty with certain gentlemen who oppose this treaty, or rather who claim that the House of Representatives can look at it in the same manner that Senators look at it when it is submitted to them, seems to be that they suppose that inasmuch as the law-making power has been confided to them for certain purposes that no law can be made for any purpose unless the House is consulted. But the power of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties which are declared to be the supreme law of the land is just as full and ample as the power given to the House of Representatives and the Senate to pass laws which, when approved by the President, or by two thirds of each House, if he vetoes them, shall become effectual.

It is asked: is, then, this treaty-making power an absolute, unlimited power? Gentlemen seem to be very much alarmed on this point; they say if you once recognize this power in the President and Senate you in fact dispense with this House; anything and everything can be done under the treaty-making power. But this is not so; no person looking at this subject carefully can claim that there is any such broad, unlimited, irresponsible power given to the President and the Senate. What the authority is, what the limits are, of the treaty-making power are so clearly defined by the law of nations and by the effect and operation of the Constitution itself, that it is not to be supposed for a moment that it would undertake to depart from those well-established and well-settled principles which regulate and control it, and if these principles were violated the result would simply be that the treaty would be held to be unconstitutional, just the same as if it were an act of Congress or of a State Legislature, in conflict with the fundamental principles of that instrument. We are not to suppose that any one department of the Government will violate its obligations and duties at the expense of the others.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PRUYN. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman to point out what there is in the Constitution of the United States making a treaty superior in binding obligation to a law of Congress?

Mr. PRUYN. I do not claim that there is anything, but that opens quite another field for discussion involving the question of contract, and also what the effect of a treaty may be with regard to past legislation, and the further question, whether a law of Congress can in any way operate upon an existing treaty. These questions I might discuss if time permitted me to do so; but I cannot.

Gentlemen inquire what can this House do? If this treaty-making power is absolute in the President and Senate, we are bound hand and foot, they say, and can simply carry out their decree. This is a great error. Let us look at the matter. In the first place, the House can inquire into the constitutionality of a treaty; whether the treaty-making powers have acted within the limits of their authority under the Constitution in making the treaty which may be in question. This is a broad consideration to begin with. I believe it is no longer questioned that we may acquire territory by treaty. It was so held in the Louisiana case, in the Florida case, in the California case, and in the Gadsden purchase; and it may be looked upon as the settled practice of the Government.

The question of power not coming up in this case I may go on to say that we may look at a treaty in other points of view. Was any fraud or force or undue influence used? Were any misrepresentations made? None of these things are pretended in this case, while any of them if charged might properly be inquired into by this House.

It is only said that in view of the character of the country acquired by the negotiation, and in view, also, of the situation of our Treasury, this treaty was an unwise one. Well, sir, that may be so, and it may not. I admit that our debt is a very large one, and I agree with my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER,] who addressed the committee this evening, that it is not desirable to increase it. And although he admitted that, considering the question involved, $7,000,000 in gold, or $10,000,000 in currency, is not a very great amount, yet I would not engage to pay that or any other sum for what might be considered not worth it if I had the right to pass upon that question.

But I look upon this matter as one of national honor and good faith. The parties designated by our Constitution for the purpose of making treaties, known to the world as such, have made this contract as the representatives of the people of the United States. The people saw fit in forming their Constitution to give to the President and Senate the power to make treaties, and we are bound by their acts. It is our duty to preserve the faith and honor of the nation untarnished, and to pay this amount of money without further delay.

And in doing this we are not the mere instruments to carry out the provisions of a treaty made by the President and Senate, without reference to what those provisions are. We have an undoubted right to look at them in the several respects I have already mentioned; but when they are all unquestioned, as in this case, there should be no hesitation on our part in doing our duty.

Take, by way of illustration, the case of public officers—the President, the judges, the heads of Departments, members of Congress, and others. Certain salaries are attached to their respective offices by statutes heretofore passed and which are the laws of the land. We may refuse to vote the money to pay those salaries; but it would be a refusal grounded merely upon the possession of the arbitrary power which we possess over the Treasury. It would not be a refusal founded in good faith or on valid reasons, but simply upon the fact that we can sit here and refuse to legislate upon any subject within our jurisdiction. And the question is, Will this House place itself in that position before the world as to this treaty? I trust not.

How else, in what other way, could we have acquired this territory? Suppose that Congress had in advance passed a resolution requesting the President to open a negotiation for this purpose; that probably would have defeated the very end and object in view. But after all they could not have fixed the price. Who were the parties to agree upon it? The emperor of Russia, of course, on the one side, and the President and the Senate on the other; and they, with full power to do so, agreed upon the amount in good faith and in perfect integrity on both sides. It remains for Congress to do its duty and to pay the obligation thus incurred without hesitation and without delay.

If, however, we are to look into this matter in the way claimed by some gentlemen; if we are to determine whether the sum named is a fair price or not, whether it is desirable to acquire Alaska by treaty or not, we become to all intents and purposes a part of the treaty-making power, and to just that extent we seek to diminish the constitutional power of the President and the Senate.

For one, as a member of this House, I am glad that the power is lodged with the President and the Senate. I have no feeling of jealousy in regard to it. On the contrary, I am very glad that the responsibility for such matters is placed where it is, and not with this House, except to the limited extent I have already mentioned.

The difficulty about this matter has arisen in a great measure from what occurred in the Congress of 1796 in regard to the legislation necessary under Jay's treaty. In that case Mr. Livingston offered a resolution requesting the President to communicate to the House the correspondence and papers connected with the negotiation. Pending the discussion of the resolution the mover, finding that this request was too broad, added to the resolution a proviso in nearly the usual form, "excepting such of said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed." A very long and very able debate followed, and the resolution was finally passed by a vote of 62 to 37. Many of the minority, as Mr. Madison said, admitted the right, but opposed the exercise of it in that case.

General Washington, for reasons which have been to a very great extent misunderstood, declined to accede to the request of the House, not, I will say briefly, from any unwillingness that the House should have the information, for he stated in his message that he had sent the papers to the Senate at the time the treaty was placed before that body, but from the fact that the discussions of the House showed that the resolution passed their body under the claim by many of the members of a right to the information, which claim of right he questioned, and gave his reasons for doing so. Notwithstanding the objections to the treaty, the resolution to bring in the bill to carry out its provisions was carried by a vote of 51 to 48, and everything necessary in the way of legislation, in order to comply with the treaty, was finally had.

But we must bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that the objections raised to Jay's treaty were not occasioned wholly by the provisions of the treaty itself. The conduct of Great Britain in retaining possession of the military posts on our frontiers notwithstanding the provision of the treaty of 1783 that she should surrender them, and her persistence in making reprisals, had led Congress and President Washington to doubt to some extent the good faith of that Government in making the treaty, so much so that the President withheld the exchange of ratifications for some three months. Besides this the bitterness occasioned by the war, which had only closed a few years before, still remained to some extent in the public mind. All these considerations influenced Congress in the discussion of the treaty to which I have referred.

A debate took place on the President's message, during which Fisher Ames made the great speech which did more, perhaps, to establish his reputation as the first orator of the country than any of his other efforts. I am sorry that I cannot call the attention of the House to it at length; but will presently read one or two extracts from it. The discussion took place on a resolution offered by Mr. Blount, of North Carolina, which was as follows:

"Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution that

HO. OF REPS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Pruyn.

40TH CONG. ... 2D SESS.

"the President shall have power, by and with the advice of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur," the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress. And it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or in expediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, refers to the passage of this resolution as a matter of "regret and astonishment," and speaks of it as a naked abstract claim of right never acted upon; and argues strongly in favor of the binding and conclusive efficacy of treaties made in the manner provided for by the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman whether the act passed at that time for the purpose of carrying the treaty referred to into effect was not in strict accordance in terms with the resolution he has read? I ask whether it did not say it was expedient to carry that treaty into effect.

Mr. PRUYN. If the gentleman intends to refer, as I presume he does, to the act of 1797, I beg to state that it does not contain any special clause of the character referred to. The statute-book is not before me, or I would refer to it. If Congress passed the law, as the gentleman virtually claims they did, on the ground of expediency only, it amounts to nothing, as it may be said that every act of Congress is passed upon the ground that it is expedient. If it went beyond this and contained unconstitutional provisions, it would be a nullity.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I know Chancellor Kent holds that language, but without authority. It is said the assertion of power was a nullity, and that it was disaffirmed by Congress, whereas I say on the other side it was expressly affirmed.

Mr. PRUYN. This question turns on what expediency or in expediency means, and on what grounds legislation is placed. But I must pass on, as my time is limited. Mr. Madison's views were stated in the debate with his usual clearness and as he was an advocate of the authority claimed by the House, I quote from him verbatim. Speaking of the misunderstanding which existed in regard to the position of the House, he says:

"This, however, would well account for the misconception which had taken place in the doctrine maintained by the majority in the late question. It had been understood by the Executive that the House asserted its assent to be necessary to the validity of treaties. This was not the doctrine maintained by them. It was, he believed, fairly laid down in the resolution proposed, which limited the power of the House over treaties to cases where treaties embraced legislative subjects, submitted by the Constitution to the power of the House."

In the case under consideration I insist that the amount to be paid for Alaska was not, to use Mr. Madison's language, "a legislative subject," it was necessarily embraced in the treaty. It had to be settled at that time, and evidently could not remain an open question. It does not therefore come within the rule adopted in 1796, as Mr. Madison understood it, even if all the views then held were to be considered as sound.

Let us see what the views of Mr. Ames were. He said:

"If there be any inconsistency in the case it lies, not in making appropriations for the treaty, but in the resolution itself. [Mr. Blount's.] Let us examine it more nearly. A treaty is a bargain between nations binding in good faith; and what makes a bargain? The assent of the contracting parties. We allow that the treaty power is not in this House; this House has no share in contracting, and is not a party; of consequence, the President and Senate alone may rule a treaty that is binding in good faith. We claim, however, say the gentlemen, the right to judge of the expediency of treaties; that is, the constitutional province of our discretion. Be it so, what follows? Treaties, when adjudged by the public to be inexpedient, fall to the ground, and the public faith is not hurt. This, incredible and extravagant as it may seem, is asserted. The amount of it, in plainer language, is this: the President and Senate are to make national bargains, and this House has nothing to do in making them. But bad bargains do not bind this House, and of inevitable consequence do not bind the nation."

Much has been said about Mr. Gallatin's views. I have before me a statement in regard to this matter by a gentleman who was Mr. Gallatin's intimate friend for many years, and was associated with him in official life, a gentleman well known throughout the country. I refer to Hon. William Beach Lawrence, the distinguished jurist who has edited Wheaton's treatise on international law with such conceded ability and thoroughness.

Mr. Lawrence informs me that Mr. Gallatin, referring to the discussion in 1796, said to him "that it was well understood by his associates that while exposing the defects of the treaty, and rendering the Administration responsible for them before the public, he (Mr. Gallatin) would not consent to any factious course, placing the country in a false position in reference to a foreign Power." We thus see that Mr. Gallatin, notwithstanding his very decided views expressed in the debate, had determined that under no circumstances would he be a party to defeat the treaty, and to place the country before foreign nations in "a false position."

That, I submit, is the view which should now be taken by the opponents of this treaty; and I am glad to find that the gentleman who preceded me [Mr. LOUGHBIDGE] is willing that the necessary amount should be appropriated, and the national honor saved by doing so, provided it be at the same time declared that this House consents to the appropriation under protest as to its rights. I do not consider such a protest necessary or called for. I think that this House cannot by any action on its part, whether by resolution or by incorporating any provision of this kind in a statute, either add to, diminish, or affect the treaty-making power under the Constitution. There it is for whatever it is worth. There it is in all its length and breadth. If it is too comprehensive amend and limit it; but as long as we have said to the world that this power is lodged in a certain quarter and with certain persons, let us, at least, respect our declaration and act up to it.

As further illustrating my position I wish to refer to what General Washington said as to the constitutional provision in his message of 1796, already referred to. I will quote only a single statement, which I deem very interesting, in reference to the powers of the House of Representatives. After adverting to other considerations, he says:

"If other proofs than those and the plain letter of the Constitution itself be necessary to ascertain the point under consideration, they may be found in the journals of the general Convention [which framed the Constitution] which I have deposited in the office of the Department of State. In those journals it will appear that a proposition was made that no treaty should be binding on the United States which was not ratified by a law, and that the proposition was explicitly rejected."

No stronger evidence can be given that it was the clear and decided intention of the framers of the Constitution that the House of Representatives should not in any way constitute a part of the treaty-making power.

There is also another interesting fact stated in Madison's Works, second volume, that pending the discussion of Jay's treaty an amendment to the Constitution was proposed by Virginia, giving to the House of Representatives the right to participate in the treaty-making power. This shows what the view of Virginia was at that time. But the proposition did not receive the vote of any other State.

I find in Lawrence's Wheaton a note on this subject, to which I wish to call the attention of the House. Reference is made to the discussions in 1796 and in 1816, (after the convention with England,) and to those subsequently in regard to the treaty with Mexico:

"The conclusion on all these occasions would seem to have been that as the President and Senate are by the Constitution fully authorized to enter into treaties whenever the aid of Congress is required to carry out its provisions, if the treaty be within the constitutional limits, free from fraud, and not destructive of any of the great rights or interests of the country, then there is a moral obligation to grant the aid required. When a treaty comes before the House of Representatives they are not to proceed in the discussion and examination of it as an act of ordinary legislation. Such a construction would in effect repeal the constitutional provision respecting treaties and nullify the whole power of the Government in its intercourse with foreign nations."

References are made to authorities in support of this proposition, especially the views of Mr. Pinkney in the case of the British convention of 1815.

But the most marked instance in our history bearing upon this subject is that of our course toward France consequent upon the indemnity treaty of 1831, the stipulations of which that Government for some time omitted to fulfill.

The author before referred to (Mr. Lawrence) commenting on this says:

"That the omission of Congress to pass an appropriation act would be no answer to a foreign Government for the non-fulfillment of treaty stipulations, is to be deduced from the ground taken by the United States with France, when the legislative power of the latter State refused to vote the moneys required by the convention of 1831, by which indemnities were provided for spoliation on American commerce. The subject was brought to the notice of Congress by President Jackson in his annual message in December, 1834, with a recommendation that a law should be passed authorizing reprisals upon French property in case provision should not be made for its payment of the debt at the next session of the French Chambers."

Referring to the controversy, Mr. Wheaton said:

"Neither Government has anything to do with the auxiliary legislative measures necessary on the part of the other State to give effect to the treaty. The nation is responsible to the Government of the other nation for its non-execution, whether the failure to fulfill it proceeds from the omission of one or other of the departments of its Government to perform its duty in respect to it."

This treaty was made by the French king; but an appropriation by the Chambers was necessary to carry it out. They hesitated to make it. What course did General Jackson take on the part of our Government? He said, in substance, "We have nothing to do with the French Chambers; we have the guaranty of the French Government by a treaty duly made and the ratifications exchanged that the amount named as an indemnity shall be paid. We have nothing to do with the internal arrangements of the French Government. They agreed to pay the amount named, and we insist upon the payment." And he said to the French Government:

"Unless provision is made at the next session of the Chambers to pay the money, we will make reprisals on your commerce."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman whether that case did not rest upon a preëxisting right asserted on the part of this Government?

Mr. HIGBY. Did France admit our right?

Mr. PRUYN. France made a treaty admitting our claims. The treaty was made under all the forms of law, and France agreed to pay a fixed sum within a certain time just as we have agreed to pay Russia for the territory of Alaska.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. It was to pay a debt she owed previously.

Mr. PRUYN. To pay claims of our citizens for spoliation on our commerce, the highest form of indebtedness. After the treaty had been duly ratified, the French Chambers, whose duty it was to make the appropriation, omitted to perform that duty; and this House is now urged to imitate their example in the case before us. The cases are perfectly analogous. General Jackson said to France what Russia may say to our Government if we follow the course of the French Chambers: "We have nothing to do with your internal arrangements; we ask you to pay what you have agreed to pay, and if you decline to do so after

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Banks.

HO. OF REPS.

the next session of your Congress has ended, we will make reprisals on your commerce."

Mr. FERRISS. Allow me to point out the distinction between the two cases: in the case of France the sovereign power made the treaty, and when the sovereign power did so it was obligatory upon the people. France had no written constitution. The powers here are divided; and the treaty-making power usurps our power when it promises to pay money.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman is mistaken. The treaty was made with Louis Philippe, and the power of the king was limited. He could make a treaty, but under the constitution then existing he could not appropriate money without the consent of the Chambers.

Mr. FERRISS. Does the gentleman say that France had a written constitution?

Mr. PRUYN. Yes, a constitutional charter, which Louis Philippe took an oath to support.

Mr. HIGBY. What was the legislative power?

Mr. PRUYN. The legislative power was well defined and well understood. I cannot now undertake to state it in detail. No matter, however, as to this. It is sufficient to know that the necessity of an appropriation by the Chambers before the king could touch a dollar to pay any debt was conceded; just as we claim that the President or the Secretary of the Treasury would have no power to pay Russia out of the public Treasury without the consent of Congress.

One other reference and I will leave the subject. I make it for the purpose of showing the uniformity of opinion of all commentators on the public laws of this country in regard to this question.

I have heretofore referred to Kent, to Story, and to Wheaton. I now refer to General Halleck's work on international law. He states that this question came up at the different times I have mentioned, in 1794, 1816, 1842, 1848, 1853, and 1854. He then says:

"In each and every one of these cases appropriations were made for carrying into effect treaties duly entered into by the President and the Senate. If, when a treaty, duly entered into by the President, and ratified by the Senate, comes before the House of Representatives, that body were to proceed to discussion and to examine it as an act of ordinary legislation, and at its pleasure grant or refuse the requisite appropriation for carrying it into effect, it would virtually annul the present constitutional provisions with respect to treaties, and make that body a branch of the treaty-making power."

And then he goes on to take the same view I have already presented as to the effect of the omission of Congress to pass the necessary acts to carry a treaty into effect, and says that that would be no answer to a foreign Government for not following our treaty engagements.

An interesting question bearing on this point arose in the case of the State of Maine. At the time of the settlement of the northwestern boundary it became necessary for the United States Government to cede a portion of the State of Maine to Great Britain. The United States obtained in advance the assent of Maine and Massachusetts, the latter at that time having an interest in the territory about to be ceded. In the treaty between the two Powers, the United States undertook to pay a certain amount to Maine and Massachusetts; but the English negotiator said it must be distinctly understood that the Government of Great Britain in no way acknowledged any relationships with Maine and Massachusetts, or any liability to them; that Great Britain treated with the United States only; and that the United States must fulfill all obligations to Maine and Massachusetts.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question just here?

Mr. PRUYN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I wish to inquire whether in the correspondence of the British minister, on the occasion to which he refers, it was not distinctly asserted on the part of the Government of the United States, that there was no power and no authority in the treaty-making power under the Constitution of the United States to cede away any portion of the territory claimed by the State of Maine?

Mr. PRUYN. I cannot say how that was. The facts were as stated, and the course taken by the General Government admitted the rights of Maine and Massachusetts, which is a sufficient answer to the question propounded. They, however, made no difference as to Great Britain. We undertook to make the transfer, and were responsible to that Power for our engagements. On this point I submit the following views from Lawrence's notes to Wheaton. He remarks:

"There is an apparent departure from the principle that all negotiations with foreign Powers must be with the General Government, and that foreign Powers are not to interfere in the relations between the United States and individual States, in the provision contained in the fifth article of the treaty of August 9, 1842, that certain payments should be made by the Government of the United States to the States of Maine and Massachusetts. This stipulation, which might be construed to justify foreign interference with our Federal relations, was deemed by Lord Ashburton to call for a disclaimer, on the part of Great Britain, of the assumption of any responsibility for this arrangement, his negotiations having been with the General Government only."

Allusion is made in the views of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which are appended to the majority report, to the knowledge every nation treating with us is supposed to possess of our laws and our Constitution. It is said, in substance, that the accomplished and able representative of Russia in this country, Mr. De Stoeckl, had resided here for more than twenty years, and was thoroughly acquainted with the character of our institutions and with the provisions of the fundamental law of this country; and that the Russian Government were thus fully informed that the amount agreed to be paid must first be appropriated by Congress, and that the treaty itself was necessarily subject to this condition.

I only wish to say that if that accomplished minister communicated to his Government any information on this point, he also informed the Secretary for Foreign Affairs that never in the whole history of this Government, although this subject had been frequently and warmly discussed, had the Congress of the United States forfeited the good faith and honor of the country or failed to comply with its express treaty engagements.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him a question. I wish to know whether he finds among the powers enumerated in the Constitution any authority to purchase land by treaty or otherwise?

Mr. PRUYN. No, sir; no enumerated power; but the power, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania well knows, has been exercised from an early period of our history.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Has it ever been exercised in any other way than as the mere incident to the settlement of differences between nations?

Mr. PRUYN. Yes; it has been repeatedly exercised as an attribute of sovereignty. But the particular circumstances under which it has been exercised cannot determine the question of power.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman give me an instance?

Mr. PRUYN. The Gadsden treaty, among others.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Is such a treaty a treaty strictly speaking, a treaty within the meaning of the publicists?

Mr. PRUYN. Yes; I think it is. It is so in terms. We have regarded it as such, and are concluded on that point.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. How are we concluded?

Mr. PRUYN. By our uniform practice.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. In the case of Louisiana, as the gentleman well knows, it was distinctly admitted by Mr. Jefferson, by whom the treaty was made, that there was no power whatever in the Constitution to authorize the acquisition of territory in that way.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Jefferson had doubts, but yielded them; otherwise the treaty could not have been made.

Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. N. P. BANKS, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 30, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867—

Mr. BANKS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Regard for the business of the House, as well as personal considerations, make me reluctant to trespass upon the time of the committee. Were it not my official duty I would not do it.

The bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, making an appropriation to give effect to the treaty with Russia, is reported from a sense of duty alone, to accomplish what the majority of the committee believe to be an imperative obligation on the part of the House of Representatives. Were it not for this, I can say for myself—and I think I speak for other gentlemen of the committee who assent to the report—the bill would not be presented under present circumstances. It does not commit us to the expediency of the purchase of Russian America as an original question. It does not commit us to indiscriminate acquisition of territory elsewhere or hereafter. Upon that point we are free to act as duty may seem to prompt; but upon this particular question it has seemed to us that it is an absolute duty on the part of this House to provide the means and give effect to this treaty.

We do not deny, as was denied in the early history of this Government, the right of the House to information upon this subject, nor its right to consider a treaty in all its aspects and relations, or to determine its action upon its own discretion and judgment. For myself, I hold the authority to make a treaty conferred by the Constitution upon the President and the Senate of the United States to be a limited power; that the House of Representatives, as a coördinate branch of the Government, has a clear and unquestionable constitutional right to consider the subject of a treaty both before and after it is concluded, or at any time when it shall be the interest of the country so to do, to ascertain for itself whether it be within the scope of the treaty power, whether it be in contravention of the established policy and interests of the Government, or whether it be, on the contrary, destructive, as a treaty may well be, of the principles of the Constitution, the rights of the people, or the fundamental interests of the Government. This I hold to be the privilege of the House of Representatives upon this subject.

But, sir, if a treaty be found, upon just consideration, to be clearly within the power conferred by the Constitution upon the President and Senate, consistent with the established policy and interests of the Government, we hold a treaty so made to be the supreme law of the land, and that it is the duty of each coördinate branch of the Government to give effect to that law by such measures of administration or legislation as may be necessary. Perhaps in saying this I may speak a little too broadly. That is my own view of the question, and it is upon that view of the question that I ask the attention of the House to the subject.

HO. OF REPS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Banks.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

The treaty of 1867 for the purchase of Russian America was suggested by those officious, inquisitive, energetic, enterprising, and powerful men who have made this continent what it is: by men who went from my own section—Massachusetts and Maine—and from the British provinces, when the trumpet sounded for emigration to California, and who, with a still more adventurous spirit than that which sent them to California, were led to the more northern territory, which was then thought to be a bleak and barren wilderness. They looked upon the broad Pacific ocean, the innumerable islands and bays that skirt and cluster upon and crown the northern Pacific, and they saw, from their experience in New England and in the British provinces, what they believed to be the germ of an inappreciable wealth and power for themselves and their country. They applied to the Russian Government for the privilege to share in what they might do to increase the prosperity of that country. The Russian Government refused it. Russia had ceded to the citizens of the United States by the convention of 1824 the right of fishery in those waters near the shore and other privileges connected with it. Russia believed that the privileges of that convention had been abused by American citizens; that the express reservation which she made had been violated; that the violation was inexcusable; that it was in disregard of her rights of sovereignty as well as the stipulations of the convention, and destructive of the interests of her people in that quarter of the world. And when, at the end of ten years, the privileges conferred upon us by the convention of 1824 expired by limitation, she declined to renew them, and thus deprived American citizens of the liberty of fishing in those waters.

Russia had always been liberal and friendly toward this Government. The Administration, perceiving the necessity and importance of this privilege, applied for a renewal of the treaty. But, upon a full discussion of that question and with a statement of her interests which we could not resist, she declined to accord it, and we were thus without any other right than that of pursuing our course upon the Pacific as upon the Indian or the other oceans of the globe. The enterprising citizens to whom I have referred, regarding with an experienced eye the importance of this privilege to our citizens on the Pacific coast, endeavored to persuade the Government to obtain for them the privileges which had been lost. The Russian Government declined as before, but it conceded what was better than the right of the extension of fishery; it conceded to this Government the right of purchase, and the territory to which the fisheries were incident was purchased for $7,200,000.

It has been said that there was secrecy and mystery about this. Sir, there is no secrecy like that which conceals nothing. There was nothing to be covered in this negotiation. We wanted the privilege. She could not give it to us. She offered to sell it to us, and we purchased it. That is all there is about it. The motive, the animus, the conspiracy, existed in the minds of men from the Atlantic coast who, every step of the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific, had made this once bleak, bare, and desolate wilderness to blossom like the rose.

The territory that has been transferred to us by the treaty of 1867 is substantially contiguous territory to the United States. I speak of its contiguity, not as being entirely without interruption, but as contiguous to territory long claimed and unwisely surrendered by us, and as a part of the continent which we could not allow to pass into the hands of any other people on the face of the earth. It is necessary for the defense of this country, for the preservation of its institutions and its power. It cannot in the nature of things remain with perfect certainty, and possibly not for a long time, in the possession of Russia. It is likely to be conceded and transferred to some other Power, and it is indispensable to us that in such an event it should in the nature of things be transferred to the United States. It is five hundred and seventy-four thousand square miles in extent, three hundred and ninety-four thousand miles on land and one hundred and twenty-six thousand on the sea, making in land and water jurisdiction between five and six hundred thousand square miles. It commands a most important portion of this continent which we cannot afford to leave to the control of other nations. The peninsula of Alaska, from the central part, extends into Behring's sea. It is continued by a succession of islands—one hundred or more—which carries the jurisdiction of the United States into Behring's sea within five or six hundred miles of the Asiatic coast, and thus offers to the American people a territorial connection and a political jurisdiction which brings us to such a point that the citizens of this country can pass in an open boat, not being at any one time more than two days at sea, from the American coast on the Pacific to the Asiatic countries on the same ocean.

It is said that this territory is worthless, that we do not want it, that the Government had no right to buy it. These are objections that have been urged at every step in the progress of this country from the day when the forefathers from England landed in Virginia or in Massachusetts up to this hour. Whenever and wherever we have extended our possessions we have encountered these identical objections—the country is worthless, we do not want it—the Government has no right to buy it.

Mr. Burke, in his speech upon American taxation, described well and truthfully, too, in some respects the general idea which the world had of America and the American Colonies at that time. Speaking of their prosperity, he said: I look upon the American Colonies as ancient nations, having acquired by a long series of fortunate events unparalleled prosperity and power by unequaled industry and energy, rather than as outcasts, not so much sent as thrown upon the barren shores of a bleak and desolate wilderness three thousand miles from any connection with the people of civilization. That was his view of America, and that was the view of all the world. If we read the early accounts of the colonists when they abandoned Virginia, or of the colonists of Massachusetts who did not desert their settlements, and what was said by their friends at home, we should learn something of the features of a worthless country. Every member of the House knows perfectly well that touching description given by Goldsmith of the followers of Oglethorpe into Georgia, how when about to leave their "smiling anburn" for the distant and dreary clime, they "returned and wept and still returned to weep" and with what suffering they encountered "the various terrors of that horrid shore" for which they had exchanged

"The breezy coverts of the warbling grove,
That only sheltered thefts of harmless love."

They remember what was said about Louisiana at the time of its purchase; when a Senator from Massachusetts declared that "it would benefit the Atlantic States to shut up the Mississippi river, and he should be glad to see it done." We remember what was said about Texas, that part of the country which from the same disregard of its value had been surrendered by the United States in its negotiations with Spain for the acquisition of Florida; that the country was barren, sterile, a wilderness never wanted by us; that it would cost more than it was worth to keep it. With declarations like these we gave Texas—not to Spain; for before Spain could get possession, Mexico conquered its independence from Spain, and with its liberty acquired the province of Texas.

There had never been, by any nation, a more unnecessary surrender of territory. We recovered it after the lapse of a quarter of a century with an expenditure of treasure and the sacrifice of life that did not terminate with those who fought or fell in the struggle for the reannexation of Texas to the United States.

The acquisition of California brought with it the same reproaches. It was called the end of creation, and it was said nobody would ever go there. I have many times heard the Governor of one of the western Territories speak of a debate upon a memorial he presented to the Senate at the session of 1845 or 1846 for an overland mail across the continent. One of the first Senators of this country said:

"What use, Mr. President, have the American people for the sandy deserts and arid wastes of the vast interior of the continent, or the rocky coast of the Pacific, destitute of harbors and unprofitable to commerce? Nothing whatever! I will not vote one red cent from the Treasury to place the rock-bound shores of the Pacific one inch nearer the Atlantic than it now is."

It was said at a later day in the Senate that the valley of the Columbia river was useless to us, costing more every year for its government than its entire value. "We are going to war," it was said, "for the navigation of an un navigable river."

Upon representations like these we surrendered British Columbia to Great Britain. Mr. John Quincy Adams said in this House that she had no title to it whatever. We acquired it by the treaty of Ghent, then unsettled our title by joint occupation, and finally gave it up altogether upon the pretext now urged in regard to Russian America, that it was worth nothing, costing more than its value every year to govern it.

It is but a few years since the whole world regarded the country between the hundredth meridian of longitude and the Oregon cascade as barren and worthless. It was compared by the officers of the Government in 1863 to the Asiatic deserts. This country is now organized into prosperous States and Territories, and in 1870 will contain more than six hundred thousand people; and one of the States of this region has given us in five years an industrial product of more than fifty million dollars.

The Hudson Bay Company's possessions in British America were constantly described in the House of Commons as "sterile, ice-bound, unfit for the support of human beings." It is now called "the fertile belt," which, through the medium of colonization and a Pacific railway, is to bind together the British American colonies, and preserve to the mother country her waning power on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. During the present month it was declared in the House of Commons that "The British possessions on the Pacific united to the colonies east of the Rocky mountains would make the finest dominion in the world."

New Holland was regarded as worthless for three centuries; first by the Dutch, who discovered it, and then by Spain, who became acquainted with it. When it fell into the hands of Great Britain she made it an empire.

Great Britain has never committed the folly of regarding any country as worthless. She decries a territory to the possession of which she aspires; then makes a claim, obtains joint occupation, and at last acquires a right. It was thus she obtained of us British Columbia. With unnecessary zeal we declared our purpose to fight for its possession when action was unnecessary; and the same leaders who unnecessarily precipitated the controversy upon us were willing to escape its consequences by availing themselves of the traditions of our history, that everything is worthless which we do not possess. The policy of England was wiser. It gave to her the possessions on the Pacific, and in a similar manner out of a trading-post in India she has created an empire of a hundred million people. We have not followed the traditions of the English Government in this regard as we have in many other cases, where its policy has less claim to our respect. A large portion of our people have rejected opportunities offered us, and after the fashion of Spain and some other countries depreciated as worthless everything which was not in our possession, as it is now done in regard to the subject before the House.

But there was one American whose whole career was guided by wisdom in this regard, not given to all his countrymen. That man was John Quincy Adams. Assailed by southern States and defeated by southern men in the political contests of his day and generation for having surrendered these Territories it now stands confessed, to his lasting honor, that no acquisition of territory was proposed that he did not sustain, and no surrender of territory that he did not oppose; and after the lapse of half a century, after he had encountered the storms of a tempestuous political life, after having filled with honor the highest official positions in the gift of his countrymen, he was able in this House, for which he always had a deep affection, and in which he died, as a Representative from Massachusetts, to lift his aged and palsied arm, as one treaty after another came under discussion, all of which had enlarged the boundaries of his country and given it new sources of wealth and power, to exclaim, as he did in one of the memorable sessions of the House, upon the subject of our possessions on the Pacific coast, which occupies us to-day, "It was this hand that wrote this treaty;" "it was this hand that wrote that treaty;"—treaties always identified with the expansion, and never by his consent with the depreciation or the reduction of its possessions or boundaries. There can be no earthly doubt what his counsels would be upon the question before us.

Now, sir, I propose for a few moments to consider what advantages Alaska possesses for the United States. Is it worthless? Do we need it? Has the Government the right to buy it? I have no desire to affect the judgment of the House. I do not care how gentlemen vote. I have no interest in the question. I discuss it because it is my duty. And first, I speak of its geographical, commercial, and political importance. No man who looks upon the political condition of Europe can fail to see that it is quite possible it may be thrown at a day not distant into the vortex of a terrible war. There are to be great changes in the future; and it is certain that Russia will be among the first and the greatest of the Powers of that future, whatever it may be. Whoever is engaged against her will strike for the conquest of this territory on the Pacific which did belong to her, and which will still belong to her if we refuse to execute the treaty for its purchase. This is not mere supposition. In 1790, when Russia declared war against Spain, one of the first enterprises of Spain was to organize a naval expedition in Mexico to take possession of the Russian territory on this continent. The events of the war prevented the success of this enterprise, and left Russia in possession. During the Crimean war, the French and English squadrons in the Chinese sea secretly departed in 1853 for the purpose of taking possession of the Russian possessions in America. The Russian admiral, Putzjelm, illy prepared as he was for their attack, encountered them successfully and they were defeated. The British admiral commanding the French and English squadrons, chagrined by the failure, or from some other cause, at the end of the first day's fight took his own life on board his own ship; and after a feeble and fruitless effort to complete the conquest the squadron withdrew from that quarter of the globe, and left Russia in peaceful occupation of her American possessions.

The British Colonist, published in Vancouver, speaking in view of these events and on this subject, declared in 1853 that the Russian possessions must be English possessions. The Canadians at the same time echoed the same sentiment. Mr. Roebuck said in the House of Commons ten years ago that it was "the destiny of England to establish British colonies in India, Africa, and the whole of North America." And it is at least probable, if not certain, that if in the war in which we were recently engaged there had been a failure of our Government promptly to maintain its power and position, Russian America might in the end have gone to England, Mexico to France, and the Pacific coast would have been divided between them, as events might have allowed their great objects to have been accomplished. Such was the scheme of the French Government as early as 1833 or 1834; and until our triumph at the close of the late rebellion Europe had not surrendered, if she has now, the idea of acquiring the Pacific coast, and thus maintaining its supremacy upon the Pacific as upon the Atlantic oceans.

Here, sir, are events of three quarters of a century, showing the tendency and purposes of the European Governments, unmistakable indications that it is the destiny of this territory to be involved in the great contests of the future, and to be thrown by the chances of war into the possession of some Power or Powers less friendly to us than the Russian Government. When, therefore, the opportunity was offered to us upon reasonable and just terms to acquire this territory, we being the nation to whom in the nature of things it should and must ultimately belong, it was, in my judgment, neither expedient nor right to let the opportunity pass unimproved. However reluctant we might have been to advise it, it does not appear to us that a treaty negotiated under such circumstances and ratified by a full Senate, with only two dissenting votes, and those representing a small and distant part of the country, with somewhat of rival interests, can be held to be such a departure from duty and right as to justify the House in resorting to the extreme measure of attempting to defeat the treaty by refusing to pass measures necessary for its execution.

Now, sir, what is this territory? It begins at the parallel of 54° 40', running north to the seventy-second parallel north latitude. The territory has about the same extent in width. The southern portion, commencing at latitude 54° 40', the northern boundary of British Columbia, is the first feature of importance. It is a strip about three hundred miles in length and thirty miles wide, fronting upon British Columbia, and excluding it to this extent from the ocean. Governor Simpson said in reference to this strip of Russian America which had been leased by the Hudson Bay Company from the Russian Government, that without it the British possessions on the Pacific would be comparatively worthless. It was leased upon that view by the Russian Government out of regard for the English interest on that coast. This reduces the ocean frontage of the English on the Pacific coast to the possession of Vancouver's Island, and a small strip of coast further north, which, however, without Vancouver's Island, would be of comparatively little or no value to them.

In the controversy upon the Oregon question, it was the wish of a portion of our people, regarding it as a possession of small importance, to surrender altogether that Territory; and in the final settlement, to use the language of Mr. Adams, the Government gave up six degrees of latitude to England without any consideration whatever, and with it Vancouver's Island, which was as clearly ours as any territory we ever possessed. We surrendered it to England with the agreement that Vancouver should belong to her, but that the island of San Juan, between Vancouver and the continent, should be a part of the American possessions. The language of the treaty was that the boundary should be the strait which "separates Vancouver from the continent." But since that time England has interpreted the treaty to mean a strait which "separates the continent from Vancouver's Island," thus establishing a boundary which gives her the island of San Juan as well as that of Vancouver.

Thus the British Government extends her claims—and if the philosophy for which gentlemen now contend here is allowed to prevail she is likely to be successful not only in obtaining possession of San Juan, but of adjacent territory, upon the general plea that it is worthless, that we do not want it, that it will cost more to govern it every year than it is worth, and that the Government has no right to maintain possession of worthless territory held by disputed or doubtful titles. We agreed to a joint occupation of this island with England a few years ago, and having accomplished a joint occupation she is likely to get undisputed and permanent possession without any consideration whatever if the philosophy now urged upon us is allowed to prevail.

In 1863 the colonial government of Vancouver's offered a prize for an essay upon the resources of that island, which was awarded to Mr. Charles Forbes, a surgeon of the royal navy of Great Britain, for a most excellent essay. Among other things it is stated in that essay that it was the intention of the British Government to transfer its invalids from the forces in China and India to Vancouver's Island, and to maintain them there on account of its healthful position and great resources. This subject has been often debated in the British House of Commons. In 1858 Mr. Lowe, speaking of transatlantic communications between England and the Pacific coast, which was proposed by Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton when at the head of the colonial offices thirty years ago, and the more recent propositions for the colonization of the Territories east of the Rocky mountains called "the fertile belt," said that "a colony accessible from Canada, which was accessible from England, they might hope to defend. But instead of making the fertile belt a settlement by itself, they had better turn it over to the Americans. A colony English in name only, consisting chiefly of Americans, would be the most fruitful source of differences between the two Governments which could exist." There can be no better description of the present condition of Vancouver's Island and of its ultimate destiny than that given by Mr. Lowe ten years ago of the probable fate of detached settlements in the Red river and Saskatchewan valleys east of the Rocky mountains. So, therefore, connection by railway and by water, both of which have been contemplated are necessary to preserve that coast to Great Britain. And, sir, within this month—it is June yet, I believe—on the 9th of June there occurred in the House of Commons an elaborate discussion of this subject. Lord Milton, who has, perhaps, written the best work on the British colonial policy on this continent, declared that "the time had arrived when it was necessary for the English Government to consider whether it wished to keep the Pacific colonies in their present state of loyalty; and that if anything was to be done to establish a through communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific they must look to the Pacific colonies rather than to the Atlantic; for the British Pacific colonies," he said, "derived even their food from the United States. There was every year a great influx of Americans into the colonies, and there was a growing desire on the part of the colonists to join the United States."

That is the view of Lord Milton, who is said to understand the position of the British colonies better than any other Englishman, and perhaps better than any American. And this is while Alaska is in the possession and under the control of the Russian Government, the Russian American Fur Company and the Hudson Bay Company, and before it has gained any strength from its transfer to the American Government. It is the opinion of this very able statesman that, in view of the present condition of things and to prevent the transfer of the British Pacific colonies by the silent operations of the private and personal interests of the colonists themselves, it is necessary for the British Government to establish a railway connection across the continent to preserve them. The admission is most significant. Napoleon at the siege of Toulon, pointed out the place to the members of the constituent assembly, and he said to them "there is Toulon." When we speak of Alaska in view of such declarations in the House of Commons as those I have quoted from Mr. Lowe in 1858, and Lord Milton in 1868, in regard to the loyalty of the British colonies on the Pacific, we may very well point the House to the territory between the forty-ninth and fifty-fourth parallels north, and say "there is Alaska!" And that, too, upon their own admission without in any way infringing upon the rights of Englishmen or the English Government. The silent and irresistible influence of the American people will control the Pacific coast from the southern limit of California to Point Barrow on the Arctic ocean. This is the effect upon the British colonies of a contiguous southern American position according to the statements of the best informed English statesmen, when the British and Russian territories are in joint occupation of Russian and English fur companies, and Americans are excluded altogether from the land and the seas adjacent thereto, and the commerce, trade, and fisheries which give them value. What will that influence be when the occupation is north as well as south of the British possessions; when the Americans are in absolute possession of the commerce, trade, and fisheries which give value to the land and seas of the north Pacific, and the English and Russians excluded therefrom altogether; and what right has Great Britain, or any other European Government, to maintain colonies on this continent by the mere influence and force of European Powers? Of the maintenance of colonies that sustain themselves, that add to the revenues of the mother country, increasing its trade, strengthening its power, and forming in themselves an intermediate connection between us and European Governments by which the prosperity of both is improved and the chances of permanent peace between us made more positive and certain, such colonies may well claim our respect and recognition. But a colony thrust in upon us on the Pacific by an arrangement unjust to this country, affecting its society and never satisfactory to its people, and which cannot long exist, a colony which is restrained from coming to us by the active intervention of the parent Government, and is maintained upon considerations of foreign interest waiting for a moment when hostile demonstrations may be within its power, such a colony has not a natural existence, and can claim of us no consideration or support. It is not within the rule of international comity to insist upon maintaining and perpetuating its power by exterior aid where it has no self-supporting capacity which alone give governments a just claim to the respect of the nations of the world.

Well, sir, let me speak now of the advance of our power upon this continent, and what is likely to be its effect. Mr. Chairman, from time to time the law of the world changes. Napoleon said that the art of war should be changed every ten years. Every twenty or thirty years new ideas appear, new principles are announced. The government of the world changes once or twice every century, and the theater of human history is transferred to different parts of the globe in the course of one or two centuries. A change of this character is now dawning upon us. Hitherto the Atlantic ocean has been the theater of its power and its triumphs. It has been the great ocean of the world. Those on one side and those on the other made it whatever they chose. They gave it to law. It was in fact an European sea. The control of the world hitherto has been in European hands, because Europe was the sovereign of this great sea. So long as the Atlantic ocean controls the destinies of men, so long the destiny and the idea of that control will be European, and so long as it is European it will stand in the way of the progress of civilization and bar the movements of the people to the acquisition or the resumption of the power that by the laws of nature belongs to them. How can it be changed? By intervention, by war? No, sir. The providence of God arranges other means for the control of the great families of men than such methods of violence. The changes in the theater of operation point out new fields, new pastures, green and beautiful, to which the children of creation may go. They come from the Atlantic, and they take their position upon what is called the great ocean of the world—the Pacific ocean. That with the Indian ocean, which is part of the Pacific, so spoken of by geographers, covers one hundred million square miles, and rolls between six hundred million people (Asiatics) on one side and about three hundred million (Americans and Europeans) on the other. That ocean will be the theater of the triumphs of civilization in the future. It is on that line that are to be fought the great battles of the hereafter. It is there that the institutions of this world will be fashioned and its destinies decided. If this transfer is successful, it will no longer be an European civilization or an European destiny that controls us. It will be a higher civilization and a nobler destiny. It may be an American civilization, an American destiny of six hundred million souls. Across that great ocean of the future there is not one that is not a friend of this country, nor a Government that is not willing to strike hands with us in any just movement for any just purpose. Russia, China, Japan, India—so far as she is left to herself—even Turkey, the whole of these Powers have been and are and still may be, even to the end, friendly to us. As for ourselves we have nothing to fear from Europe. In this future and in the presence of these Powers Europe loses, as every nation in time loses, her prestige and becomes subordinate to the new Powers in the progress of human civilization and the destiny of nations.

Now, sir, the possession of Alaska is the key of this ocean. It is to the North what the ocean is to the South, the controller of the destiny of nations and the progress of mankind. It brings this continent within seventy or eighty miles of the Asiatic coast on the north. It gives us the control of the Arctic, whatever it may be, and of that Arctic ocean we yet know nothing. This Arctic ocean, too, has a future, it may be a boundless and glorious future, and it is for us. The possession of Alaska makes Behring sea substantially an American sea. It throws out from its peninsula the mysterious chain of Aleutian Islands almost to the Asiatic coast. Our watermen can communicate with an open boat by this strange chain of islands between America and Asia, between the continents of the New and the Old World, and with the aid of the chain of Kurile islands, reach by the same boat China, Japan, or India, never being more than two or three days at sea, rarely or never out of sight of land, and exposed to as slight perils of the sea as mariners can ever expect to encounter. We can thus return, according to Chevalier, the visits which hundreds of years since the Asiatic people made to America by the same chains of Aleutian and Kurile islands, who first settled Alaska, California, Mexico, and Central America, and gave to this continent its first faint impress of the coming civilization, traces of which are still seen on the coast and in the interior, in the language and in the customs of the people, from the Arctic ocean to the Gulf of Mexico. But our visits will be for a different purpose, with nobler results. These people of a former age came to this continent without a distinctive object. They brought nothing with them; they took nothing away. They returned nothing to the distant lands from which they came. In our return visit we take to the other continent civilization, laws, progress, and the ideas of justice between man and man in the government of nations. We take to them, not with the spirit of propagandists or conquerors, but as it was given to us, the revelation of the Scriptures and the Christian idea of government. Before we have time to go they come to us. The flag that floats on the avenue is an indication of the spirit and progress of the future. A tale of the Arabian nights has nothing so marvelous as the recent movement of the Chinese nation. Abandoning, of their own motion, the policy of isolation, placing themselves first in the great movements of modern nations, they come first to us because we are territorially nearest and most ready to receive them. They take as their representative one of our own citizens, perhaps least likely to have been selected in advance for such a mission, who has by great good sense, as well as great good fortune, impressed upon them his spirit, and to whom they have confided their hopes and their power. There is nothing left that is impossible. Hereafter our civilization may be theirs. It is based upon the same idea. The civilization of Europe rests upon education of masters, the ignorance of the masses. The civilization of America of the present age and of the future rests upon universal education and intelligence. In China every person of mature age can read and write. So deep is their veneration for learning that a Chinese will not, it is said, step upon a written or printed paper. Intelligence is at the basis of their Government and the source of their power. It is the foundation upon which they construct their classes of society and their orders in government. And however their institutions of the family or the State may differ from ours, where intelligence is the common bond of union and the representative of the common power, as it is with us and with them, we shall be led gently but surely to the same objects and the same end. And they come to us at the moment when by a strange coincidence we push our territorial jurisdiction toward them. Both were animated by the same spirit and without the knowledge of each other moving to the same end by different means.

Now, through the advent of this spirit and power by the possession of Alaska on the North, with the Aleutian Islands in the center, and amicable arrangements not for possession—because we do not press upon others, and certainly not upon feeble nations to deprive them of their property—but with amicable relations of commerce and trade with the government of the Sandwich Islands, which cannot be long postponed, we have in our grasp the control of the Pacific ocean, and may make this great theater of action for the future whatever we may choose it shall be. But it is indispensable that we shall possess these islands, this intermediate communication between the two continents, this draw-bridge between America and Asia, these stepping-stones across the Pacific ocean. If we give them to another Government, if we subject the Pacific ocean to the control of Europe and European civilization, the power of the future is theirs and not ours, and its progress is after their spirit and idea and not ours. Instead of giving new light and leading to new thought other nations, we lose our own, and are followers rather than guides.

One word, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the military position and influence of this territory upon our own Government; and in this I need not excite the apprehensions of the committee by anticipating new terrors. I have

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Banks.

H. OF REPS.

alluded to the designs of European nations upon the Pacific coast. There was a period within our own day when it was apparently in their possession. Twice the Government of the United States had offered to purchase California of Mexico, and our offers under adverse influences had been rejected. When war with Mexico occurred in 1846, England, France, Russia, and the United States were intent upon its possession, apparently with equal chances of success, except that Russia then held a quasi military position at Bodega, a short distance above San Francisco, with the assumed consent of Mexico. The United States was but a few hours in advance of Great Britain in taking possession of Monterey on the memorable 7th of July, 1846. The English fleets were close upon our flag, and did not conceal the fact that their object was to anticipate our occupation of this coast upon the ground of unsettled claims of British subjects against Mexico. Russia was then supposed by a portion of our people to be inimical, if not hostile to us. But her friendship was manifested by voluntary withdrawal of her colonists and forces from Bodega as soon as we had acquired permanent possession. Let me now ask the attention of gentlemen to a view of the military position of Alaska, as affecting the interests and safety of the United States, given in 1852, in view of these important events, by one whose words are entitled to our respect, the late Hon. Henry Winter Davis, so well known and so much lamented in this House, upon the supposition that Russia was the enemy we had to fear and possibly to encounter:

"From her Asiatic possessions, from the Kurile and the Aleutian Islands, she overlooks the natural and necessary course of our Asiatic trade—now, by the occupation of California, grown to stupendous magnitude, and soon destined to equal that of the Atlantic States. Her naval stations can command effectually the whole intercourse of California and Oregon with the chief seats of Chinese commerce, and render our communications insecure at any moment. She can transfer troops and munitions of war to the coast of Oregon more rapidly than we can from the Atlantic sea-board. She is a military power in direct contact with China; and her influence can stir up the Mongol tribes, and pour them like a hail-storm on the feeble and effeminate Celestials. She can now in a great measure balance the influence of England at Peking; her emissaries speak with almost as much authority there as at Constantinople; and a few years must give her the decided predominance. How that control would bear on our commerce with that empire in the events which have been indicated, it takes no prophet to foretell. We should be excluded from those markets, or subjected to burdens which would strip off the profits, impede the activity, and finally destroy our Chinese trade, or we should be forced to maintain our position against Russian armies, on the spot, across the track of Russian navies, and at an expense and sacrifice which the most lucrative returns would scarcely compensate."

So much for the general idea which is presented by a view of the geographical, political, and military situation of this possession. This territory is not worthless; it is necessary to us; the Government has not only a right, but it is bound by a solemn duty to itself, to the people, at a proper time and by proper means to obtain it if they can do it justly and upon just terms. I pass now to a consideration of the character and resources of the territory itself. I am not bound in this respect to rely exclusively upon the testimony of men. The gentlemen of the minority have done us the honor to speak with some contempt of the representations which have been made to us upon this subject by persons assuming to be acquainted with it because they were extravagant. They are extravagant, but, sir, they came from good men. That which has been presented to the House by the Committee of Foreign Affairs in relation to this territory has come from the best men in this country, representing interests entirely disconnected, both politically and financially with the administration of the Government; such men as the correspondents of the principal public journals of the country. The Boston Journal, the Alta Californian, the New York Herald, the La Crosse Republican, and many others to which reference has been made in the majority report, all of whom have written from personal observation, and apparently with strict regard to truth, most interesting, instructive, and satisfactory accounts of this portion of the continent. I am led from a careful consideration of these reports to place them even above those of a more scientific character, given by the officers of the Coast Survey and the Smithsonian Institution, as more likely to satisfy doubting minds of the truth of their statements. They have given accounts of this territory which would satisfy any man who had passed his life in New England, in the middle or western States. We have given in the report a brief statement of these views, and I regret that I have not now time to repeat them.

I received only a day or two since a letter from Mark Whiteman, a native of Russian Poland, who has been in this country twenty-one years, who served the United States in the survey of New Mexico, who went to California in pursuit of gold, thence to Australia, thence to Fraser's river, and then with his companions from the sources of the Stikine in a direct line north, working his way through the whole of Alaska. He is not thoroughly master of our language. His statements, given in broken English—a mixture of Russian, Polish, and English—are stamped with truth. He does not describe the country through which he has passed like a topographical engineer, but in his simple and imperfect account he shows that he has traveled nearly through the whole of it, and he says that we know nothing of the great importance of these new possessions; that in every direction it is rich in minerals, and that the natives are peaceful, powerful, and friendly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Who is this?

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Mark Whiteman, a citizen of Idaho, now in New York. There are three men with him, and they say they want to tell the United States what sort of a country this is that we have bought. According to his report, and according to the report of the other persons I have mentioned, the country is rich in minerals.

But, as I said, I do not desire to put my statement solely upon human testimony. We are not reduced to that alternative. There are laws of nature, results of national experience running through many centuries, to which we refer for the support of our conclusions. We appeal to them, and we challenge from any quarter a denial of the result to which they lead us. Since the sixteenth century, until a very recent period, it has been the belief of everybody that the precious metals were confined to the tropics. For two hundred years nobody supposed or thought anything else except that gold, silver, diamonds, and other precious metals were confined to the tropical regions alone, and chiefly to South America. Every gentleman about me will be able to verify this fact for himself. It was not till California was acquired and gold discovered that this opinion ceased to have control of the public mind. So potential was it up to the discovery of gold in California that the Government of Mexico, desiring to obtain quicksilver necessary to work her gold and silver mines, and without which they were comparatively worthless, offered prizes for the discovery of quicksilver anywhere within the territory of Mexico: and for fifteen or twenty years, I believe, surveys were made, until every province, and, indeed, every square mile of the territory of the Mexican republic had been explored in vain for this material, so necessary to the development of other mineral resources. But when California came into our possession there was at once discovered the richest mine of quicksilver known to man, so rich that it was said in the Supreme Court, when the title of the mine came to be contested, that with regard to the interests involved it was the heaviest case that had ever been presented to any judicial tribunal. It was going north that it was discovered. The Mexicans had never dreamed of that.

Moving from the tropics northward we found gold in California, even up to the very boundary of British Columbia. It was then discovered still further northward, at the sources of the Stikine, and the miners are still following it further northward. Mr. Taylor, in his report printed by order of the House only a few days ago, says there are thousands of miners in Montana and other Territories waiting for the promulgation of the discoveries now in progress to move northward into the provinces of British America for the purpose of working the rich deposits to be there found. It was this law of nature so recently discovered that led Mark Whiteman and his associates from the sources of the Stikine river, through Alaska, to the Arctic ocean, and that exhibited to them up to the ocean itself its limitless mineral wealth.

It is, then, the law of mineral deposits that they are found from the tropics northward, and that as you go northward the mines become more extensive and more valuable. And thus we follow it up in the same line of mountains from Mexico to California, from California to northern California, from northern California to British Columbia, from British Columbia to Alaska, all through the chain to the Arctic ocean. We receive from Alaska the confirmation of this fact. Exactly the same facts that were reported from South America, Mexico, California, and British Columbia are now reported from Alaska. Why should they be discredited? Every man who has been there, and every man who has seen those who have been there, knows that the evidences of these valuable mineral deposits are to be found in the possession of the natives, who do not know their value or how to work them. It was the same in Peru and throughout all portions of the American continent in all periods of its history.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. To what class of mines does the gentleman refer?

Mr. BANKS. To minerals of every description.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. In Alaska?

Mr. BANKS. In Alaska. He affirms the existence of most valuable mineral deposits of every character. I will refer to this subject again presently. We have from everybody in Alaska—from miners, from correspondents, from sea-faring men, from lumber-men, from explorers, from natives, from Russians connected with the Government there, and from Americans—confirmation of these deposits they found there. It was exactly the same evidences of the existence of these mineral deposits that were seen fifteen or twenty years ago in California, and later still in British Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. If the gentleman has any authority to show that there are precious metals of any kind in Alaska, I beg he will refer me to the document and page where I can find it.

Mr. BANKS. There is no authority which will convince the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN.] If he could lay his hand on the print in the side he would not believe. I am not so unwise as to expect to convince him; but I will convince this House that Alaska contains large deposits of the precious metals, and that upon this consideration alone, if for no other, we should take this territory. I desire to read from the Revue Contemporaine of January, 1868, the statement of M. Roche, a French traveler, who had thoroughly studied this country, and who, fifteen years ago, predicted exactly what we are now seeing enacted, even to the movements of the English Government for its possession. M. Roche, in referring to the gold, silver, and diamonds that have been found in the Siberian regions, says that—

"Russian America possesses mineral wealth that surpasses the value of its furs, fisheries, and forests. The working of these mines would give more life to the country, causing villages and cities to spring up and flourish more prosperously than any in the less hospitable regions of Siberia.

"Comparing the geographical features of the two countries, he believes the American part of the country as rich in minerals as the Asiatic part, and is sure that gold might be found in all the rivers and valleys."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. "Might be found."

Mr. BANKS. I refer also to the statement of Mark Whiteman, who with other miners traveled over that country, visiting the tribes, resting and working with them, speaking the Cherokee, the Polish, the Russian, the English languages, and thus finding some one everywhere to give him some knowledge of the mineral resources of the country, which was the object of his visit. He found the precious metals himself, and brought them away with him; among others, platina in large quantities, the nature and value of which he did not understand until the specimens which he brought home were analyzed in California.

M. Roche also mentions platina, although it has not been mentioned by any of the officers of the Coast Survey, or by any of the correspondents, trappers, or natives, until the letter of Mark Whiteman brought it to light. Roche declared fifteen years ago that platina, lead, silver, diamonds, and other minerals found in Siberia would be discovered in the mountains of Russian America. In fact, he says that jet, kaolin, opal, black lead, gypsum, galena, porphyry, iron, carbonates, amber, sulphur, petroleum, variegated marble, iron ore, &c., have been brought to light. Many beds of bituminous coal have been discovered on the coast and in the Aleutian Islands. The Russian steamers have long taken coal from the mines of Kodiak, which can furnish it for future commerce for many years yet.

In support of this testimony of Roche, we have received within a few days a carefully prepared and elaborate statement of Professor Davidson, whose opinions cannot be discredited, who says that in this territory is to be found the purest and the best coal upon the Pacific coast.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman be kind enough to refer to the page of Professor Davidson's testimony?

Mr. BANKS. I will give the statement hereafter in Professor Davidson's own words. Pure copper is found in large cubic masses. Copper plates, hammered out by the natives, and with hieroglyphics engraved upon them, the history of their tribes and families, have been found. Silver is also found in many places; also quartz, with sulphate of iron and lead. Gold has been reported at Cook's inlet, on the Stikine river.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. "Reported."

Mr. BANKS. Reported by men who have been there. There is no doubt whatever about the existence of large quantities of gold on the Stikine river, and also on other streams washing down from the mountains which extend through the whole of this territory. A correspondent of the La Crosse Republican, writing in excellent spirit, and, I have no doubt, in entire good faith, states the evidences which he saw of the existence of deposits of quicksilver—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. This is a very important question; and I desire, as I have no doubt the House does, that both sides shall be fully heard. I move, therefore, that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] be indefinitely extended. I possibly may ask for myself a similar favor.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be indefinitely extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts resumes his remarks, I desire to ask him to explain what quantity of the land embraced in this purchase is susceptible of cultivation.

Mr. BANKS. I will do so.

Mr. MILLER. I have examined the gentleman's report very carefully, and I do not find anything on this point.

Mr. BANKS. The territory between the forty-fifth and sixtieth parallels of north latitude, west of the Rocky mountains, on the Pacific coast, embraces three hundred thousand square miles of cultivable, arable land, according to the statement of the land commissioner, based upon the authority of Mr. Blodgett, the climatologist, a gentleman of Pennsylvania, whose character is perfectly well known and highly appreciated in this country. There are three hundred thousand square miles of cultivable and arable land between the forty-fifth and sixtieth parallels, the greater portion of which is in Russian America—that part between the forty-fifth and fifty-fourth degrees above Vancouver's Island to the Russian possessions, west of the mountains, being narrow and unimportant—according to Mr. Blodgett's statement. The Commissioner of Public Lands says there are twelve million eight hundred thousand acres—twenty thousand square miles—of land which can be brought into cultivation by actual settlers under the present land system of the United States.

The correspondents of the Alta Californian and Journal say there are twenty thousand square miles of cultivable and arable lands in the vicinity of Cook's inlet, which they call the garden of Alaska. There is more arable land in Alaska, according to the official statement of the Land Office, than there was estimated to be in California when we purchased that country from Mexico.

The testimony of newspaper correspondents and of our own officers and scientific men show that in many portions of this territory herds-grass, of excellent quality, grows wild without care or culture; white and burr clover are found there; cattle are fat, and beef tender and delicate; oats and barley thrive like native grasses; peas grow at Oonalska in latitude 64°; turnips, potatoes, carrots, beets, cabbages, and other root crops are the main support of the people. Winter gooseberries, blackberries, cranberries, raspberries, huckleberries, and thimbleberries are abundant. The rose, poppy, marigold, astrea, and hollyhock grow in perfection in the gardens of the officers at Sitka. Plants are found in the Arctic regions which belong to a temperate climate. Poisonous plants are few and not virulent, and reptiles, toads, and lizards are never seen.

This is the character of the country in its agricultural aspect. It is covered with gigantic pine forests, with the exception of a strip of land upon the northern coast opposite Behring strait. Trees measure between three and six feet. I saw a gentleman here the other day, (Mr. Page,) a citizen of one of the Territories on the Pacific coast, who says he has seen a tree three feet in diameter growing over a fallen tree of nearly equal size, and as sound as the living tree above it. He is a man whose word I certainly have no right to question. He states a fact as within his own knowledge which without his authority I would not repeat. It is confirmed by what is said of the density and solidity of this timber by the officers of the Coast Survey, and by the naval commission at Toulon, made in 1860, when comparing it with the masts and spars from Riga. Such facts speak for the fertility of this country, if nothing else. As I have said, Alaska is covered with timber of this description except a strip of one hundred miles on Behring strait.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Did Mr. Page say he saw it?

Mr. BANKS. He saw it and he affirms it. Every gentleman must judge for himself whether it is so or not.

Let me speak now of the timber of Alaska. It consists of white fir, spruce fir, white and yellow pine, cedar and hemlock, alder, some oak, and a few other species of timber of which we know little. The Alaska cedar for ship-building is the best in the world. An imperial commission of the French Government sitting at Toulon in 1860 reported that masts and spars from Vancouver's Island are superior to those from Riga. The timber of Alaska is of the same quality as that of Vancouver's Island. This is the opinion of the French imperial commission sitting at Toulon. It is also the testimony of Professor Davidson. The hemlock will be used for tanning hides, which are abundant in Siberia, and the alder is extensively used in curing fish. Upon the coast of Alaska and all through the country hemlock and cedar are abundant. That the whole territory is covered with forests, excepting a strip of one hundred miles opposite Behring strait, is another fact that is not and cannot be disputed. I will say no more for the timber of Alaska.

I will, however, with the consent of the committee, allude to a fact concerning the products of Russia in the same latitude as the timber forests of Alaska. In the interior of Russia, between the fifty-fifth and sixty-second parallels of latitude, in the provinces of Novgorod, Viatska, Kostroma, and Kasan there is found a tree of the lime, linden or basswood species called the tilleul. The bark of this tree has great commercial importance. Every year the bark of these trees is stripped by the people of these four provinces and manufactured into numerous useful fabrics. The whole population turn out for some two or three weeks during the season and devote all their time and energy to the gathering of this bark.

A MEMBER. What is the population of the provinces?

Mr. BANKS. It numbers many thousands; it is in the central part of Russia, where the population is very great. Of this bark they manufacture mats, envelopes for merchandise, carriage covers, carpets, ponton-bridges, sacks for corn, cords, cables, sails for their river and canal boats, roofs for their houses, and shoes for their feet, paper for writing used in place of parchment, and canvas for their paintings. Legal documents are written on the material manufactured from this bark. Now, this territory is in the same line exactly with Alaska, and it is the same kind of country in other respects. The two countries are the same in the matter of timber, and we have reason to suppose woods of the same class and character will be discovered in Alaska that grow in Russia. This, however, is problematical.

Gentlemen tell us, although this timber may exist in quantities and of the excellent character described, it is of no use, because we have enough elsewhere. They forget that the world changes. Whoever speaks in that sense must imagine that he is eternal and that everything else is mortal. Everywhere we see evidences that this continent is being rapidly stripped of its forests, which once covered it as they now cover Alaska. Even the prairies, occupied by gentlemen around me, are supposed to have been once covered by primeval forests. In Lapland there are evidences of the existence of immense forests. There are the remains of trunks of trees of gigantic size that bear incontestable evidence of having been grown on the land or ground where they now are.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman allow me to state a fact just here?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. PRICE. In reference to the prairies I want to say that there is more timber to-day

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Banks.

HO. OF REPS.

on the prairies of Iowa than there was twenty-five years ago.

Mr. BANKS. I understand that to be so. I am glad to know that I have not at least to convince gentlemen here of that fact. I will explain the reason of this new growth. The Pyrenices were once covered with gigantic forests. They have been swept away by the hand of man, until people are obliged to abandon their native mountain regions. But now the forests are being reestablished in the mountain country. Acacia seed is exported from Australia to distant parts of India and Asia, and planted upon the most sterile sandy deserts, where it takes root, and will at no distant day cover them with vegetation if not with forests. In our own country throughout Nebraska and all along the Missouri valley, according to the reports of the Land Commissioner, extensive experiments are being made in the restoration of the primeval forests by forest tree planting. And now my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] says that there are more trees on the prairies than there were twenty-five years ago. He sees the result of that which all the world is engaged in performing, the reestablishment of forests wherever they have been destroyed. They are restoring the forests to the Alps. The roots of the trees fasten the soils to the mountain. Even the earth is carried away by the mountain cataracts, and nothing will keep it there but the growth of forest trees.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question? Am I to understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] to affirm that in twenty-five years they can grow good building timber of pines or evergreens?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Yes, sir; they do.

Mr. BANKS. I do not doubt it. Now, sir, it is said by gentlemen that timber is plenty enough in British Columbia, and in the northern States and Territories of the United States, to supply the world forever. But it is not so. It may be but a week or a month before all of those forests may be swept away from us by fire. It has been the case elsewhere. We may not continue the possessor of this property and it may not exist for others another year. At any rate we cannot have too much of it. What is the market for the timber of the Pacific coast? It is, in the first place, Russia, China, Japan, India, Australia, California, Mexico, South America, all the countries that line the coasts of the Pacific ocean. We send it also to the Atlantic side of South America, and even into the Gulf of Mexico on that side. The unsurpassed masts and spars of the Pacific coast are sent to every port in every part of the world. Who is here to say that we have too much of this property, or that it is a crime to increase our supply?

Let me come now to the matter of the fisheries. When the committee were considering the matter of the fisheries, a statement from the officers of the Coast Survey relating to the quantity of fish found in these bays and rivers was presented, and it was so extravagant that gentlemen of the committee thought it would be better to omit it in the report. We therefore struck it out. But we find it repeated from so many sources that I was satisfied that it was not only true, but that it ought not to have been omitted. The other day Mr. Seth Green, who is known to all the members of the House as having had great experience in relation to fish and fisheries, told me that in the neighborhood of Lake Champlain he had seen the fish in the rivers there a foot thick, piled one on another, so that a man could not easily walk through them. I admit the extravagance of the statement, but I will give you the reason of it.

Mr. Chairman, there is in no part of the world, except on a small scale in the fiords of Norway, anything like the arrangement of the bays and rivers and islands on the Alaska coast. There it is continental; in Norway it is immaterial and unimportant, because of its small extent. Here is an ocean covering a hundred million square miles—the Pacific and Indian oceans being, in the opinion of geographers—that has never been fished so far as we know. The English commission appointed to investigate the condition of the fisheries of Great Britain report that a single fish will lay in one year three million four hundred thousand eggs, and all fish have to a greater or less extent a similar fecundity. When we consider the vast multitude of fish that the Pacific ocean must contain, we can very well believe that when storms drive them into these bays they are as numerous as they are represented to be. It is not a matter of fancy, but a matter of fact. The Indians from all portions of Alaska go down to the coast when from indications which they get from the flight of birds, whose flocks darken the heavens, that the fish are coming in schools upon the coast, and lay in their supply for the year. These waters abound in whale, cod, halibut, salmon, and all the varieties of fish that inhabit the cold waters. Our fishermen do not cure their fish on the Aleutian Islands or the peninsula of Alaska, but are carried to California, or wherever the fishermen belong.

The Coast Survey department reports this fact: that the whale fishing grounds of the east coast of North America are one million three hundred thousand square miles; while the whale fishing grounds of the west coast of North America are one million one hundred and twenty thousand square miles—about the same extent of sea surface. But the whale has abandoned the seas of the northeast coast and is pursued to seas adjacent to Alaska, twenty thousand miles from whence he is followed into the Arctic ocean. The cod and halibut fisheries on the northeast coast of North America are eighty-four thousand two hundred square miles; on the northwest coast of North America two hundred and fifty thousand square miles, or three times the extent of sea surface. The Superintendent of the Bureau of Statistics informs me that there are sixty thousand men engaged every year in the fisheries of the northwestern coast of North America. Now, here are two hundred and forty thousand square miles of fishing grounds, which will give occupation to at least one hundred and twenty thousand men in the cod and halibut fisheries alone. The fisheries of the United States return every year a product of $34,000,000, four fifths of which is from the whale and cod fishing. Of that we obtain our share now from the eighty-four thousand square miles of the fisheries of the northeast coast of America, sharing its wealth with England and France, who have by far the best opportunities, to whose fishing grounds we are admitted only upon the payment of onerous tonnage taxes. By this purchase we treble the extent of the fisheries, of which we have exclusive possession, and of course we obtain a corresponding increase of employment and product.

Now, let me say one word in regard to the rivers and harbors of this territory, and I will close what I have to say upon this subject. I have only to refer to what is contained in the report of the committee. These rivers of Alaska, unlike those of Russia, which run north into the Arctic ocean, run mainly southerly and southwesterly into the Pacific ocean, with one exception. And what is more rare in the dispensation of Providence, between these rivers is a system or chain of lakes, so closely connected that the traders and natives are able to pass by canoes from one to the other with very small portages. It is unlike anything else on our continent that we know of. I might speak of the numerous and valuable harbors of the Aleutian Islands, but time forbids.

I come now to a question of practical importance. What is the value of these things to us? They add to the industrial product of the country, from native industries alone, employment for fishermen, lumbermen, miners, colliers, mariners, ship-builders, trappers, hunters, farmers, ice-cutters, and traders. From the native industries of this possession, carrying nothing there but men, we will find, when the resources of the territory are fully developed, employment for two hundred and fifty thousand persons. A quarter of a million of people will be engaged in peaceful, honorable, profitable, national, native industries in this territory alone. That is what we may do in the way of developing the country and the increase of industrial product.

I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN,] or any other man, no matter who he is, or where he may be from, to point to any part of this continent where there is material for an equal variety of native industries. I ask him to point me to any territory here or elsewhere where the materials for native industry can be accumulated to an equal or greater variety or extent. It cannot be done. I say here that such employments as are opened by this purchase will increase the industrial power of this country at home and abroad by a quarter of a million of persons. And allowing each man to represent a family of four persons, it will furnish a support for a population of a million souls.

Who is interested in this purchase? The Pacific States. Will you say to them that it is worthless; that we do not want it; that the Government has no right to acquire it? They know better. They know that the possession of this territory is hereafter identified with the prosperity of this Government and the development and increase of our industry. It was not General Grant alone who contributed to the great victories which crushed the rebellion. The Pacific coast has as well its share of honor. If California in 1861 had joined the rebels in striking against this Government we might not this day have conquered the peace we enjoy, or have still mourned over a divided country. If California had joined the rebels with France in the possession of Mexico and with England in the possession of Russian America, and they together had struck hands against this country, the United States to-day would not now have closed its great contest with its domestic enemies.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Suppose Massachusetts had joined the rebels, what would be our position to-day?

Mr. BANKS. I shall be sustained by men who justly consider this question, when I say that had California joined the rebellion and given the Pacific coast to the enemies of the country South and North we might not yet have conquered in that struggle. It is of no account to me that the gentleman from Wisconsin takes issue with what I say. If my views of the public interests co-curred with his I would think there was no further use for me in this Hall and would resign my seat. I do not speak to convince that gentleman or to change his views. I say California proved herself a fast and important friend of this Government in our hour of trial, and did more than might have been expected of her, because she had been controlled by the enemies of the country up to the moment our flag was struck at Fort Sumter. But she did better than we expected; she "buiided better than we knew." She gave the whole Pacific coast to the cause of liberty and Union, and to us through the Providence of God the victory; but for that the blood of our brave soldiers would have been shed for naught; but for that hundreds of thousands of young men rushing forward from all parts of the country, from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific valley, to fight and die would have fought or died in vain. But the Pacific coast gave to us our triumph, and has preserved to us our country. She asks now the extension of our interests on the Pacific coast. With what grace can the East deny her request? With what justice can the Missisissippi valley, that was acquired by a similar treaty, deny to California a favor which, while it strengthens her interests, enlarges, consolidates, and extends those of the whole country?

And, sir, I need not remind this House to what extent Russia has been the friend of this country in trying emergencies. I remember that even before the Government of the United States was established, when we stealthily sent men from this country to the European Courts who scarcely dared to avow the objects of their mission, the American minister who represented this country at the Court of France was instructed to prevent, if possible, the Swiss and the Russians from furnishing troops to the English Government to destroy the independence of these Colonies. He reported to the Government—his declaration will be found in the archives of the Government—that of the Swiss he could say nothing; but as to the Russians we need have no fear; they were our friends and would not fight against us; and they did not.

At every step from 1780 up to this hour Russia has been our friend. In the darkest hour of our peril, when we were enacting a history which no man yet thoroughly comprehends, which has not yet been completed; when the heart of every lover of his country sunk within him, and few were bold enough confidently to hope for the success of our cause; in the midst of that great struggle against a gigantic rebellion, when France and England were contemplating the recognition of the rebel confederacy, and were about to spring that last card upon us, the whole world was thrilled by the appearance in San Francisco of a Russian fleet, and nearly at the same time, whether by accident or design, a second Russian fleet appeared in the harbor of New York. Who knew how many more there were on the voyage here? From that hour, France on one hand and England on the other receded, and the American Government regained its position and power. [After a pause.] I feel inclined to go still further, to say that when the Russian flag floated over its fleets in the harbors of San Francisco and New York, even then it was not intended that General Grant should successfully go through the campaign at Vicksburg; the officers of the volunteer army associated with him in the defense of the country were offered promotion and censured because they would not take from him the command of his army at Vicksburg—yes, sir, Russia and California in this dark hour of our country's history came to our rescue and gave us victory!

Now, shall we flout the Russian Government in every Court of Europe for her friendship? Having sought from her for twenty-five years the fisheries of the northwest coast, and having received from her not only the incident of the fisheries, but the substance of the territorial possession incident to the fisheries, shall we do what never before has been done, refuse to execute the treaty she has made at our solicitation with our own Government, upon the conditions and according to the letter of our own Constitution? I do not believe it! Whoever of the Representatives of the American people in this House on this question turns his back not only upon his duty, but upon the friends of his country, upon the Constitution of his Government, the honor of his generation, cannot long remain in power.

There is one precedent we must dismiss from memory before we can do that. We must erase from our history the glorious incident of Jackson's administration, when he compelled France to pay under a treaty contracted with us, and when France answered as we are now urged to answer, that the appropriation of money was another matter. Although she was the best friend we had, yet Jackson asserted he would compel the execution of the treaty at the hazard of war. Gentlemen cannot make a distinction between that case and the one now presented: and having taken 25,000,000 francs from the French treasury under a treaty with France by threats of war, under exactly similar circumstances, we cannot now turn our backs upon our own precedent. If we do refuse to appropriate this money, when we owe another Government under treaty stipulations, it will be a greater dishonor than our country yet has known.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, for the great attention shown to me. It was not my intention to have detained you so long.

Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. C. C. WASHBURN,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 1, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: After the eloquent and lofty speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on yesterday, I shall consider myself extremely fortunate if I can command the attention of this committee to the remarks I desire now to make. But sir, if gentlemen will come down from the region of the clouds to which they were transported by the honorable gentleman, and from those realms of fancy and imagination in which he revealed, to plain matters of every-day fact, I shall not despair of doing something yet to protect the rights of my constituents and of the people of this country.

Gentlemen could not fail to observe all through the speech made by the gentleman on yesterday, the extreme lack of authorities to sustain his statements, and the great preponderance, instead, of spread-eagle oratory. Sir, I shall enter into no contest with the gentleman in the eagle business; I resign that to him altogether. But I shall ask those members who have not arrived at the sublime position of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who declared "that he did not rely on human testimony, that he was above it"—I shall ask those gentlemen who do care for such testimony to listen while I unfold the facts that surround this most extraordinary case.

I shall attempt to demonstrate five propositions, and if I shall succeed in doing so, I think I may claim the judgment of this committee and of the House. Those propositions are:

1. That at the time this treaty was negotiated not a soul in the whole United States asked for it.
2. That it was secretly negotiated and in a manner to prevent the Representatives of the people from being heard.
3. That by existing treaties we possessed every right that is of any value to us without the responsibility and never-ending expense of governing a nation of savages.
4. That the country is absolutely without value.
5. That it is the right and duty of the House to inquire into the treaty, and vote or not vote the money according to its best judgment.

My first proposition is that on the 30th day of March, 1867, the day on which this treaty was signed, there was not a man in the whole length and breadth of the United States who had ever conceived the idea that this territory of Alaska was a valuable territory for the United States to possess; not even the gentleman from Massachusetts, though he now declares it to be absolutely necessary to the very safety and existence of this nation. Sir, no one had discovered that fact before the 30th of March, 1867. You will look in vain for any such person. You may look through the public press; you may examine every source of information, and you will not find a man in the whole United States who ever had even suggested that it was a desirable purchase for us to make, or a desirable possession for us to have. Even on the Pacific coast, which is now said to be clamorous for it, no such idea had entered the brain of any man there.

Sir, I had hoped that the speech of my friend from Massachusetts would appear in to-day's Globe. I made some very meager notes as he proceeded, and I intend to take up the points he made seriatim, and to answer them. I say here that the gentleman has made statements which there is no evidence to sustain; and I may say that he made no substantive statement that has any evidence to sustain it; and I go further, and will say here that every material statement made by him is contradicted by the most positive and certain evidence that I shall produce.

The gentleman set off with the declaration that the committee had thought it their duty to report this bill; that it was an unpleasant duty, and that had they not felt compelled to do so they would not have reported the bill. Now, sir, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the position of the committee, I think there will be no impropriety in stating what it was and what it is upon the subject. Although a report was allowed to be made to this House, I assert that no majority of the nine members of the committee ever concurred in that report. But four members were in favor of this purchase and four members were against it; and one member assured me he had given no opinion upon the subject.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman allow me to correct his statement?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. BANKS. It was not stated that there was a majority of the whole committee in favor of this report, though I believe such to be the fact. The facts that at a meeting of the committee, more than a quorum being present, only two members voted against the report of the majority; and those two gentlemen have signed the minority report. That is the fact.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to misstate any one, and I will not do so; I simply wish the facts not to be misunderstood. When the committee agreed to report this bill I was not present in the committee; I was confined to my house by illness. I addressed a note to my friend, the chairman of the committee, saying that if a majority of the committee should conclude to report the bill I desire to make a minority report. The gentleman will bear me witness that I have made no factious opposition to this matter at any time. I have said to him as I say to the House, that I am and always have been willing and ready to meet this question on its merits. I have never sought to have the bill put over till the next session of Congress. If I cannot show good and sufficient reasons for the position which I have taken in this matter I am willing to be overruled. I have made the best fight on this outrage on the rights of the people as I regard it that I could, and I intend to fight it to the bitter end; and I never will yield the rights of the people to be heard on questions so vital to them as are involved in this matter.

But, sir, the gentleman starts out with the most astonishing statement for a statesman to make. He says that the committee reported this bill because it was their duty to do so; that they felt Congress was compelled to appropriate this sum of $7,200,000. Why was it a disagreeable duty? He afterward tells us that this territory is worth not only $7,000,000 but $700,000,000. Why should the gentleman regret to make a report in favor of the purchase of the territory for $7,000,000 when he himself estimates its value at $700,000,000? The gentleman from Massachusetts in his speech lays down the same doctrine which he enunciates in his report. He says in his report:

"It is now conceded that the House is entitled to consider the merits of a treaty; that it may determine whether its object is within the scope of the treaty power; but, if it be not inconsistent with the spirit and purpose of the Government, Congress is bound to give it effect, by necessary legislation, as a contract between the Government and a foreign nation. If, on the contrary, it is found to be in conflict with the fundamental principles, purposes, or interests of the Government, it would be justified, not merely in withholding its aid, but in giving notice to foreign nations interested that it would not be regarded as binding upon the nation, in passing laws for its abrogation, and preparing the State for whatever consequences might attend its action."

The gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN,] though both advocating the purchase of this territory, are at issue on this question. When two such learned doctors disagree it is difficult to decide. The gentleman concedes when he says, if the treaty is contrary to the interests of the Government, the Congress has the right to interpose. This concedes the whole case. Yet he is not so clear as he usually is, at one moment he tells us we have the right, and at another that we have not the right. He tells us we have the right to interfere in a class of cases where we have no power to interfere; and in another class of cases, where we have the power to interfere, he tells us we have no right to interfere.

Now, I would inquire of my honorable friend how this House is to interfere to defeat a treaty unless by its terms it stipulates conditions that belong to the law-making power? Take the case of the infamous Osage treaty, now pending in the Senate, which stipulates for nothing that requires the action of Congress. Suppose the Senate confirms that treaty? There is no member of the House, I believe, who does not believe that that treaty was a fraud and an outrage on the American people. How would the gentleman from Massachusetts interfere to defeat it as he says we may? It is in no way referred to the law-making power, and if anybody can point out any method by which we may defeat it I should be thankful if he would do so.

I say, again, that the gentleman is not to my mind at all clear when he undertakes to show what this House may do and what not. Again, he says:

"But when a treaty is limited to objects consistent with the interests of the Government, which cannot be attained except by the treaty-making power, its first and highest duty is to enact such measures as are necessary to carry the treaty into effect. To say that a treaty is not a treaty until approved by the House is to make the House a part of the treaty-making power. To say that the House has no rights in regard to foreign treaties, except when they are referred to the House by its provisions, is to admit that the House is not a part of the Government."

There is wisdom for you! I have seen nothing better since the days of Jack Bunsby. When Captain Cuttle called on his friend, Jack Bunsby, for an opinion—and giving opinions was his forte—as to the fate of a certain individual who was supposed to be drowned, Bunsby in an oracular manner, only excelled by that of my excellent friend, gives "an opinion as is an opinion." Said he, while Captain Cuttle listened with as much astonishment and admiration as members listened on yesterday:

"If so be that the man is dead, then my opinion is he won't come back no more; but if so be the man's alive, then my opinion is he will. Do I say he will? No. Why not? Because the bearing of this observation lays in the application of it."

Now, sir, the doctrine I maintain, and the first point to be considered in this case, is as to the right of Congress when a treaty stipulates for an appropriation of money. I will concede for the sake of the argument that this treaty is within the limits of the treaty-making power. If, then, this House has no right to inquire into such treaties, treaties that are not tainted with fraud, but which, by their terms, are referred to the law-making power, there is an end to the whole question and it is not necessary to discuss any other question connected with it. Now, sir, I undertake to say that that is not the doctrine, notwithstanding the ipse dixit of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I undertake to say that the whole weight of authority from the foundation of the Government is in direct contradiction to the position taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I will not undertake to quote the sayings of the different public men on these points. I will state the precedents, however. They are all to the same effect.

The first arose at the time of Jay's treaty, in which, by a very decided vote, the doctrine was laid down that is contained in this resolution, passed by the very decisive vote of 57 to 35:

"Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution that 'the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided that two thirds of the Senators present concur,' the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties, but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or in expediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

That resolution was amply and ably discussed by the men who made the Constitution, Mr. Madison taking a prominent part. That doctrine was laid down during the administration of General Washington, and it has been reasserted on every occasion when the question has come up from that day to this. And, although it may be alleged that the House has never refused to appropriate money to carry out treaties on every occasion when the question has arisen, it has, nevertheless, asserted its right to do so, and the point has never been yielded; and when money has been voted to execute treaties it has always been on the ground that the House approved them, and not because it was believed that they were under any obligation to do so.

Now, sir, I have before me the opinions of the most eminent men in the constitutional convention which framed our Constitution, but I have not the time to read them.

I pass next to the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana. The same doctrine was laid down there in the discussion, and no man had the hardihood to call it in question. They voted the money because they simply approved the treaty. Mr. Jefferson, before he negotiated the treaty, did the proper thing to call upon Congress to appropriate money to pay the expenses incident thereto. It was the case of the treaty in 1816 with Great Britain which I dismiss, simply declaring that the same doctrine was fully asserted then, as may be seen by looking at my report; and I come down to the Spanish treaty. The gentleman from Massachusetts says it is impossible to cite a stronger recognition of the obligation resting upon the law-making power to execute a treaty than that. My reading and the reading of the gentleman from Massachusetts is entirely different on that subject; and so far as any discussion of the subject of the Spanish treaty is concerned it sustains the position I have laid down. I defy the gentleman to cite an authority which sustains him in his assertion on this point.

I come now to the Gadsden treaty, the last precedent I shall cite in this matter. It will be recollected we made that treaty in 1854 for the acquisition of Arizona. General Gadsden was our minister to Mexico, and made the treaty. He was authorized to pay $10,000,000, but he entered into the treaty and agreed to pay $2,000,000. The treaty came to the Senate, but it was so barefaced a piece of villainy that they did not ratify it. They sent it back with instructions to insist on having it for $10,000,000; and as soon as a man could get there Mexico accepted the amended terms. There was a lengthy discussion in the House when the appropriation bill came up for consideration to pay for Arizona. In that discussion it was conceded on all hands that we had the right to refuse to make the appropriation if we thought fit so to do. It was carried on the ground that it was a wise and advantageous treaty, although there was a large minority voting against it. Some members now present were then members of the House. It was carried because the dominant party desired it, yet not one can be found who assumed the ground taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Mr. BAILEY, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, expressly declared that he put it on no such ground as claimed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The bill passed the House and went to the Senate, and was then taken up and passed without one word of discussion; and it is worthy of remark that of those recorded as voting against the appropriation to carry out this treaty may be found the names of the negotiator of this treaty, Mr. Seward, and its great advocate in the Senate, Mr. SUMNER, also the present Chief Justice of the United States, Mr. Chase, the present Vice President, Mr. WADE, and Mr. FESSENDEN, the distinguished Senator from Maine. So that it will be seen that all these distinguished men then had no scruples about refusing money to execute a treaty. But that was with Mexico, a weak and friendless Power. How dishonorable would it be to say that we may rightfully do with such a Power what we may not do with one strong and powerful. My friend from Massachusetts was in the House at that time. He can doubtless tell how he voted on that occasion.

Mr. BANKS. I was not in the House when the vote was taken; I did not vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I am justified, therefore, in saying these precedents establish that it is both our right and duty to exercise our best judgment in regard to this treaty. If we approve it we should appropriate the money; if not, we should refuse to do so. And I leave this part of the subject with a simple quotation from Mr. Jefferson. In a letter to Mr. Monroe (volume 4, page 184) he says:

"We conceive the constitutional doctrine to be, that though the President and Senate have the general power of making treaties, yet whenever they include in a treaty matters confided by the Constitution to the three branches of the Legislature an act of legislation will be requisite to confirm these articles, and that the House of Representatives, as one branch of the Legislature, are perfectly free to pass the act or to refuse it, governing themselves by their own judgment whether it is for the good of their constituents to let the treaty go into effect or not. On this depend whether the powers of legislation shall be transferred from the President, Senate, and House of Representatives, to the President, Senate, and a Plinking, or any other Indian, Algerine, or other chief."

I now come to the question of our obligations to Russia; and as pertinent to that matter I first invite attention to the following opinion of Judge McLean, of the Supreme Court of the United States. The case of Turner vs. American Baptist Missionary Union, (5 McLean, 344,) decides as follows:

"A treaty is the supreme law of the land only when the treaty-making power can carry it into effect."

"A treaty which stipulates for the payment of money undertakes to do that which the treaty-making power cannot do; therefore the treaty is not the supreme law of the land."

"To give it the effect the action of Congress is necessary. And in this action the Representatives and Senators act on their own judgment and responsibility, and not on the judgment and responsibility of the treaty-making power."

"A foreign Government may be presumed to know the power of appropriating money belongs to Congress."

"No act of any part of the Government can be held to be a law which has not all the sanctions to make it law."

In considering this question I have no hesitancy in declaring that in my judgment, whatever good faith and honor require, that should be done, and the nation cannot afford to count the cost in doing it. But there is no question of good or bad faith involved in this matter.

This is a plain business statement of the case. A contract is entered into by the President, acting through the Secretary of State, to purchase of the Russian Government the territory of Alaska. The contract contained stipulations which were well understood by Baron Stoeckl, the agent of the Russian Government. Those stipulations were such as the negotiators could not enforce, but which were necessary to be complied with before the treaty could become valid or binding. The stipulations were, first, that the treaty should be ratified by the Senate; and second, that the legislative power should vote the necessary appropriation. The first stipulation was complied with, and the second is the one now being considered. Each stipulation was independent of the other, and required independent powers to carry it into execution. The treaty-making power can no more bind Congress to pass a law than Congress can bind it to make a treaty. They are independent departments, and were designed to act as checks rather than be subservient to each other.

As was well said by Judge McLean, in the authority before quoted—

"A treaty is the supreme law of the land only when the treaty-making power can carry it into effect. A treaty which stipulates for the payment of moneys undertakes to do that which the treaty-making power cannot do; therefore the treaty is not the supreme law of the land. A foreign Government may be presumed to know that the power of appropriating money belongs to Congress."

In this particular case the foreign Government may not only be presumed to know, but it may safely be said that that Government did actually know, that the treaty was not complete and the law of the land until the action of the body stipulated in the treaty was had; and this declaration is based on the fact that the minister of the Government of Russia, who negotiated this treaty, has been a resident of Washington for over twenty years. He speaks the English language fluently and well. He is a gentleman of intelligence and well informed in regard to our system of government. It was impossible for him to be ignorant of the fact that the treaty he negotiated was not the supreme law of the land until it had received the sanction of Congress; and if he failed to make known the fact to his august master it is not the fault of the American Congress or the American people.

But it is said that Russia has given us possession, and for that reason we should vote the money. Quite otherwise. Why was possession taken by the Executive of this Government and yielded by Russia before the money was paid or even voted? No interest of this Government was suffering for the want of immediate possession, and it is believed that no benefit could arise to this Government from having possession before the time stipulated for the payment of the money. The same may be said in regard to Russia, unless the country was so worthless that every day she held possession was a positive damage to her, and for that reason she was in haste to be rid of it. It requires no great stretch of imagination to divine the scarcely hidden causes which governed the parties negotiating this treaty in stipulating for immediate possession. They could hardly have failed to foresee that this treaty would be strongly opposed in this House, and that upon its merits it could have no chance for the necessary appropriation. An extraordinary pressure was seen to be necessary, and that pressure was sought for in giving and taking possession.

Will this House allow itself to be coerced by any such performance? To state the question is to answer it. But it is said that Russia, our best friend, will be offended if we fail to appropriate the money. I fully recognize the friendly character of the Russian Government in the past, and the importance of cultivating friendly relations in the future; but, for the reason stated, it is denied that any just ground of offense can exist if this House fails to sanction the treaty. The country is grateful to Russia for sympathy received from her during our late struggle for existence, and I should be very unwilling to do anything to justly offend that Power. It is maintained that the refusal to appropriate money to carry this treaty into execution would be cause of war on the part of Russia, and the action of President Jackson is cited, in the case of the refusal of France to pay the money stipulated to be paid in the treaty of Paris, negotiated in 1831. But that case is in no sense parallel to the one under consideration. There the claim of this Government existed long before the treaty was negotiated. The treaty merely liquidated the amount which France was to pay. Our right to the money was perfect and complete before the treaty was made, and a refusal to pay it was as much a cause of war before the treaty as afterward; and had there been no treaty liquidating the amount the right to demand payment would still have existed, and, if need be, to use force to compel it.

Now, my report seems to have thrown the friends of this measure into some consternation. In the National Intelligencer of the 19th ultimo appeared a letter over the signature of Alaska, which the Intelligencer says is from a statesman of forty year's standing, and I have since understood it was from Hon. Robert J. Walker. Such being the fact, I am justified in referring to it, not only because of the character of its author, but because I regard it as virtually an emanation from the State Department. He takes up my report, and the first statement he notices is in regard to the existence of previous treaties, because he saw, as my friend from Massachusetts must see, and as every intelligent man must see, that if my statement was correct, namely, that we had an existing treaty with Russia that gave us the right to trade on that coast, the right to fish on that coast, the right to land and cure fish on the coast, and the right to visit the interior waters and trade with the natives, we had virtually everything that is desirable, and that there could be no excuse for this treaty. Neither the chairman of the committee nor any other gentleman will dispute that if we could have those privileges it would be better for us to have them without the responsibility and never-ending expense of ruling and governing a nation of savages. I think no one will doubt that. Now, Mr. Walker, to get rid of my most fatal statement in my report, undertakes to say that we had no such treaty rights, and the gentleman from Massachusetts asserts the same on this floor. As these things are denied, it is made my duty to prove them.

In 1824 a treaty was negotiated at St. Petersburg between the United States Government and Russia. The negotiators of that treaty were Hon. Henry Middleton on the part of the United States and Count Nesselrode on the part of Russia. The treaty has never been abrogated, and was in full force when the treaty was negotiated which we are hereafter to consider. The first article of the treaty of 1824 is as follows, namely:

"ARTICLE I. It is agreed that in any part of the great ocean commonly called the Pacific ocean, or South sea, the respective citizens or subjects of the high contracting Powers shall be neither disturbed nor restrained either in navigation or in fishing, or in the power of resorting to the coasts upon points which may not already have been occupied for the purpose of trading with the natives, saving always the instructions and conditions determined by the following articles."

The instructions afterward named are such as were necessary to prevent illicit trade.

In 1832 another treaty was negotiated with Russia, the negotiators being Hon. James Buchanan on the part of the United States and Count Nesselrode on the part of Russia. That treaty was of full force and effect at the time of the negotiation of the late treaty for the purchase of Russian America. The first article of that treaty is as follows, namely:

"ARTICLE I. There shall be between the territories of the high contracting parties a reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation. The inhabitants of their respective States shall mutually have liberty to enter the ports, places, and rivers of the territories of each party wherever foreign commerce is permitted. They shall be at liberty to sojourn and reside in all ports whatsoever of said territories, in order to attend to their affairs, and they shall enjoy to that effect the same security and protection as natives of the country wherein they reside, on condition of their submitting to the laws and ordinances there prevailing, and particularly to the regulations in force concerning commerce."

In the first treaty the fourth article provides:

"That during the term of ten years, counting from the signature of the present convention, the ships of both Powers, or which belong to their citizens or subjects, respectively, may reciprocally frequent without any hindrance whatever, the interior seas, gulfs, harbors, and creeks upon the coast mentioned in the preceding article, for the purpose of fishing and trading with the natives of the country."

The gentleman says that this treaty was abrogated. I take issue with him, and will state how I understand the matter. This treaty having been in existence ten years, that provision of it in article four, which allowed our people to go inland into the harbors and bays and rivers to trade with the natives, was abrogated, and the reason assigned was that our people went there not for the purpose of legitimate trade, but for the purpose of selling whisky and fire-arms to the Indians; and that provision was therefore abrogated after a long conference and correspondence between the State Department, through Mr. Forsyth, and the Russian Government. Mr. Forsyth maintained always, and never yielded the point, that under the first article of the treaty we had the right of landing on the coast, but not to visit the interior bays, and that right was not and could not be terminated.

Now, sir, in 1825 a treaty was entered into with Great Britain giving similar privileges, but the effect of the Crimean war was to abrogate all treaties between Great Britain and Russia, and in 1859, after the war was over, a new treaty was ratified between Great Britain and Russia. Before considering it, I beg to call attention to an article of the treaty with Russia of 1832, which treaty it is not pretended has been in any degree abrogated. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not claim that. The eleventh article of that treaty reads as follows:

"If either party shall hereafter grant to any other nation any particular favor in navigation or commerce, it shall immediately become common to the other party freely when it is freely granted to such other nation, or on yielding the same compensation when the grant is conditional."

Now, I assert that in 1859 Russia entered into a treaty with Great Britain, and that we are entitled to the benefit of it under this contract between us and Russia. That there may be no mistake about it I will read from the treaty between Russia and Great Britain:

"VI. It is understood that the subjects of his Britannic majesty, from whatever quarter they may arrive, whether from the ocean, or from the interior of the continent, shall forever enjoy the right of navigating freely, and without any hindrance whatever, all the rivers and streams which, in their course toward the Pacific ocean, may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article three of the present convention."

"VII. It is also understood that for the space of ten years from the signature of the present convention, the vessels of the two Powers, or those belonging to their respective subjects, shall mutually be at liberty to frequent, without any hindrance whatever, all the inland seas, the gulfs, havens, and creeks on the coast mentioned in article three, for the purposes of fishing and of trading with the natives."

"VIII. The port of Sitka, or Novo Archangelsk, shall be open to the commerce and vessels of British subjects for the space of ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention. In the event of an extension of this term of ten years being granted to any other Power, the like extension shall be granted also to Great Britain."

That treaty was negotiated with Great Britain in 1859, and by our treaty with Russia the same privileges inure to us. Then we already had this privilege without any expense whatever, and our fishermen have been in the habit of going there to fish every year. My friend from Massachusetts shows in his report that in 1866, before this treaty was made, there were not less than twenty-three vessels, "ships, barks, brigs, and schooners," up there engaged in fishing.

Mr. PRUYN. May I make an inquiry of the gentleman?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRUYN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that in consequence of a general provision of the treaty by which, when any concession was made to any other Power, it should apply to this country, although that treaty with this country was a treaty for ten years only, that general provision is good for all time to come?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I say no such thing. This treaty of which I speak—the treaty of 1832—has never been abrogated, and never can be abrogated until a certain notice has been given, which never has been yet given. It is a good and valid treaty to-day; and under that treaty we are entitled to all the rights which they have granted to Great Britain or to any other country.

Mr. PRUYN. But it may be terminated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. It may be terminated upon a given notice; but it has not yet been terminated, and there is no reason to suppose that Russia, our best friend, ever would have terminated it.

Mr. BLAINE. How does it affect other treaties in relation to this territory which Russia has made with other Powers?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I will answer that question. Gentlemen who have looked into this matter will have discovered that when this treaty was first negotiated the proposition was to pay only $7,000,000; that was the original agreement. But Mr. Seward insisted that it should be free from all incumbrances; and Mr. Stoeckl agreed to that, and then Mr. Seward said very mildly, without inquiring what those incumbrances were, "I will give you a couple of hundred thousand dollars in gold in addition if you will do so." Of course Mr. Stoeckl agreed to take the additional $200,000 in coin.

Now, I will tell you what those incumbrances are, and which are not yet removed, and which cannot be removed. First, the treaty with Great Britain, which cannot be abrogated for ten years from 1859, and which gives them the right to navigate these rivers forever.

Mr. BANKS. Allow me to correct the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Very well.

Mr. BANKS. It is not provided by that treaty that Great Britain shall have the right to navigate the rivers of Russian America forever. It provides that in relation to the rivers rising in British Columbia and passing through this portion of Russian America in front of British Columbia the right of navigation shall be secured to Great Britain. It is a right which covers the Stikine only, and it is a right which this country has claimed from its very foundation; that where a river takes its rise in one country and passes through another country, the people of the country where the river took its rise have the right to follow the river to its mouth.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Well, sir, if we have claimed something of the kind the gentleman states, other nations have never conceded it, but always refused it. Have we the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, or any other river which discharges itself outside of our own territory?

Mr. BANKS. The St. Lawrence does not rise in our territory.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Where then does it rise? But I beg leave to correct the gentleman in regard to his geographical statements, which are quite as wide of the mark as most of his other statements. I state that this provision does not apply to the Stikine river only. I state that every river of any importance in Alaska rises in British America, and the British people have the right to navigate those rivers forever. I do not speak at random, as is so much the gentleman's habit, but I have the map of Alaska before me, which shows that every river of Alaska that is in any degree navigable takes its rise in British America. By that same treaty Sitka is guaranteed to Great Britain as a free port for the term of ten years. It is a free port to-day for the Government of Great Britain. Does the gentleman deny it? Yet here he asks us to pay $7,200,000 in gold for this territory before these incumbrances are removed.

Mr. BANKS. The ten years will have expired next year.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Very well; when the incumbrance is removed it will be time enough to talk about paying this money for it. And how do you propose to remove the incumbrances on the rivers which are made free to Great Britain forever? The sailors, traders, and fishermen of Great Britain have the right to-day to go into all the interior waters of Alaska under this treaty; just the same right that our people have. Great Britain to-day has the same right on the coast of Alaska that we have, except the miserable privilege of governing the fifty, sixty, or seventy thousand wretched savages there. And yet the gentleman comes in here and coolly asks us to vote $7,200,000 in gold for this territory.

I assert that no incumbrance has been removed for which you propose to pay $200,000 additional in gold. And the only possible incumbrance that can be removed is one that is said to consist of a franchise granted to an ice company.

It is said there is an ice company on a little island near the Island of Kodiak, an ice company from San Francisco. That is the only incumbrance that can possibly be removed, if it be true that such company has any monopoly there, of which I have seen no evidence. If such company really has any monopoly there I should like to be informed if that incumbrance has been removed?

The charter of the Russian American Fur Company expired in June, 1867, so that was not one of the incumbrances that Mr. Seward had in contemplation.

The gentleman says there was no secrecy about the treaty; and he tells us with his usual eloquence why this treaty was made. He says that our citizens could not enter successfully into competition with the people of Great Britain and of Russia upon that coast. With enterprise so peculiar to them they saw it was necessary for them to have this country in order to compete successfully with the citizens of Great Britain and of Russia. Well, sir, it is a pity to destroy so much fine speaking and so much fine writing as I find in this report. But I tell you, sir, there was no such moving cause in this matter. I say, as I have said heretofore, that there was no American citizen on this continent that had ever been so insane as to propose that we should buy this territory. No man had ever dreamed that it was necessary to our salvation, as the gentleman from Massachusetts now declares it to be. I can state the whole origin of this matter. A certain person who describes himself as a native of Prince Edward's Island in the British dominions, who had been fishing down on the coast of Maine and catching cod, and had experienced the effect of your beneficent fishing bounty laws, went to the Territory of Washington and got passed by the Legislature of that Territory a memorial. I have lived in a Territory and I have lived in a State, and I know it is a very easy matter to get a memorial through a Legislature for almost any purpose. All that was necessary was for Mr. McDonald, this gentleman from Prince Edward's Island, to go before the Legislature and ask the passage of that memorial. But, sir, had that memorial proposed the purchase of Walrusia, easy as it is to get memorials passed Mr. McDonald would have been hooted out of the capital of that Territory. That Legislature did not dream of such a thing.

It appears from the document sent us by the Secretary of State that Mr. McDonald was the father of this memorial. The memorial asked for three things, namely: first, to send some of our naval ships up there to explore for fishing banks; second, that they might have the benefit of the fishing bounty laws; and third, that certain privileges might be sought from Russia.

Mr. MYERS. The gentleman has said that we already had the privilege of landing and of curing fish. I would like him to tell us whether the memorial to which he has referred did not ask the Government to procure from Russia that very privilege?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; I have said that, and say it again, and defy any man to gainsay it, that we already had these privileges. The man who got up that memorial was ignorant of the fact that we already had those privileges. If we did not exercise them it was no fault of Russia, but the fault of the climate where it rains three hundred days in the year, and where to cure fish is simply impossible. Mr. McDonald was also ignorant of the further fact that our fishing bounty laws had been repealed long before the passage of this memorial.

I find in this document, No. 177, two letters from Mr. McDonald, the father of this memorial. I cannot take time to read them; but they disclose clearly the milk in his cocoa-nut. First, he was after fishing bounties, and next he tells Secretary Welles that it will be necessary to have a large fleet on that coast since the purchase of Alaska, and that he has on Puget sound just the place for a naval station, which he would be glad to dispose of to the Government.

Now, sir, I have said that this treaty was negotiated in secret. I say it was negotiated in such a manner that the Representatives of the people might not know of it, as it was justly feared they would protest against it. The negotiation was carried on here while we were in session in March, 1867. Mr. Stoeckl, on the 25th of March, 1867, said to Mr. Seward that he would accept his proposition. The trade was closed between them, but they kept it a profound secret until our adjournment. Why? This House adjourned on the 30th of March, 1867, at twelve o'clock. On the same day was signed this treaty in Washington. I believe that signatures were withheld until after our adjournment that no remonstrance could be heard from the Representatives of the people.

I wish I had time to answer every proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts at length; but I cannot follow him in his flights of fancy. He pictured Alaska as the finest country upon the face of the earth. He declared solemnly there was no country on the face of God's earth which could support as many industries as Alaska. He said it would support one million people in more industries than any other country. He told us it was a magnificent agricultural country. If gentlemen would like through the eye to have an idea of this territory of Alaska they can look upon a photograph of Sitka which I have here, the most favorable place upon the coast. [Here Mr. WASHBURN held up a large photograph.] They have established themselves on various places, but had finally to give them up and confine themselves to Sitka. We have testimony that there are not a dozen acres of arable land in the neighborhood of Sitka, yet we are told by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that there are twelve million acres of arable land in

Ho. OF REPS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Washburn.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Alaska. He has no information of his own, and yet he undertakes to instruct us and make statements that have no foundation whatever. He has written a letter containing an "infinite deal of nothing." He has no authority for anything he says. There is not one grain of wheat in this bushel of chaff. He talks of deposits of gold. I defy any living man upon the face of the earth to produce any evidence that an ounce of gold was ever extracted from the territory of Alaska.

Sir, I do not bring in here any such kind of testimony as this afforded by Wilson, and which the friends of the treaty seemed to regard as their trump card. I bring you official reports. I am not compelled to go out hunting for adventures from which to manufacture testimony to prove that Alaska is a vile country. No, sir, I quote official documents. Mr. Wilson has volunteered his service on this matter. I believe he has lately been made for this service or some other a doctor of philosophy. Now, Dr. Wilson sends us a letter. I will not criticise as I think it deserves, but the mildest thing I can say, and that I must say or not discharge my duty, is that there is not a word of truth in that letter from beginning to end. I defy Mr. Wilson or any other man to substantiate any statement in that letter. Mr. Robert J. Walker quotes Mr. Wilson to prove how much arable land is there, and the great value of the country in other respects. We have Wilson quoting Blodgett, Walker quoting Wilson, and between them all we have not a solitary fact that can be traced to any reliable source. I am not going to quote any such kind of testimony as that. I have testimony here that is reputable and from a reliable source, to which I must invite your attention.

Now, sir, I will not go back to the time of the early explorations and show you the opinions of those explorers in regard to Alaska. It would take more time than is allowed me. But, sir, they all bear the same testimony. And it is not testimony of the character of the gentleman's friend from Idaho, formerly from Alaska, who found a tree there three feet in diameter lying upon the ground, overgrown by another tree of about the same size, and yet the first tree was as sound as when it was standing in the forest. That is the kind of statement the gentleman from Massachusetts asks us to receive; and yesterday when I asked him where he found his facts, he turned to me with apparent indignation, as though I was asking what I had no right to have answered, and said, "The gentleman would not believe though one should rise from the dead." Is that the way to treat a question of this sort? Sir, these are substantial questions, and if the gentleman has got any testimony I want him to produce it. When I asked him to show where there was any gold, he read a statement from some Frenchman fifteen years ago, who had never been there, but reasoning from analogy, because there was gold in Siberia, he said there was no doubt gold, silver, diamonds, rubies, amethysts, sapphires, and everything precious on or in the earth would be found in Alaska. But, sir, none of these things have ever been found, and I defy any man in this House or on the face of the earth to produce any testimony that the precious metals have ever been found there.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the gentleman's time be extended indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman allow me to state a fact?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; I am in pursuit of knowledge.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to state a fact bearing upon the argument in relation to the use of rivers. The St. John river is the boundary line between Maine and New Brunswick for about one hundred miles. Its largest tributaries rise in our State. Great Britain never acknowledged; and we never had the use of the lower waters of that river until the treaty of 1842, in which we bought the qualified use of that stream by giving up a very large area of territory belonging to the State of Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. We parted with $15,000,000 worth of land, and the Government of the United States gave us $150,000 for it.

Mr. PETERS. We have not got it yet, but expect it in an appropriation bill from the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I was aware of the fact stated by my friend from Maine, and it only proves what I have before asserted as the usages of other nations. Great Britain has the right to forever navigate the rivers of Alaska, though you pay Russia $200,000 to be clear of that incumbrance.

Now, my friend from Massachusetts gets up here and coolly tells us, and from the earnestness with which he appeals to the House gentlemen will give him credit for the sincerity of his declarations, that there are over twelve million acres of arable land in Alaska, and that it is capable of sustaining a thrifty and happy population of over one million freemen. Now, sir, without resorting to that kind of testimony that he has brought in, I have official documents from St. Petersburg of a date no longer ago than August last. Mr. Seward, dear soul, in his simplicity of heart, wrote to Mr. Clay to ascertain what system of disposing of lands prevailed in Alaska. Well, Mr. Clay submitted that letter to the Russian Cabinet, and I think I see them reading it, and they must have had a very jolly time of it at the expense of the Secretary of State. Here is the answer they gave. The following is the title of the paper, and it is signed "Kostlietsov, Actual State Counselor:"

Translation of the Russian memorandum marked A A. by S. N. Buznitsky.

"Explanatory memorandum in answer to the communication of the ministry of foreign affairs, department of interior relations, dated August 31, 1867, No. 5790, pursuant to the communication addressed by Hon. W. H. Seward, Secretary of State, August 6, 1867, to St. Petersburg, to the American envoy near the imperial court."

After alluding to the question submitted, the counselor goes on to say:

"The native population of each separate island is so insignificant that the inhabitants of any one could not meet with the slightest cause of collision of interest in the use of lands; in addition to this, the soil itself being perfectly barren and unfit either for agricultural or grazing purposes, there was no reason why the natives should endeavor to extend the limits of their lands."

"There was even less ground for the enactment of any particular regulations in view of immigrant settlers. Who can ever have a mind to settle in that country, where permanent fogs and dampness of atmosphere and want of solar heat and light, leaving out of the question anything like agriculture, make it impossible to provide even a sufficient supply of hay for cattle, and where man, from want of bread, salt, and meat, to escape scurvy must constantly live upon fish, berries, shell-fish, sea-cabbages, and other products of the sea, soaking them profusely with the grease of sea beasts. The Aleutian Islands may attract transient traders, but no permanent settlers; to inhabit them one must be an Aleute; and if it were not for the sea surrounding the islands, this country, owing to its unfavorable climatic conditions and the sterility of its ground, would have never been inhabited at all; and, therefore, the American Government will have, as the Russian Imperial Government had, to protect the local natives against arbitrary taking of possession and violence, not in the interior of the islands, but from sea, because unsparing foreigners, prompted by avaricious hope of easy temporary gain, will, before all, endeavor to take advantage of the local population, which, being scarce, and rather fond of strong drink, will not long resist temptation, and shall perish, together with all those branches of trade for which islanders alone are fit, and particularly the Aleutes, these ancient, permanent, and practiced inhabitants of the ocean."

This is the paradise which we heard depicted in such eloquent terms yesterday, and I was almost led to believe that the generally received account we have that the Garden of Eden was on the green banks of the Euphrates was a mistake, and that the paradise of our first parents was really on "Oonalaska's shore."

But the counselor goes on to state further in regard to the continent:

"Such is, in general features, the character of the Russian American continent. From all what we said it clearly appears that in this region no attempts were ever made, and no necessity ever occurred to introduce any system of land-ownership; the country occupied by savages is too vast; they use to camp in certain fit places, generally marked by mountains, rivers, and streams, each having its name, but no fixed boundaries whatever, and their migrations are guided by wild instinct and unbounded will. All this region has neither past nor present, and it may be confidently said of the future, that it is far and impenetrable."

This is the delightful country where a million of freemen are to settle.

Mr. BLAINE. Who wrote that?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. A member of the Russian Cabinet.

Mr. BLAINE. Was it before or after the bargain for the purchase was made?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. After the bargain was made. He goes on:

"Every attempt of civilizing that country will stumble against unconquerable obstacles; the complete absence of local topography, the wild character of the savages, and no less wild character of nature; but, above all, the rigor and inconstancy of climate. To achieve any good results for the future of that country, by means of conquest and violence, would hardly be possible; to drive the savages further into the interior of the American continent, however difficult, would be possible; but this plan will be connected with irrecoverable money and material losses; the more so, that a civilized population will never be attracted to that country; there can be expected speculators, but no permanent settlers; there can be expected no civilized population, no permanent industry, but rather spoilers of the natives, and predatory working out of the riches as well on the surface as in the womb of the earth. Such system can devastate, but not organize the country."

This is what the acting counselor at St. Petersburg says of it. And this is the country which the gentleman from Massachusetts is so eloquent in praise of, and which he says is worth a thousand times the amount we have paid for it.

Again he says:

"To civilize the savages would seem to be a surer, although a more difficult, way of turning to account the country and its population. This could be effected by two means, working at the same time: by acquainting the natives with objects of material comfort and luxury, as, for instance, the use of bread, tea, and wearing ornaments, and by imparting to them religious instruction; but, to this last end, missionaries familiar with the local dialects are wanted. This system was lately adopted by the Russian American Company for the colonies nearest to the port of New Archangel, and although a decisive result was not yet attained, a visible progress in the intercourse with the natives was effected, so that Caloshes, one of the most savage and unyielding tribes, came to work in New Archangel, a fact which never happened before."

Well, I must pause. I have read enough to show you the opinion they have of this country at St. Petersburg. There is much more of the same sort. And yet Mr. Blodgett volunteers to say that there are twelve million acres of arable land there and Mr. Wilson sends in that statement, taking good care not to indorse it, but leaving us to infer that he does so.

Now, I wish to call attention to the machinery that has been brought to bear to carry this treaty through.

Mr. RAUM. May I ask the gentleman whether the description he has just read of the Aleutian Islands will apply to the whole coast?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. It applies to the whole country, only more so.

Mr. RAUM. It is a fair description of the whole purchase?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes; the description applies to the whole country.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman passes from the agricultural capabilities of this territory I desire to ask him a question. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] to say that he did not rely for his case on human testimony but upon the immutable laws of Nature.

Mr. BANKS. My statement was that we had evidence of the value of this territory

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Washburn.

HO. OF REPS.

apart from human witnesses, and we were not obliged to rely on what men said in regard to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Well, that is only introductory to a question which I propose to ask, and that is this: in view of the meteorological table embodied in the report of the gentleman from Massachusetts himself, showing that during the summer months it rains about twenty-three days in every month, I ask is not that condition of things entirely at war with the idea of any agricultural capabilities, and this by the law of nature?

Mr. BANKS. The testimony of our own citizens who have gone to the territory since the purchase is conclusive and irresistible in regard to its agricultural capabilities.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I shall come to that directly. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the testimony of the persons who have visited that coast since the purchase is irresistible in regard to agricultural capabilities, and fully sustains what I have said. The gentleman from Massachusetts stood up here and stated to the House that according to the best authority there were twelve million acres of arable land in Alaska. Now I ask the gentleman whether Colonel Bulkley is good authority?

Mr. BANKS. He is good authority.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I will refer to his testimony in a moment. The southern boundary of Alaska is 54° 40'. From that point north to Mount St. Elias, a distance of three hundred miles, Russia owned a strip of land only thirty miles wide. On the whole of this narrow strip there are not a hundred acres of arable land. Sir George Simpson states that in passing from the southern border up to Sitka he could not find in the whole distance level ground enough for the establishment of a fort. So it is until you get up to Mount St. Elias, which is in latitude 60° or a little more. Now, sir, Colonel Bulkley, who my friend from Massachusetts says is good authority, says:

"North of Bristol bay all hopes of successful agriculture must be abandoned. The soil only thaws to the depth of about nine inches, below which we have dug twenty feet through the ice of ages without finding its limit."

Nearly all of Alaska is north of the latitude of Bristol bay, except the peninsula, which is known to be composed of rocks or almost inaccessible mountains. According to this report, which the gentleman from Massachusetts says is a truthful one, there is no agricultural land north of Bristol bay, and if you look at the map you will see that there is very little land south of Bristol bay, agricultural or otherwise.

But, sir, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the influences that have been brought to bear to induce this House to vote this appropriation. It dates back to the time when the treaty was first negotiated. I believe I state nothing more than the fact when I say that the Secretary of State did not act entirely upon his own judgment when he bought this territory. I believe the fact to be that when he conceived the idea of purchasing it he telegraphed to General Halleck, at San Francisco, to inquire of him how much it would do to pay for Alaska, and General Halleck replied that it would answer to pay from five to ten million dollars. Mr. Seward thought it would not be quite right to offer the smallest sum; so he split the difference and offered $7,000,000.

The treaty having been negotiated, it became necessary to get it through the Senate; and the first piece of machinery is a telegram from General Halleck, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, April 4, 1867.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

I learn from a gentleman who has recently visited many parts of Russian America that its value is greater than has been supposed. The rejection of the treaty will cause great dissatisfaction on this coast, especially in California.

H. W. HALLECK, Major General.

This dispatch was instantly made public here to operate on the Senate. It will be observed that he says that its rejection would cause great dissatisfaction in California. How could he know that? No man in California or Washington not behind the scenes knew that any such scheme was on foot on the 4th day of April, the date of his dispatch. Yet immediately after the treaty had been negotiated, and while it was pending before the Senate, General Halleck telegraphs that the California coast is immensely anxious that this treaty should be ratified. Now, sir, there is no evidence produced that any desire for this acquisition existed on the Pacific coast, either at the time the treaty was negotiated or now. A leading Republican paper of California, one of the ablest if not the ablest in the State, the Sacramento Union, as late as November last speaks of the treaty in very contemptuous terms, calls Alaska a terra incognita, and says:

"That persons well informed as to Alaska are ungrateful enough to hint that we could have bought a much superior elephant in Siam or Bombay for one hundredth part of the money, with not a ten thousandth part of the expense incurred in keeping the animal in proper condition."

Well, the treaty was ratified. The next piece of machinery was another telegram from General Halleck; and this bears upon the agricultural question. Two days before we met last November General Halleck sends a telegram on here stating that it is very necessary to have the land surveyed upon the peninsula of Kenay, as agricultural settlers would be going there. Of course, this dispatch was not intended to have any effect upon Congress, which was to meet two days thereafter. But the importance of having these lands surveyed at once and in mid-winter, in latitude 65°, in the interests of agriculture, could not be overlooked or the information wait the slow progress of the mails. For the benefit of the agriculturists who are invited to Cook's inlet and Prince William's sound by the general commanding on the Pacific coast, I will set before them the entertainment to which they are invited. I quote from the report of Professor Davidson:

"Tebenkoff (1848) gives a dark picture of the appearance and climate of Prince William's sound, calling it desolate, gloomy, and deserted; surrounded by rocks and pine forests, mountains covered with eternal snow, and enveloped in perpetual fog or invisible with drizzling rain. Rain falls sometimes for a whole month; and there are not more than sixty or ninety sunny days in the year. During the months of July and August the thermometer showed 59° on fair days and 40° on rainy days. The frost in winter is very severe, but of short duration, for the south winds change it suddenly to thaw and rain."

The peninsula of Kenay is between Cook's inlet and Prince William's sound, and is the land which General Halleck wants to have surveyed in the interest of agriculture; and they all concede that this land thus described by Tebenkoff is the best land they have in the territory.

The gentleman from Massachusetts spoke of the correspondence that had been written from Alaska. He said we would be charmed with it if we could read it. Mr. Seward has sent us this correspondence, and it is bound up in this volume. In my report I took occasion to quote from a correspondent of the Alta Californian; and in consequence Mr. Robert J. Walker has seen fit to attack me in the article to which I have already referred, denouncing me as guilty of "vulgarity and blasphemy."

The quotation which I made and which so excited this irritable little gentleman was from the Alta Californian—a part of the correspondence which the gentleman from Massachusetts says we would all be charmed to read—one of the letters which Mr. Seward sent to this House. If it was fit for Mr. Seward to send to this House, certainly it was fit for me to incorporate in a report without subjecting myself to the charge of blasphemy.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts says that this correspondence is "charming," and as Mr. Seward has thought it fit to lay it before this House, I will accept any censure that the public may visit upon me for having quoted one of these correspondents in my report. The correspondence which I quoted I again quote, that all except Mr. Walker may be equally charmed with the gentleman from Massachusetts. In quoting it I will say that I in no way indorse the form of expression of the honest Celt, though it is difficult to see how a more forcible expression could be made in regard to the country in so small a compass. It is from the correspondent of the Alta Californian, and is dated Sitka, October 25, 1867, and is found in Executive Documents before named:

"Meanwhile the weather has been unremittingly dubious. It was well the ceremonies of the transfer were held immediately on the arrival of the commissioners. Since then there has not been an hour of pleasant weather. In a word, reader, Sitka is the region of incessant storms, dripping forests, dank masses, dense mud, and drifting mists. There Pluvius reigns with undisputed sway. It is the paradise of ducks and sea-gulls, of salmon and shell-fish. Three Arizona miners, disgusted with the aridity of that sunny region, and yearning for the sight of a cloud, if no bigger than a man's hand, decided last June to come to Sitka. They arrived just in time to enjoy the delightful humidity of August, the rainfall averaging about an inch daily. The desire of their souls has been satisfied. This opens the way for me to say a few things upon the subject of

"We have now been here seventeen days. Of those, one was sunny, two cloudy, without rain, seven partially, and seven constantly rainy. According to the Russian meteorological tables, the average amount of rain falling the past fourteen years has been eighty-five and two third inches annually, a little less than Senator SUMNER's figures. May, June, July, January, and February are the driest months. All the rest are rainy, and August, October, December, and March intensely so. According to the measurement of Mr. Treskovsky, of the Russian observatory, over twenty-one inches of rain fell during last August. On the 26th of that month he reports a fall of three inches. When the sun does break through the clouds it is laughable to see the cattle, dogs, cats, and hens, as well as humans, seek the brief sunshine, and bask in its transient warmth."

"These constant rains are especially annoying to the soldiers. Since the transfer of the territory they have been detailed from the steamer, twenty-five at a time, to serve on guard about town. Returning last night, after a four hours' endurance of the pitiless storm, one honest Celt, as he came dripping from the boat up the gangway, vented his indignation by exclaiming, 'Be Jesus, who bought this country? It wasn't me!'"

Mr. Chairman, I am astonished that the gentleman has not alluded to any of the authorities in this book. I make no statement I cannot give the chapter and verse for. I do not ask you to take my word, or the manufactured testimony of adventurers picked up on the street. I consult the official documents sent here by the State Department. In December last I called for information as to what the State Department knew about this country. In answer they sent us this book. It shows that at the time they negotiated this treaty they absolutely knew nothing about Russian America. After the treaty was negotiated Captain Howard, of the revenue service, was sent up to explore. He was told to look for fishing banks, for coal, and for precious metals. I have his report here. It is lengthy, and I shall not be able to quote from it to any extent. Captain Howard, according to instructions, proceeded to San Francisco, and in the steam revenue-cutter Lincoln sailed for Sitka and Russian America on the 20th of July. On the 30th they arrived at what they supposed was the southern extremity of the territory. Captain Howard says in his first report, dated Sitka, August 17, 1867:

"Being aware that this was almost unknown territory, it was necessary, in order to work understandingly, to determine the boundary line. Finding that it was also the desire of Professor Pierce and Mr. Davidson to observe for that object here, I readily consented."

"Having remained six days without the least prospect of obtaining a sight at the sun or stars, we, on the 10th, at daylight, steamed for Fort Simpson into Chatham straits, through Dixon passage, en route outside to Sitka. It was our desire to verify the headlands of Prince of Wales, Ken, and Bancroft Islands, this passage being our boundary, in accordance with the treaty between England and Russia."

HO. OF REPS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Washburn.

40TH CONG., 2D SESS.

The rain and fog, however, prevented our getting anything more than an imperfect bearing, without any observations; in fact, to this port it was so thick on our arrival in the bay of Sitka that we anchored without knowing our position in reference to the town. When the weather cleared sufficiently to show it to us, bearing north by northwest, four miles distant, we immediately got under way, and at ten a. m., August 12, moored ship off the town of Sitka. A boat, with the Governor's aid and captain of the port, came alongside with the compliments of the port.

"I fill up with coals and water here, and proceed direct to Oonalaska Island, in obedience to instructions; but I regret to say that, from information I have received from the prince and officers of the Russian American Fur Company, as well as captains trading in steamers on the coast, the coals on all the Aleutian Islands are too light, with too much residuum, for steaming purposes. The Russian American Fur Company gave up the attempted use of them long since, and obtained all their coals from Vancouver's Island."

Mr. BANKS. As the gentleman from Wisconsin refers to the testimony of Professor Davidson, I will ask to have an extract of a letter from him read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Give me the page, and I will find it.

Mr. BANKS. I will send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I object to that letter being read. Anything Professor Davidson has reported officially I do not object to having read. But I am opposed to the reading of any of this manufactured testimony recently got up for the purpose of getting through the treaty.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman asked for testimony as to coal in Alaska, and I have given it.

Mr. MUGEN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for four minutes to make a proposition which I think will be acceptable.

Mr. WASHBURN. I cannot yield now. I will refer presently to Mr. Davidson's report, made after his return from Alaska; but at present I wish to attend to Captain Howard.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will allow Mr. Davidson's letter to be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Well, as my friend from Massachusetts has shown anxiety to have the extract of the letter of Professor Davidson read, I will yield for that purpose. It is so seldom he produces any authority I like to oblige him, though his authority should prove nothing.

The Clerk read as follows:

"At Coal Harbor, on Unga Island, Graham harbor in Cook's inlet, and one locality in Chatham strait, the company had opened veins of lignite for fuel for their steamers, but the results were unfavorable and operations abandoned. At Tehugatchek bay, in Cook's inlet, there is a seven-foot seam of true coal, but it has not been worked, as I understand. It crops out at or near low water, and would require greater expense and more engineering talent than the company commanded. This out-crop exhibits itself at intervals for twenty miles along the shore toward the northwest. My party discovered water worn pieces of coal much intermixed with foreign substances for four or five miles along the head of a stream, coming through a heavy forest, and opening upon a fine bay. An examination of the specimens proves it bituminous, but the bed or beds from which it is broken will, when discovered, afford coal of vastly superior quality to any heretofore known to exist on the Pacific coast. Coal for steamship purposes is the great desideratum of the Pacific. With a supply of good coal within the distance of Sitka from San Francisco, California, Oregon and Washington will at once be relieved from the necessity of freighting their coal from fourteen thousand five hundred to seventeen thousand five hundred miles, at a cost to the consumer of twenty dollars per ton in gold. Appreciating this great drawback, and impressed by the analysis of the specimens we obtained and all the favorable geological indications, I have urged the importance of a special and exhaustive exploration of the locality."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the reading of that letter, and I hesitate not to assert that there is no proof contained therein that there is a vein of coal any where in Alaska. Mr. Davidson does not pretend that he ever saw a vein of coal there. He says in his report, speaking on that subject, that he is informed there is coal there. He says in his letter, just read, that coal is worth twenty dollars a ton in gold. Is it possible that a seven-foot vein of coal exists on Cook's inlet, and not opened while coal is worth twenty dollars a ton? The statement is preposterous. It is on a par with another letter that I have here by a Mr. Ballou, which I will read. One W. T. Ballou, of San Francisco, wrote the Secretary as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, September 7, 1867.

MY DEAR SIR: Since my last with inclosures a vessel arrived in this port from Kodiak. The following is a copy of a letter received by me:

"Mr. BALLOU: We beg to inform you that we have at last found the seam of coal that we have hunted so long—no thanks to the R. A. Co. It is wonderful, over thirty feet deep, pure anthracite; we trace it one mile; good harbor; oak and fir timber. Our fortune is made; thanks to you alone. We hope to see you soon. A. & G. MARSH."

The above is verbatim. This is only one instance of the great mineral resources of that country. I know of others more astonishing, and had I funds sufficient, quickly would I develop astonishing facts that would soon make Alaska in many respects vie with almost any portion of our country; but, as I said in my first letter to you, it is no agricultural country. Its minerals, fish, and furs, are enough.

Should I not be honored by a Government position, as applied for in my last, and some of your eastern capitalists want to form a company whose capital shall be $100,000 or more, I will take $10,000 of stock and manage the affair so as to double the money in two years or I'll lose my head. To do this will require immediate attention and no delay, as the ground must be occupied before the immigration floods in. My reference can be had and money at any time required. As I suppose I am wearying your patience I close till some reply.

Yours, W. T. BALLOU.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

It will be seen hereafter that Captain Howard, of the revenue service, was at Kodiak after this pretended coal discovery, and though constantly looking out for coal, failed either to discover or hear of any on that island.

There is also another letter to the Secretary in this book from another man that tells a wonderful story, almost equal to that of the gentleman from Idaho. He says he has discovered a stream of pure verdigris in Alaska.

Mr. Chairman, I have been furnished by a gallant gentleman, (a native of that country which has been absorbed by Russia; a gentleman who served gallantly and faithfully in our Army, and whom it was my pleasure to know during the war, while he was serving on the staff of one of our most accomplished commanders,) with a translation of some Russian documents on this subject.

Before, however, alluding to them, I wish to call attention to the concluding passage of Captain Howard's report, as I find that my time will compel me to dismiss him without further notice. This modern Jason, who was sent up to Alaska in pursuit of the golden fleece—

Mr. BLAINE. And came back shorn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, and came back shorn, if we may judge by the conclusion of his report, which is as follows:

"On the 18th of November Captain Howard arrived in San Francisco. He says:

"Thus ended the observatory cruise of the Lincoln. Regretting that so little has been effected, by the lateness of the season and the extremely boisterous and rainy weather," "I beg leave, however, to bear testimony to the untiring exertions of Mr. Davidson and Coast Survey party to accomplish an almost impossibility. For many days and nights they watched in vain for sun, moon, and stars, which led us almost to believe that neither ever had been or would be seen."

I will now refer to the translation of the Russian document, being a description of that country. Captain Golovin, of the Russian navy, was sent out in 1860 and 1861, and made a report to the high admiral, Duke Constantine. I will read a passage for the satisfaction of my friend who has seen a man who saw a tree in Alaska three feet in diameter, that was prone upon the ground inclosed by the roots of another tree of the same size, and yet the first tree was as sound as when growing in the forest.

Mr. PETERS. Was the man who saw the tree named Munchausen?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have forgotten his name. It sounded to me something like that. But I think Baron Munchausen never got off anything so good as that. Superintendent Chlebinkow (part 3, p. 95) states that:

"The houses, barracks, and other buildings, constructed under Baranow, who took possession of Sitka in 1805, were all rotten, and had to be rebuilt in 1817."

All the buildings rotted down in twelve years, so you will see how exceedingly probable is the tree story with roots fastening to the ground another tree perfectly sound that fell three hundred years ago. If the report of Captain Howard is not flattering, that of Dr. Kellogg, the botanist of the expedition, is hardly more so. He says:

"Unfortunately, this vast region of islands and continental coasts is not bordered at the bases of these lofty timbered ranges with sloping or level bottoms; but is gashed with precipitous and inaccessible gorges, the peaks, for the most part, being capped with snow, which, melting in summer, together with the continual rains, makes every rockless footstep a sphagnum, miry morass. Altitude passes for naught here; even the mountains are miry to their tops."

Professor Davidson says of the sphagnum here spoken of as—"One of the main features of Alaska. It is described as a thick moss, seldom less than a foot and sometimes three feet deep, and covers the whole face of the country from the middle of Vancouver's Island to the end of the Aleutian Islands. It forms a soft cushion into which the traveler sinks at least to his boot-top at every step; and in this moist climate the sphagnum is always soaking wet."

In regard to minerals, the geologist of the expedition, Mr. Blake, says that "exaggerated ideas have been formed of the mineral wealth of Alaska." None of these gentlemen succeeded in finding mineral wealth of any kind there, although they were constantly in pursuit of it. Exaggerated reports in regard to this country in reference to its furs have been circulated.

Now, I assert—and I have the facts and figures to prove it—that the fur trade is becoming rapidly exhausted, and that the total value of all the furs gathered in Alaska is considerably less than two hundred thousand dollars a year, and is diminishing from year to year with great rapidity.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if he includes in that the seal-fur trade?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; and I will give the gentleman some figures.

Mr. MAYNARD. My information is quite different from that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I am aware of that. There has been a studied effort to deceive the public in regard to the value of this country and its different industries. Mr. Wilson in his letter says that the value of the fur seals alone is over half a million annually. I can show you that all these statements, if not false, have been much exaggerated. The total dividends of this fur company from 1850 to 1859 was 1,334,000 roubles, or an average of 133,000 roubles a year, (the rouble is equal to seventy-five cents of our money,) and only about four per cent. on the capital of the company. The total annual value of all furs gathered in Alaska does not exceed $200,000 a year. Official tables to be found in part No. 2, Document 177, verify this statement. Mr. Bulkeley says that the seal fisheries alone could be made to pay for Alaska. He admits himself that unless the seal fisheries are protected as the Russians protected them they will not last any length of time. And Professor Davidson says that with the utmost care on the part of the Russian authorities the furs and fur-bearing animals have rapidly diminished from year to year. With the transfer to this Government, and the consequent invasion of the country by our people, it can safely be said that the fur trade will soon cease to exist. Under the Russian system they only captured about thirty-three thousand seals a year, which, at three dollars a piece, their highest value, is $99,000; and yet we are told that the seal trade will pay for the whole purchase. Now, if under the Russian system, they received less than $100,000 a year for the fur seals captured, how long would it take to pay off this debt of $7,200,000? It is a good deal like the sum that used to be in the arithmetic about the frog at the bottom of the well jumping up two feet and falling back three feet each day, and about the time that the frog would get to the surface you would pay off this debt from the fur seal trade.

I have already spoken too long and feel that I am trespassing upon the patience of the House, but I have by no means exhausted the subject. There are a great many more important facts that ought to be made known to the House and the public. I want to speak farther about the fur trade, but I will append some official tables in the Globe and pass to the fisheries. I do not undertake to say that there are no fish at Alaska, but I do say, that so far as we know the fishing banks on that coast are of the most uncertain character.

On the 22d of August Captain Howard steamed out of the harbor of Sitka, destined for Kodiak and Aleutian Islands, sounding on the way for fishing banks, "in accordance with the wishes of the Department." He says:

"I reluctantly gave up the search. I want to not pretend to say that there are no such banks."

At Kodiak he found but one Russian and one German. The rest of the inhabitants were Aleutians. He afterward found one fishing bank, and its position was ascertained by Mr. Davidson, but I assert here that that fishing bank is not within the limits of the jurisdiction of Russian America. The gentleman from Massachusetts cannot point to a fishing bank on the coast of Russian America within the limits of the jurisdiction of Russia. I defy him to do it by any testimony. Captain Howard says these fishing banks are kept secret. He asks us to believe that they are there, but he says they are kept secret, an observation upon which I do not care to comment.

In regard to salmon we read of such immense numbers up those streams, that they are driven up on the shores, forming winrows three feet in depth, and that they sell for seven cents a pound in gold, and we are also informed that the bears come down from the mountains to feed upon them, their dainty appetites selecting only the heads, rejecting the other parts of the salmon altogether. This is told in the report of the majority of the committee, and we are gravely asked to believe it, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated substantially the same in his speech, and gave us the philosophy of it. Wilson, the philosopher, must look to his laurels.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that there are many salmon in the rivers of Alaska. That is also the case in regard to the rivers of Washington Territory and Oregon. Inexhaustible numbers of salmon annually visit the rivers, sounds, and bays of our western coast, and we have now no occasion, and will have no occasion for a hundred years to come, to visit the rivers of Alaska for salmon.

The gentleman from Massachusetts also quotes the testimony of Captain Bryant, who says that Behring sea is an immense reservoir for codfish. Yet Colonel Bulkley, of the telegraphic expedition, whom my friend from Massachusetts says is good authority, says there are few or no codfish in Behring sea, and he, too, gives the "philosophy" why codfish do not exist up in that sea.

There is one other subject that I ought to speak of, and that is the timber of this region. I will only say that it does not exist to any extent on the Aleutian Islands, nor north of Cook's inlet, and that what there is on the inaccessible mountains that skirt the coast south of Mount St. Elias, and along a strip of country but thirty miles wide. Professor Davidson is forced to say that—

"While the vast forests of wood exist upon the waters of Puget sound, Admiralty inlet, and Straits of Fuca, it may be commercially unprofitable to cut and ship even this yellow cedar to the California market, unless native labor can be obtained at low rates to get it out."

Now, I think, Mr. Chairman, I have pretty clearly demonstrated the utter worthlessness of this Alaska territory. You are not simply asked to appropriate $7,200,000 in gold for a worthless country—if we could get off with that I might, perhaps, be content to submit to it—but with this $7,200,000 come the annual expenses of this Territory, in my judgment amounting to several million dollars a year, with no corresponding return.

I have no means of showing how much money we have expended in Alaska up to this time; but I undertake to say it will count by millions. We have had several war ships there, and a portion of our Army has been there supported at an immense expense.

You will recollect, Mr. Chairman, that I called attention to the agency of a gallant general on the Pacific coast in forcing this purchase upon the country. I will now read from a letter of his of May 22, 1867, to the Adjutant General of the Army, in which he gives his opinion as to how much this country will cost us. After we had acquired it he began to see its true character. He says:

"This country and the adjacent British territory contains a very large Indian population, some of whose tribes are warlike, and of a character far superior to those of Oregon, California, Nevada, and adjacent countries. Should our Indian system, with its treaties, annuities, agents, frauds, and peculations, be introduced there, Indian wars must inevitably follow, and instead of a few companies for its military occupation, as many regiments will be called for, with the resulting expenditure of many million dollars every year."

General Halleck says if certain things take place, which we know will take place, there will be a resulting expenditure of several millions a year; and that he is badly frightened at what he has helped to accomplish is evident from his instructions to General Davis, commanding our troops at Sitka. He gives him to understand that these Indians are a pretty savage set, and that he had better look out. He says:

"It may be well to have guns charged with grape and canister always bearing on their village ready at an instant's warning to destroy them."

Such are the kind of inhabitants you acquire with Alaska. It is said this is only a little sum; only $7,200,000. Yes, sir; it is only $7,200,000. But let me tell gentlemen that if they pass this appropriation it will be but a few days before you will hear of the ratification by the Senate of the treaty for the purchase of St. Thomas; and if the doctrine of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] obtains here, you cannot avoid paying $7,500,000 more for the purchase of St. Thomas. Now, the gentleman will not say that St. Thomas is not as valuable a purchase as Alaska. If we pay for Alaska we shall pay for St. Thomas.

But are we to stop with the purchase of Alaska and St. Thomas? No, sir. I believe a treaty is now being negotiated with Denmark for the purchase of Greenland and Iceland. [Laughter.] Well, gentlemen, laugh at it. I tell gentlemen who go for Alaska that Greenland to-day is a better purchase. And the man who votes for Alaska must vote for Greenland or he will be an inconsistent man. This is not mere loose talk. I have had placed upon my table since I began to speak to-day some pages of a document now printing at the Government Printing Office for the State Department, which shows that the purchase of Greenland is in contemplation.

Mr. HIGBY. Was it written by Professor Davidson?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. No, sir. I have but a few leaves of the document, and have not had time to look even at them. But upon glancing over them at this moment I observe a letter from Robert J. Walker, who figures wherever there is any territory to be bought, or any money to be appropriated to pay for it. Here are full descriptions of Iceland and Greenland. Gentlemen laugh at this; I tell them it is a serious thing. And if they do not believe it, I will read a few paragraphs, beginning with a letter from Hon. R. J. Walker to Mr. Seward:

"WASHINGTON CITY, April 24, 1868.

"SIR: When you did me the honor last summer to call my attention to the treaty negotiated by you with Denmark, by which we acquired the important islands of St. Thomas and St. John, I ventured to suggest to you the propriety of obtaining from the same Power Greenland, and probably Iceland also. You thought the suggestion worthy of serious consideration, and requested me to communicate to you in writing my views and the facts on the subject, that they might be on the files of the Department and ready for use whenever the question might be considered hereafter by the Government. In compliance with that request this report is made."

Further on, in speaking of Iceland, he says it has "fields beautifully green, mountains clothed in purple heath, and the atmosphere is of astonishing purity." Glancing further along I discover a report of Benjamin M. Pierce, of Harvard College, indorsed by the learned Professor Benjamin Pierce, superintendent of the Coast Survey. Professor Pierce discovers in Iceland "the sure promise of a rich prosperity." But, Mr. Chairman, I must pause; the more I say the more it seems necessary to say, for the subject is inexhaustible, and as I proceed new reasons are constantly arising to fortify the opinions I have before expressed, and though I may be threatened, as I was by the gentleman from Massachusetts, with the vengeance of the people if I opposed this measure, I say to him that he need give himself no uneasiness on my account. Men talk about "manifest destiny," and assure us that we are destined to absorb this entire continent, and the idea seems so grand that no one feels inclined to count the cost or inquire into consequences. When that day comes we shall cease to be the "United States," but "States dissevered, discordant, belligerent." Sir, I will be no party to the inauguration of this policy you now propose, of acquiring remote and worthless possessions at the expense of my constituents, and to them I appeal for my justification.

The following is the translation of Russian authorities, referred to in the speech of Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin:

Russian Views and Estimates of the Value and Resources of the Russian-American Possessions.

The Russian-American possessions were explored and inspected at various times by parties sent for that purpose from St. Petersburg, and several of the reports of these exploring and inspecting expeditions were published by the naval department at St. Petersburg.

The following are some of the principal Russian materials about the Russian colonies, to wit:

Admiral Ludke's cruise round the world. Captain B. M. Golovin's account of his explorations in 1809, 1810, and 1811, published by the department of the navy in the appendix to the Naval Collection, (Morskoi Sbornik,) 1861, St. Petersburg.

Report of Superintendent Chlebnikov, of the Russian-American Company's service, published in part three of appendix to the Naval Collection, 1861.

Captain Zagoskin's explorations of the rivers Kwichpak and Kusowen, published by the Imperial Geographical Society, 1842.

Captain Tebenkow's Hydrographical Atlas of the Russian coast on the Pacific, accompanied by an explanatory text, published in Now Archangel and St. Petersburg.

Report of Captain P. Golovin to the High Admiral Grand Duc Constantin, of his inspection as imperial commissioner in Russian America in 1860 and 1861, published in the Naval Collection for January, 1862.

All of these writers were high officials, and their descriptions of the country are official reports made to the authorities in St. Petersburg. They all complain about the violent storms which reign throughout these regions, and complain about the inclemency of climate in the colonies. And all these writers came there from St. Petersburg, which has not been blessed with a very genial climate, their constant complaints are the more remarkable. In all these writings repeated mention is made of the thick, continuous fogs which render navigation extremely perilous.

HO. OF REPS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Butler.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Captain Tebenkow, who published the atlas of the country, speaks of the want of proper places for the landing of vessels on the continent; that the water is so deep close to the shore as to render it impossible to anchor, while at the mouth of the two large rivers, Kwichpak and Kuskowen, a line of shoals extends from Stuart Island to the Cape of Good News.

And Captain Zagoskin, who was sent to explore these rivers for three years, reports that he could not discover any channel over this line of shoals for the passage of vessels.

Captain Golowin states that the bays on the Aleutian Islands are unprotected and rendered perilous by projecting boulders and submerged rocks, added to which fogs prevail continually during the summer and autumn, and in winter and spring the bays are filled with floating ice.

In regard to the soil, climate, and vegetation, Captain Golowin states: "The islands of the Russian-American colonies are in general of volcanic formation; the elevated portions disclose on the surface granite, volcanic clay, and petrified shells, but the generality of the country presents large surfaces of 'thundra,' swamps covered with moss, and of morass. The tops of mountains are all covered with perpetual snow. On the Aleutian Islands there is no timber."—P. 28.

The attempt made in 1808 to plant trees on these islands proved a complete failure. The climate on the island is in reality the most unfavorable. Rain and fog reign continually. Clear days are very few. On the Kenai bay the cold is extremely severe. Berries on Kodiak are palatable, but those on Sitka are watery and without taste. On Kodiak potatoes and turnips are cultivated in gardens, but cabbage never forms heads. The experiments of raising rye have all been failures.—P. 27.

It is difficult to make any hay on account of the continuity of the wet season in summer.—P. 54.

As regards ship-timber, Captain Golowin states, on page 71: "New ships are but seldom built here and only small crafts, because it is more easy and profitable to contract for ships in the United States, as such vessels made of oak last five times longer than those made in New Archangel of cedar or pine wood.

Superintendent Chlebnikow states (part 3, p. 95) that the houses, barracks, and other buildings constructed under Baranow, who took possession of Sitka in 1806, were all rotten and had to be rebuilt by the company at his removal in 1817. Chlebnikow proceeds to enumerate eighteen public buildings at New Archangel which had to be completely rebuilt.

On page 136 Chlebnikow mentions the fact that by reason of the peculiarly wet climate buildings and ships rot very fast, and still more so is the case with the rigging and sails. On page 155 he speaks about the difficulty and expense of keeping cows, because of the scarcity of hay, which is very difficult to make or cure by reason of the continuous rainy and wet weather during the summer months.

Captain Tebenkow, in the text to his atlas, mentions that cows dislike the grass grown on the islands, and that they have to be fed mostly on imported fodder.

As regards the fur trade Captain Golowin states that it is continually on the decrease. His report is accompanied by full statistical tables, extending from 1842 to 1880. It is remarkable how the fur trade has been decreasing of late years; for instance, from the tables of the fur trade with the "Koloshes," at New Archangel, it appears that from 1842 to 1860 there were obtained of sea-otters (the most valuable fur) one thousand and forty pieces in the harbor and four hundred and ninety-five in the bays—together fifteen hundred and thirty-five pieces. But these were obtained almost exclusively in the first ten years. During the last five years of the period to which the table refers not a single sea-otter was obtained at New Archangel. The official tables show a similar decrease of the other furs at New Archangel; and the tables of the other districts disclose also a considerable gradual decrease in the quantity of furs obtained, and principally those of more valuable quality.

Hydrographic Atlas of the Russian Possessions on the Pacific, with descriptive text (in Russian) by Captain Tebenkow, St. Petersburg, 1852.

Captain Tebenkow, of the Russian service, remained many years in the colonies; the charts of his atlas were made and engraved under his direction at Sitka. In the text he states:

The rivers Kwichpak and Kuskowin have their entrances barred from the sea by a line of shoals extending from Stuart Island to the Cape of Good News. The surveys were made by Etolin, Chromchenko, and Vassilev.—Pp. 5 and 6.

The northern shore of the peninsula of Alaska has but few accessible points; the country is covered with lakes inclosed between steep mountains, and volcanoes of immense height, from nine thousand to eleven thousand two hundred and seventy feet.

The shores of Bristol Gulf present steep rocky ridges, the ground covered with sand and pebbles; inland innumerable lakes extend which are joined together by thousands of rivulets passing through swamps and "thundra."—P. 13.

The entrance to Kenai bay between Cape Douglas and Cape Elizabeth is very dangerous on account of a peculiarity called there "sulloy," which causes the water to rise and form, as it were, a wall six to ten feet higher than the water in the bay.—P. 18.

The Bay of Tschugatch presents no anchorage, being from seventy-five to one hundred fathoms deep.—P. 23.

The river Atna is not navigable, its entrance being barred by sand, while numerous rapids obstruct its course.—P. 24.

The width of the land (on the continent) between the sea and the mountains, covered with everlasting snow is not more than ten miles. It is much broken, steep, inaccessible to cultivation except in very few small spots, and exposed to tremendous blasts and snow avalanches.—P. 30.

French bay not fit for anchorage.—P. 34.

The islands compare with the fiords of Norway. They are inhospitable on account of rocks, reefs, sudden tides, storms, and fogs, and the floating ice crowding the bays nearly the whole year round.—P. 36.

The harbor of New Archangel is dangerous, with all east winds, and the fog renders navigation still more hazardous.—P. 38.

Captain Tebenkow says that of all the islands the best is Behring, most suitable for cultivation and having good harbors. But this is one of the islands reserved by Russia.—P. 127.

Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. B. F. BUTLER,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 7, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had intended when this subject was first opened to have, with some elaboration, brought together such views as might occur to me on this great question and presented them to the House; for in my judgment it is one of the greatest which will ever occupy the attention of the American Congress. I am precluded now from so doing by the very able and exhaustive report and argument of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs covering the whole ground; but with the leave of the Committee of the Whole I propose to state discursively perhaps, conversationally in any event, some of the reasons which will control my vote.

We are told here that our judgments are compelled, our consciences bound, our honor pledged in advance to appropriate this money because of the ratification of the treaty between us and Russia. If that be so, sir, why are we called upon to act on the question at all? because then we are as much tied down as ever Gulliver was with every hair of his head pegged to the ground. Why has the Constitution put into our hands the purse strings of the Government if there is any other branch or aggregation of branches or officers of the Government which can compel us to pay money at their pleasure? If the doctrine contended for here is the true one, there is the end of the House of Representatives in many of its functions. The doctrine contended for by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as I understand it, is that wherever a treaty is made in due form by the President and ratified by the Senate, between any nation or nations and this Government, it becomes from that moment the supreme law of the land, part of the constitutional law of the land, above statutes, above Congress, and there can be no change in its provisions by legislation or otherwise any more than in the Constitution itself; for I understand the claim put forward here is not that a treaty is above the State laws alone, but that it is superior to any other law; that it controls Congress itself. Sir, if that be so, then the control over the revenues of this Government and the control over the expenditures of the Government have passed away from the House to the President and Senate acting together executively.

Let me call your attention to a single view, which will illustrate what I am saying. Quite all our treaties to-day require that we shall give to every other nation the same commercial privileges and rights that are enjoyed by the most favored nations under any treaty with us. Now, if the President chooses to make, and the Senate chooses to ratify, a treaty of free trade and commerce between this nation and any other, every tariff law you have is repealed, and the treaty stipulations in regard to these subjects cannot be interfered with by legislation, because they are the supreme law. Am I not right? Is there any escape from this position? Once more. If the President chooses and the Senate consents, a treaty may be made by which millions upon millions may be borrowed from another nation and we be made that nation's perpetual bond-slave for the debt; and we in Congress can do nothing in the world but to appropriate the money to pay the interest year by year in this House, that our master, the Executive, and our lords, the Senate, have bound us to pay by this supreme law enacted by treaty.

We are told that a treaty is the supreme law of the land, and we cannot in honor get away from it; that we cannot avoid it without war. That is the last argument addressed to us by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] Let me pause here a moment and examine the bold contradiction in which he involves himself and see whether he himself will, upon examination, stand up to it. He made an argument to the House early in the session, proving, as I thought conclusively, that we had the full right to examine fully and pass upon every question in regard to the treaty; that it was not only our right, but our duty so to do. That I believe to have been and still to be perfectly sound constitutional law, with the limitation that the treaty calls upon the law-making power to do something to carry it into effect. The gentleman now says that the President and the Senate have so concluded as by their treaty and bound us to pay for this territory, that though it were an iceberg covered with walruses—whether that would make any difference in its value or not I do not know—yet he would feel himself bound to vote the money to pay for it. Why? Because the treaty compels his conscience and binds his honor so to vote; that he has no choice left, and he likens the case to the case of France in the contest with Jackson, from which there was no escape on her part save by war. What, then, becomes of his earlier argument that it was our right and duty to examine and determine all questions arising under a treaty if we are thus in honor and conscience bound to carry out its provisions whatever they may be? But is that doctrine true? It early challenged examination in the year 1795 upon the appropriation bill to carry into effect the Jay treaty, and there, after the fullest discussion, it was agreed that the House of Representatives has a right and that it is their duty to examine and determine upon every treaty that is not self-executing.

Now, what is a self-executing treaty? It is one which by its terms calls upon no branch of the Government to do anything to carry it into full effect after its ratification by the Executive with the advice of the Senate sitting in executive session, so that we may say simply a treaty to be carried into effect by the executive branch only which made and ratified it. But where the other branches of the Government are called upon to enforce it by law, there all nations have the fullest notice by the Constitution of our Government, and the discussions upon the first case arising under it, and a solemn resolution of this House declaring the doctrine that no nation is at liberty to act upon such a treaty until that branch of the Government having the right to examine and pass laws to carry it into full effect has spoken. This doctrine of the rights of this House has never since been challenged. Jefferson did not challenge it in 1800, in the treaty purchase of Louisiana, but expressly admitted it; and when we acquired territory from Mexico under the Gadsden treaty William H. Seward, the Secretary of State, who negotiated this treaty under discussion, voted in the Senate of the United States against appropriating the $10,000,000 required by the Gadsden treaty to carry it into effect, although that treaty had been ratified by the very Senate in which he was sitting as a member. Ay, and not only that, but the present Chief Justice of the United States, bringing to the question all those great qualities of mind and stability and depth of thought which now challenge the admiration of the country, voted side by side with Mr. Seward against appropriating money for the Gadsden treaty, and that, too, after the House of Representatives had consented to the appropriation to carry it into effect. The order of business which strengthens the argument was this: in the first place, the Senate ratified the treaty; the House of Representatives then passed the appropriation necessary to carry it into effect; the appropriation bill went to the Senate for its concurrence, and Mr. Chase, Mr. Seward, and Mr. Wade, then, and in that stage of the bill, recorded their votes against it. I say, therefore, explicitly, that the doctrine never has been challenged down to this day that the House of Representatives have a right when called upon to carry out a treaty by appropriation of money or enactment of law to examine, to deliberate, and to decide whether to appropriate or not to appropriate, pass laws or not to pass laws, as they choose. All the nations of the earth, friendly or unfriendly, must take notice of that state of our constitutional law, and they have no right to complain of the result of our deliberations in that regard.

But what says my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING?] He agrees that I am correct in every one of these positions, yet he says that he is bound to vote to carry into effect this treaty because the United States Government have taken possession of this Russian territory. I take issue with him upon the fact. That is exactly what the United States Government has not done. One branch of the United States Government, without any authority of law, without any act of Congress, without any constitutional right, did what our fathers never believed could be done, and what a whole party once rose up and objected to even in time of war. I say the Executive in time of peace marched an armed force on to foreign territory to take military possession thereof. Point me to the constitutional provision which allows the President of the United States in time of peace to march the Army of the United States upon foreign territory, and to take possession of that territory unsupported by congressional enactment. It was doubted, I say, by a great political party if that could be done constitutionally by the President, in the war with Mexico, even by the aid of an act of Congress. The action of the President of the United States in taking possession of this Russian land was wholly without constitutional authority, without right, and without law, and has no binding force and effect whatever, because he cannot bind the United States in that way. If we are bound by the treaty, be it so; but by the unconstitutional act of the President we cannot be bound; and, for one, I will never consent to so dangerous a precedent.

The next proposition put to us is that we are bound to pay this money because Russia is a friendly Power, and has been our friend for fifty years. Well, if we are to pay this price as usury on her friendship, we are paying for it very dear, indeed. If we are to pay for her friendship this amount I desire to give her the $7,200,000 and let her keep Alaska, because I think it may be a small sum to give for the friendship if we could only get rid of the land, or ice, rather, which we are to get by paying it. Because, whatever may be the worth of Alaska, whatever may be its prospective value, one thing is certain, and there is no man here who doubts it, that the great question of cost is not what we have to pay for it, but what we shall have to pay to take care of it; to put ships of war there, to put the coast survey there, to institute a territorial government there, to make judicial districts there, with judges to decide disputes where there never will be any except between the Indians and the few who go there to plunder them. What is to be this expense? Your appropriation bills will show, year by year, an increase equal one half at least of the amount which is now to be paid for this territory, simply to take care of it, and this, too, without any returns. It is already in testimony before you, and I now hold it in my hand, that for ten years the entire product of all this country of Alaska did not exceed $3,000,000. It is true there were other exports, but they were exports of imported articles, Alaska having had the monopoly of the tea trade.

I now say again, that if we are called upon to preserve the friendship of Russia by money I, for one, would prefer to pay her the money and let her keep Alaska. I have no doubt that she would rather give us Alaska and get rid of the expense of it to herself and throw her friendship into the bargain and let us keep our money than that she should keep the territory. I have no doubt that any time within the last twenty years we could have had Alaska for the asking. I have heard it was so stated in the Cabinets of two Presidents, provided we would have taken it as a gift. But no man, except one insane enough to buy the earthquakes in St. Thomas and ice-fields in Greenland, could be found to agree to any other terms for its acquisition by this country.

I agree that Russia has been friendly to us. But I think that friendship has come from this, not that she has loved us any better, but that she has hated England and France more—England, our hereditary enemy, and France, who became our enemy through her attack upon Mexico. Russia looked to us and our moral, and if need be material, aid to keep them quiet while she pursued the grandest system of conquest and acquisition of territory that the world has ever seen. That system is just now culminating to the astonishment of the statesmen of England and France. While they thought they had humbled Russia by destroying Sebastopol, which would be about the same in comparison as dismantling Key West would be to check the career upward and onward of this country; while they dreamed they had humbled Russia and hindered her victorious progress, she was marching through Circassia, subduing to her will a province, nay a kingdom, greater than all the British isles. She has been marching on and on, further and yet still further, until after thirty years of steady and persistent progress in aggression and conquest she has now brought all Northern Asia within her grasp, and claims the rich country of Bokhara as her outermost possession. I cannot too much admire the power of that Government, that autocracy, not checked by the allied attack of France, England, Italy, and Turkey upon her outpost of Sebastopol, continuing her conquering march, even as the siege progressed, on and on until she has absorbed countries in the East fertile, populous, and powerful, greater in resources and wealth by many, many times than ever can be a score of Alaskas. Now, while she has thrown off what is to her an excrescence, a mere wen upon her empire, and we pick it up and pay her a great price for it, she absorbs countries enough to make her the most powerful nation on the globe. It is that she may have our assistance and our material and moral aid in this great march of progress that she has been our friend, anxious to maintain friendly relations with America. There can be, there has been; no particular kind-heartedness, cordiality, or affinity between autocracy and democracy. They are the positive and negative poles of governmental ideas and action. He must have illy read the history of the world who believes there is so much of disinterested, gushing friendship here. The secret of this friendship is that the empire of democracy in the West, threatening with her maritime strength the great nations of England and France, may hold them in check, while the great autocrat may make his conquering march to the very gates of British India, until, as we are informed by the latest telegram across the Atlantic, the question asked in England's Cabinet is, "Does Russia mean British India?" That is the next question to be discussed in the House of Lords.

Time warns me to hasten on. A single word further as to the value of this territory of Alaska. I do not know what it is worth; I cannot find out what it is worth. And my excellent friend and colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. BAXES,] has failed to bring me the best evidence of what it is worth when he had it in his power. He has brought me telegrams, newspaper articles, paragraphs from newspapers, written by some Bohemian who was dear at thirty dollars a week; and upon them he expects me to act in matters of the highest concern. Is not that all? Has any other evidence been produced here? Yet when he made his report to this House there was on the floor of this House General Rousseau, who had been in command of that country for six months, and who could have told us what sort of a country it was, what it was worth, and what it would cost to take care of it. He was here in person. Why did not the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs summon General Rousseau and take his testimony, subjecting him to cross-examination, so that his means of knowledge might be probed? His observations in that country ought to have been extensive, for he resided there six months and has had nothing to do but observe and keep warm. Why was not his testimony brought before this House, testimony on which we might have placed some reliance? Why go to some newspaper paragraph written with the impersonal we, never used except by monarchs, editors, and the devil, so far as I know, to testify to us what is the condition of Alaska? Why not bring here the evidence of a general of the Army who spent six months in the country and knows all about it?

I pray, however, after I have made this suggestion, no gentleman will get any newspaper letter from General Rousseau about this country, because I give notice here and now that if any testimony from him is to be brought in, I humbly and respectfully desire to cross-examine the witness, as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] would have cross-examined him if he had been brought before the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

But I pass from the question as to the value of Alaska. I have what I think is a higher and a different reason for voting against the acquisition of Alaska, exercising the judgment which I trust I have demonstrated I have a right to exercise against carrying the treaty into effect. By this treaty, when this territory becomes ours the inhabitants of the territory, or at least a portion of them, become American citizens—how large a portion I am not quite certain, because I do not know precisely what has been the system heretofore pursued by Russia in the management of the Indian tribes, and how far the Indians may be counted as having rights as citizens or subjects under the Russian Government. Now, I remember, sir, that Rome carried her arms and her laws over the whole world as then known; but she restricted her citizenship to Latium, to Italy, and to those who, in the language of Chief Captain to St. Paul, had "with great price obtained this freedom." Our theory has been a different one. Wherever we have extended our Government we have at the same time extended our laws and the rights of citizenship, until there arises a danger from the heterogeneous masses of men of different races which are being brought in to help govern our country. We now, by this treaty, bring in these citizens of Russia, not from their own choice, not because they have chosen to emigrate in order to escape oppression, but we bring in as our citizens these people who have been component parts of an autocracy, and know no other government; we propose to clothe them with citizenship, to endow them with the high title of American citizens, to give them a share of our birthright, whether fitted to them or not. This country cannot go on with any safety to itself in this course of annexing—no, not annexing, acquiring foreign non-contiguous territory, giving promiscuously to the inhabitants of that territory the right to American citizenship. And, sir, I wondered to hear the spread-eagleism, the filibusteringism, and the manifest destinyism, and all that sort of doctrine which came from my conservative—shall I not say my worse than radical—friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] why he desires to take in, as a part of our possessions, all the islands of the ocean, South America, including Patagonia, making all the inhabitants thereof all American citizens? Sir, I shall be ashamed of Congress if that ever takes place, whether the gentleman from Ohio is in or out of it. I want to enter my protest now as a lover of this country, one having its welfare at heart, against any further extension of the right of American citizenship. I am willing to extend the rights of citizenship to all those now upon our soil; but if we are to acquire St. Thomas, Santa Cruz, Greenland, Iceland, and Alaska, with her walrusses and seals, and those made up of the blood and fat of both, I desire respectfully to enter my protest against a further extension of the right of suffrage. We must stop somewhere. Where are we to stop? Must we not take a leaf from the book of the history of Rome and Rome, I reiterate, while extending her laws and her arms over the world, took care to keep the governing power at Rome. Roman citizenship was not flung away to any such persons as the fat-sucking inhabitants of Alaska or the plantain-leaf-covered Patagonian, if he is not so far in the region of cold that the plantain refuses to yield its leaves to cover him.

Another reason, sir, why I propose to vote against Alaska is to record my protest against taking a foreign, uncontiguous country in as American soil; against having the President of the United States, with the consent of the Senate, without my assent as one of the Representatives of the people of the United States, yield up a portion of the rights of sovereignty now residing in us altogether. I cannot agree to dispose of those until my judgment is convinced and I see it is for the safety of the country. A great danger I see in the future extent of this country is from the want of homogeneity in the various races we shall take into our borders and make American citizens, unless we change our policy in this regard.

There is still another consideration, but I admit a weaker one, which is germane to the one to which I have just called attention; and that is this territory is not contiguous. While I agree fully that the American idea of government is to have all the land that join you, still I never knew the desire extended to the land that does not join you. Without objecting to taking in Canada, because she is, as it were, a part of us, yet, leaving out the Dominion of Canada, I would not take to-day, as a gift, the British possessions lying without Canada. You take here a country that you cannot get to, except by water, without crossing the territory of another Power. We are asked to make it a part of our country when we cannot reach it by land, to say nothing of the snow and ice.

Mr. PIKE. We never want to reach it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Sir, we want no country we have no possibility of reaching. That is the point I wish to make.

I am reminded we have possession of it now. That I deny. True, General Rosseau has been there six months. But he had to sail either through other seas around Cape Horn, or go across foreign territory, where the right to cross may be interrupted any day before he could get there. To annex such territory is an entirely new departure in the growth of America. "I'll have none of it." But if you will have other lands, if you will have foreign territory, go take suffering, oppressed Crete from Turkey. You can do it for one half the money you are asked to pay for Alaska. If you will have other territory, extend your protectorate over Crete, ennobled by her suffering, the bravery of her men, the virtue of her women. She is much nearer to us than is Alaska. If you will have other territory go where somebody else has gone before you and take lands desirable by historical associations or of intrinsic value in themselves. But you should own no land that is not contiguous to your country, that is not part of your country, that is not to be under the eye of Government, to be reached by telegram, from which, in case of war with a maritime Power, you may not be cut off.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the grounds of opinion upon which I shall give my vote. I do not believe I am bound to vote for this bill except my judgment inclines in that way. My judgment is not overborne either by the action of the Executive or the Senate, or of the President in taking possession of Alaska, or by any supposed friendliness on the part of Russia. I am not influenced, either, by any belief of the good bargain we have made. I shall be controlled by the reasons I have given.

There is another topic connected with the subject I wish to bring to the attention of the committee. If you propose to pay this money I wish you to see that your citizens are indemnified, before doing so. Eleven years ago Russia made an agreement with an American citizen during the Crimean war to purchase munitions of war. She received the property, but has not paid for it, and now owes the widow of the men who furnished her with those munitions of war. The State Department, in three several communications, has recognized the justice of this claim, and still Russia neglects to pay it. At some times she says there was only a verbal contract for the property she bought, and that a verbal contract is not binding, admitting that it was made. The justice of the claim she has never disputed, but she has always raised technical objections. Therefore I propose, if this $7,200,000 are to be voted to be paid to her, to move the following proviso:

Provided, That the payment of $500,000 of said appropriation be withheld until the imperial Government of Russia shall signify its willingness to refer to an impartial tribunal for adjudication and settlement all such claims by American citizens against the imperial Government of Russia as have been investigated by the State Department of the United States and declared by said Department to be just, and the amount so awarded to be paid from said $500,000 so withheld.

Mr. BANKS. If my colleague intends to have the question put on that proposition at this time I must object to it as not germane to the bill, and therefore not in order, without expressing any opinion in regard to the subject-matter of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the Chair hear me a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am still on the floor. I only offer the proposition now for the purpose of arguing it. We are asked to appropriate money to be paid to Russia. Russia has refused to pay a just claim of our citizens, found so by the State Department. That my proviso presupposes. Now, I ask to put a proviso on this appropriation bill that so much money shall be retained as will furnish a fund out of which claims of our citizens may be paid when a fair and just tribunal shall decide that they are due. Am I to be told that that is not germane? Is it not exactly germane? It is proposed to send so much money to Russia. If it is appropriated it will be done in spite of my vote. But if you do appropriate it I desire that you should retain enough to meet the just claims of our own citizens, exactly as was done in the case of the Gadsden treaty.

Now, there is nobody in the world I have so much respect for as the gentleman who sits in the chair, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and yet, at the proper time I intend to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I want to see whether we have arrived at this condition of things that the Senate not only can make a treaty by which we must send away from this country so much money, but when the bill is before the House of Representatives, and our citizens come to us and ask us to step in between them and the autocrat of all the Russias and do them justice, we are to be told that it is not germane to put in a proviso as this limiting the payment of money to him until he pays his honest debts to our citizens. If this limitation to such an appropriation is not, what would be germane? That we shall lay our heads down before the autocrat of Russia that he may trample on them? Would that be germane? Where else is an American citizen to go for redress against the oppressions, the iniquity, the injustice of a foreign Government if he does not come to this

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Purchase of Alaska—Mr. Maynard.

HO. OF REPS.

House of Representatives at the moment it is voting away his own money to that Government which owes him a just debt which it refuses to pay. Is it not germane to any appropriation bill to protect the rights of American citizens by limiting the amount to be paid so our own debts may be collected? We are called upon to send $7,200,000 out of this country to pay a debt to a foreign Power. I am opposed to letting so much of it go as is required to pay the just debts that country owes to our citizens. My friend says if I was called upon to pay a debt I would pay it, and then collect my money of my debtor. Sir, if I had refused to pay for eleven years until I had driven my creditor to his grave, and his widow had come and presented his claim in this way, I should expect she would protect herself by process of foreign attachment or a garnishee process. That is exactly what I ask this House to do. For eleven long years this claimant besought the justice of Russia for his money, but without avail. He is now dead, and his widow presents herself here and asks this House of Representatives, "If you are going to send $7,200,000 out of the country hold enough of it back for me and my orphan children that I may get justice done me as against this autocrat." And what is the answer? It is not germane to our proceeding to do you justice. We must send your money over to Russia and you must go over there for it. That is germane. And the widow shall answer, "But it is unjust and cruel to your own citizen, and his widow and orphans, and that is never germane to the proceedings of an American House of Representatives. Justice, equity, and right are always in order and germane to every bill. They are the eternal law which the Constitution was designed to enforce here among men." Is not that germane, sir? I ask the committee to say whether it is not, on the precedent established in the Gadsden treaty, and the precedent which always has been acted on in all other treaties? If it is said that we can have nothing to do with it because we must carry the treaty into effect, why discuss further? Let us go home this hot weather and not trouble ourselves any more. But if we have anything to do with this business let us hold this money for this widow, if it is her due, and not let it go out of the country until she can have a fair hearing before an impartial tribunal. I now offer the amendment.

Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. H. MAYNARD,
OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 1, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry in effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867—

Mr. MAYNARD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I shall not stop to count the fish or to measure the trees in Alaska, nor yet to vex her soil in search of her mines. If that distant region is worth having it is worth buying; if worth buying it is worth paying for. The price proposed to be given is very inconsiderable, less, comparatively, than Florida cost us; less, absolutely, than we paid for the Mesilla valley under the Gadsden treaty. I think the acquisition important and necessary to this Government and opportune. I look forward to the time, not far distant, when the civilization of the world will be transferred from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, when what is excellent and exalted in human affairs will be found upon the shores of that benign sea. We occupy a geographical position which, if wisely improved, will enable us to control the commerce and the maritime affairs of that vast ocean highway; and as long as I am connected with any branch of the public service I declare my readiness to grant subsidies and to take measures looking to our commercial and naval supremacy on the Pacific as complete as Great Britain has for two centuries enjoyed on the Atlantic ocean. We have it in our power to do this by fairly improving our opportunities without any special exertion and without invading the rights of any other nation of the earth.

The wealth and commerce of the Indies have given the ascendancy by turns to every nation that has enjoyed them; in ancient times Tyre and Alexandria, in more modern times Venice, Portugal, Holland, and lastly, England. That vast and lucrative trade has hitherto been approached by journeying to the East. It is given to us, of all the nations, to reach it by turning our bows to the West. Our India docks and wharves will be found, at no distant day, on our Pacific coast. There will be our great commercial marts with their accumulated wealth and population, reached from the East by us and by Europe over the lines of railway now rapidly stretching across the continent. Westward the course of empire takes its way. Westward, too, has been the course of Christian civilization from the cradle of Bethlehem. Every effort to turn it eastward has failed. And when the millions of China and Japan accept the Christian faith, and as a corollary, modern civilization, it will come to them, as it has come to us, in the direction of the morning. To them, as to the rest of the Christian world, the star of Bethlehem will still be the star of the East. I would by every prudent and reasonable polity anticipate these mighty changes in the world's affairs, and be found ready to accept them. They greatly err who think there is to be or ought to be an end of progress, a time to look on the plan of this mighty maze as finished, complete; who imagine themselves living in the old age of the world. The great, ever-teeming future before us, and not the receding past behind us, is the region of our hopes and our faith. And if we fail to keep steadily in view the future growth and progress of our country and our race our legislation will be narrow and poor and mean, and our recorded views will look as imperfect and incomprehensive as the views of men always do who fail to comprehend their own epoch.

Hence I am willing to vote appropriations for navy-yards, for maritime defenses, and for the improvement of the harbors upon that coast, for subsidizing any line of steamers sailing thence to any part of the other hemisphere, and for projecting across our continent as many lines of railway as substantial private enterprise shall be willing to undertake. It is the policy of progress, a policy far-reaching and eminently profitable to our country. This policy negotiated and ratified the treaty with Russia for the purchase of Alaska; and, acting under the same policy, I shall vote to execute it. No great amount of geographical knowledge is needed to demonstrate the value to us, nay, the necessity of that line of coast. To the nautical eye the simple inspection of the map is quite enough. Its acquisition is but a part of our great Pacific system, inaugurated in 1848, at the close of the Mexican war, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and prosecuted with undeviating energy ever since, a system destined to give us the control of that side of the globe. I confess my surprise that the honorable gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] the head of the Pacific railroad policy, should not recognize the acquisition of this lengthened coast-line as essentially a part of this same policy. Would it not be wise to extend our views a little and so modify our rules of order that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad should be made a committee on this Pacific system, of which the railroads are but a portion? The same wise economy which increases our public indebtedness to build these roads will also increase it to secure this vast and important addition to the Federal domain; and it cannot have failed to attract notice that opposition to this measure and equally strenuous opposition to the Pacific railroads emanate from the same quarter.

The climate, soil, and productions of this region have been discussed in the light of our imperfect information. We must not forget that it lies on the west and not on the east of the continent; that the southern portion, between latitude fifty and sixty degrees, is in the same latitude as the British isles, and the northern, between sixty and seventy degrees, in the same as Norway and Sweden. The probabilities certainly are that it will be found equally habitable. If the number of rainy days in the year has been accurately stated, as a physical fact the climate cannot be rigorously cold. It is not to the purpose that the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN,] or any one else, would not live there. Many persons, doubtless, would refuse to accept a home in the wintry latitude from which he comes. Man, the race, is cosmopolitan; man, the individual, is very local in his habits and tastes. It is too remote, says my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] Distance, so far as it respects human intercourse, is measured by time, not by space. So reckoning, Alaska is nearer the capital to-day than was California when admitted as a State. We all recollect when the distance from Boston to St. Louis was longer than it now is from Boston to Sitka.

I do not agree with him, either, that in order to make a nation united and powerful it must be territorially compact, and as he rather intimated, territorially small.

The greatest nation of ancient or modern times, the most powerful that has yet been, is Great Britain. Her policy from the first has been to acquire and to hold every spot of earth, however insignificant and apparently worthless, however barren and unproducing, however expensive to keep and defend. She disdains no portion of this ball. We recollect that when, a few years ago, Mr. Webster apostrophised her in the Senate, as the Power whose morning drum-beat preceding the rising sun, and keeping company with the hours, encircled the earth daily with an unbroken strain of the martial airs of England, he gave a more magnificent conception of her national grandeur than all the tables of all the statisticians. The American people partake of the same spirit, the same resolute purpose to replenish the earth and subdue it, and have dominion over it. Our god Terminus is an advancing and not a retreating divinity. The stars and stripes and the eagle are symbols of progress, moral, material, territorial. It is that spirit of expansion, if you please, of aggression, that has already made this Republic one of the great Powers, and will eventually make her the mistress of the world.

But, sir, it was not of this that I proposed to speak. My object to-night is to inquire into the nature and legal effect of a treaty duly negotiated and constitutionally ratified, whether it has any obligatory force or whether it is a mere proposition to be accepted or disregarded at pleasure? I confess very much has fallen from gentlemen that not only did not meet my approval but which gave me absolute pain. By the Constitution the several States are forbidden to "enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation." The President, with the advice and consent of two thirds of the Senators present, is authorized "to make treaties." He can also, with the advice and consent of the Senate, "appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls;" and a treaty "made under the authority of the United States" becomes "the supreme law of the land." If language can make anything clearer, if there can be any more specific method of contracting an obligation or of asserting its validity when contracted, I do not know it. Gentlemen have attempted to refine upon the word "treaty" as though it were limited in its scope. The word treaty is a word belonging to international law, and as old as the existence of nations. It goes back to the time of Theseus and the demi-gods. Our fathers understood it as well as we understand it. It is a term that embraces all intercourse between independent nations, carried on in the name of the sovereign Powers, a word of the largest, of the widest import.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman whether all contracts between nations are treaties?

Mr. MAYNARD. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. And then I wish to ask another.

Mr. MAYNARD. All treaties between nations are contracts under the sanction of the sovereign power, and the word treaty embraces leagues, alliances, pacts, conventions, confederations, and various other terms which are but subdivisions of the one great thing, the sovereign intercourse of nations, or rather the covenants between them made by the sovereign authority.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman whether under our Constitution a State has not a right to enter into a treaty with a foreign nation with the consent of Congress?

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir; the language is clear and positive on that point: "No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation."

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Look further down.

Mr. MAYNARD. "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty or impost," &c. Our fathers in framing the Constitution did not intend to trammel this Government in its dealings with the other nations of the world; did not intend to send her forth on her national career cramped and fettered in her intercourse with other peoples.

We have had an argument based upon the extent, the magnitude of the treaty-making power, and the possibility of its being abused. All power is liable to abuse, and it does not disprove its existence to show that it may be abused. It is not a new argument. It has been often used in relation to this power in the Constitution, not only before the Constitution was ratified, but since. I hold in my hand the debates in the convention of Virginia, called to pass upon the Constitution then just submitted to the States for ratification or rejection. Among the ablest and most influential opponents of the newly-proposed scheme of Government was Patrick Henry. His revolutionary fame, his great personal influence, and his unrivaled oratory were arrayed against what he regarded as little short of a surrender of the recently-gained liberty. While this part of the instrument was under discussion he made use of language not unlike some things uttered here to-day:

"Mr. Henry begged gentlemen to consider the condition this country would be in if two thirds of a quorum should be empowered to make a treaty—they might relinquish and alienate territorial rights and our most valuable commercial advantages. In short, if anything should be left us, it would be because the President and Senators were pleased to admit it. The power of making treaties by this Constitution, ill-guarded as it is, extended further than it did in any country in the world. Treaties were to have more force here than in any part of Christendom; for he defied any gentleman to show anything so extensive in any strong, energetic Government in Europe. Treaties rest, says he, on the laws and usages of nations. To say that they are municipal, is, to me, a doctrine totally novel. To make them paramount to the constitution and laws of the States is unprecedented. I would give them the same force and obligation they have in Great Britain or any other country in Europe. Gentlemen are going on in a fatal career; but I hope they will stop before they concede this power unguarded and unaltered."

So spoke Patrick Henry of the treaty-making power before the Constitution was adopted, and in interpretation of that instrument and as a reason why it should not be ratified by his native Virginia. Other gentlemen spoke to the same purpose. We have had precisely the same argument repeated in this House I know not how many times, and it has been repeated again and again in this present debate. The extent of the power was not controverted. It was merely a question whether it was necessary to a free government and was wisely located. Mr. Madison, who took part in defense of the article, did not deny the correctness of Mr. Henry's interpretation of it, but contended it was safest "to leave the power to be exercised as contingencies might arise."

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman did not fully answer my question. I understood him to say that all compacts with foreign Powers were treaties. I desire him to explain this clause of our Constitution:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into a compact with a foreign Power."

Mr. MAYNARD. I read this clause:

"That no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation."

That cited by the gentleman reads as follows:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, levy any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign Power," &c.

If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not use the term compact or agreement. I said that the term "treaty" was used where that word alone is used as a general term, nomen generalissimum, to include all diplomatic negotiations, and all contracts made by the sovereign authority. The treaty-making power, where ever it resides, is one of the attributes of sovereignty.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I want the gentleman to explain the difference between a compact and a treaty.

Mr. MAYNARD. If that was at all important in the present debate, I would answer the gentleman that a treaty is a compact, though not every compact is a treaty. A treaty is an act of sovereignty. A compact may or may not be. But as I have only a limited time, and the difference is one readily found by referring to the elementary books on the subject, I trust he will excuse me for not devoting more attention to that collateral point.

In 1796, after the Federal Government went into operation, the anti-Federalists of that day, the opponents of the Government, the opponents of General Washington and of his administration, organized an attack upon it, under cover of assailing a treaty of amity and commerce that had been negotiated by Mr. Chief Justice Jay with Great Britain, availing themselves of the antipathy felt in this country toward that Power. That debate is frequently referred to. Speeches made on the one side or the other are cited. It is alluded to in the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon this bill, by both the majority and the minority. Gentlemen have quoted at large from it in this discussion. Commentators upon the Constitution have appealed to it as a contemporaneous exposition, and therefore instructive, if not authoritative. As a precedent, a decision is valuable for what is decided, rather than for the arguments or the reasons supporting it. So the action upon Jay's treaty, as it is called, is more important than the discussion; what was done than what was said.

Now, let us see exactly what was done. I have before me the Journal of the House of Representatives, by which it appears that after a long debate in Committee of the Whole, the House, by something like twenty majority, called upon President Washington for the instructions, correspondence, and other documents connected with the negotiation of the treaty. General Washington met the call by a point blank refusal, sending in a special message, in which he argued the general question. I will cite a single passage as applicable to much that has been said of the alleged secrecy with which the Russian treaty was negotiated:

"The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy; and even when brought to a conclusion a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concessions which may have been proposed or contemplated, would be extremely impolitic; for this might have a pernicious influence on future negotiations, or produce immediate inconveniences, perhaps danger and mischief in relation to other Powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate; the principle on which that body was formed confining it to a small number of members."

Having been himself a member of the Federal Convention which framed the Constitution, and familiar with the principles which pervaded it, and the reasons of its different provisions, he made himself a witness and spoke from personal knowledge. In conclusion he adds:

"If other proofs than these, and the plain letter of the Constitution itself, be necessary to ascertain the point under consideration, they may be found in the Journals of the General Convention which I have deposited in the office of the Department of State. In those Journals it will appear that a proposition was made 'that no treaty should be binding on the United States which was not ratified by a law,' and that the proposition was explicitly rejected."

In this connection I will read a sentence from the minority report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

"George Washington, the President, in answer to the resolution, declined to give the information sought for, maintaining the doctrine that the House had nothing to do in the matter, but he was overruled by a vote of 57 to 35."

George Washington overruled upon a question of constitutional law! Overruled by a show of numbers or counting of noses! We have historical examples other than this of men being thus overruled and more emphatically. The Saviour of the world was overruled by the majority of numbers and went to his crucifixion. The apostles and martyrs were constantly overruled and suffered death in consequence. Socrates was overruled and drank the hemlock. Luther was overruled. And so was Galileo; and so have the great leaders of thought and opinion been overruled in all time. Washington was overruled less effectually than they, if, indeed, it is doing justice to affirm that he was overruled, or his authority as a public jurist in the least contravened.

Now, let us see precisely what was done. Washington pre-emptorily declined to give the information called for, and assigned his reasons for so doing. The House took the subject under consideration, and again went into Committee of the Whole. After debate they came out and adopted this resolution, which I beg to read:

"Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution that 'the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur,' the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its ratification as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

In the precise terms of that resolution I should have no objection to voting for it myself. But the debate shows, and it is a part of the history of our country, that at that time originated the doctrine which, transmitted by lineal descent, attained full and logical development at four o'clock on the morning of the 12th of April, 1861, in the first gun that opened upon Fort Sumter. This was the doctrine of State rights in opposition to the doctrine of Federal nationality—the doctrine of secession, the doctrine of disunion, inculcated by every variety of teaching on all possible occasions in connection with every conceivable topic, until it resulted, as we have seen, in civil war; the doctrine being civil war inchoate, and civil war being the doctrine complete; one the germ and the other the fruit. For myself, I should think it safer to be wrong with Washington than to be right with Calhoun, supported by all the doctors of the secession school.

The report of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in this case cites its authorities as they are called, dismissing Chancellor Kent and Judge Story with such language as this:

"The minority of the committee is not unaware that so high judicial authority as Judge Story and Chancellor Kent have to some extent taken the ground now combated."

Then we have citations from William B. Giles, Professor Tucker, the commentator of Blackstone, and, for aught I know, John Taylor of Caroline—John C. Calhoun should have been added to the list—men who originated this pernicious heresy, who have taught it, and under whose teachings it has grown and flourished and brought forth its legitimate fruit.

General Washington, as I understand the history of the times, was a Federalist; a term which, though it afterward came to be opprobrious as a political designation, meant in his day precisely what the term "Union man" means in ours. He was in favor of the Federal Union and its paramount national authority against what was called State allegiance and State sovereignty, and the loose, vague, ill-defined theory of Federal power which, under the name of strict construction, was invented by the enemies of the Union after it had once been established and in operation. That element obtained in a few years the political control of the Government and had much to do in managing its affairs until the power was about to pass out of its hands, and then it put its peculiar doctrines into practice. We had a demonstration of State rights, the right of secession, and peaceable disunion. If it is permitted to regain the possession of the Government, as there is certainly great danger of its doing, we shall see the same thing repeated.

Foremost among the opponents of Jay's treaty was Mr. Jefferson. Not willing directly to assail General Washington, who was popular, he charged what he called the heretical doctrines upon Mr. Hamilton, who was unpopular. Afterward, however, he materially changed his own views when transferred from opposition to administration. In 1803 he found himself in such a position that it was convenient to make a treaty for the acquisition of the territory of Louisiana. Being apprehensive that unless the territory was then secured England would step in and snatch it away from us, and not having, as he said, time to assemble Congress and consult them, he privately sent Mr. Livingston and Mr. Monroe to Paris and negotiated the treaty by which we acquired that immense domain. This treaty, it appears, was not communicated to this House for twelve months after its ratification. Yet it was executed, and the money agreed on was paid. And from the beginning every treaty that has been made and ratified by two thirds of the Senate by which we have gained new territory has been followed by appropriate legislation, notwithstanding there has been from time to time the same opposition precisely which is exhibited in the present debate. Two treaties only have we made by which we parted with territory; perhaps the two treaties we have the least to admire or be proud of. I refer of course to the treaty by which a large portion of the State of Maine was relinquished to the neighboring Power of Great Britain; and that which at a later time surrendered to the same Power the Pacific coast from the 49° to the 54° 40' of north latitude. Suppose in both cases we had followed the policy of "masterly inactivity," and let the disputed country settle itself. Why, sir, we should have held our eastern frontier, and had every foot of coast-line from Lower California to Behring straits. The men of that day thought otherwise and so agreed Congress, and the country have accepted the obligations as a part of the supreme law of the land.

I hold, therefore, a treaty, when negotiated and ratified by the Senate, becomes obligatory upon the American people and has the force of law. I do not mean that it takes money out of the Treasury or supersedes the necessity of a specific appropriation by Congress. It does not. Whatever the treaty stipulates to be done, to pay money, raise a commission, or maintain a fleet, it does not execute itself. It requires legislation to carry it into effect. If it undertake to establish a joint commission for the trial of pirates we must provide for the commissioner on our part and raise and appropriate the money to pay him. If it stipulates, as did the Ashburton treaty, for keeping upon the coast of Africa an adequate naval force for the suppression of the slave trade, legislation is required to build, to arm, and man the ships, and to provision and pay the officers and men. We can, if so inclined, refuse to execute the stipulations by withholding the appropriation, because all revenue bills must originate in this House. But what does that prove? Simply that the faith of the nation is in our keeping. The execution or non-execution of treaty stipulations, as well as of every other undertaking in the name of the United States, devolves upon us as the law-making department of the Government. It is a question of good faith, of what in private affairs is called integrity, honesty, uprightness, and names of similar import.

Mr. SPALDING. We do not differ widely; but I want to understand the gentleman in his present train of argument. Does he mean to say the money included in this treaty for the acquisition of Alaska, that treaty having been approved by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and the necessary interchanges having taken place between the two sovereignties, does he mean to say that stands as a debt of the nation, and we have the same right to withhold appropriation as we would have for any other debt of the Government?

Mr. MAYNARD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SPALDING. And no other power.

Mr. MAYNARD. No other. We can refuse to pay taxes and make appropriations for the payment of every bond, principal and interest, issued in the name of the United States, and of every other debt, no matter how contracted, upon just the same principles as we can disregard the undertaking of a treaty. I will refer to that subject again.

It is said that the power to bind the nation by treaty is a very great power, and the President and Senate might, by the misuse of it, bring great disaster, if not ruin, upon the country, and subvert the whole scheme of our Government. Many possible inconveniences have been suggested. That is not a new argument. It was made in opposition to the British Commercial Convention of 1815. Mr. Pinkney, who was a member of the House, replied to it, and I will send to the Clerk's desk an extract from his speech to be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

"Many extreme cases have been put for illustration in this debate; and this is one of them; and I take the occasion which it offers to mention that to argue from extreme cases is seldom logical, and upon a question of interpretation never so. We can only bring back the means of delusion, if we wander into the regions of fiction, and explore the wilds of bare possibility in search of rules for real life and actual ordinary cases. By arguing from the possible abuse of power against the use or existence of it, you may and must come to the conclusion that there ought not to be, and is not, any government in this country or in the world. Disorganization and anarchy are the sole consequences that can be deduced from such reasoning. Who is it that may not abuse the power that has been confided to him? May not we, as well as the other branches of the Government? And, if we may, does not the argument from extreme cases prove that we ought to have no power, and that we have no power?"

Mr. MAYNARD. In further response to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] I ask to introduce, as expressive of my own views, a part of a letter addressed to me by a valued correspondent, formerly a member of this House, and now abroad, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"1. The treaty-making power is vested exclusively in the President and the Senate, and a treaty made and ratified by them in due form is a part of the supreme law of the land. Whether this was a wise provision is a political question not now involved, but which was freely discussed in framing and adopting the Constitution.

"2. A debt contracted or any money-promise made by such a treaty necessarily occupies precisely the same position as any other public debt or money engagement entered into by law.

"3. Therefore the House has precisely the same power over such a debt as it has over the bonds for a public loan maturing in 1882. They cannot be paid without an appropriation, and the appropriation cannot be made without the consent of the House. In neither case can the creditor sue, obtain judgment, and have execution awarded. In both cases the only security is public faith and public sense of justice.

"4. A treaty which creates or defines the rights of certain persons in or to certain things may be directly acted upon by the courts, which must take judicial notice of it as a part of the law of the land. But a treaty which promises that something shall be done, internationally or infraterritorially, whether the payment of money, the passage of a law, or any other act, cannot be executed by the courts, but is only a promise on one sovereign to an equal sovereign, with no guarantee but that of good faith, and depends upon the political department of the Government for its execution.

"5. In most countries, as in England, the treaty-making power, embracing the power, of course, to promise whatever can be promised by a treaty, is vested exclusively in the Crown, while performance of the promise depends often on the concurrence of Parliament. In our case the full power to promise, to assume in such form as that the engagement is a part of the supreme law of the land, (which is not so in England and other countries,) is with the President and Senate, while President, Senate, and House must concur in performance. But the name to begin to non-performance, after a ratification by the Senate, is the same in the case of a treaty and of a bond for money, commonly called repudiation."

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Do I understand that those are the views of Mr. Madison?

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir; they are the views of a gentleman now abroad, a correspondent of mine, whose name, for obvious reasons, I withhold. As they express succinctly my own views, I have presented them in that form, adopting them for convenience.

Mr. MILLER. What is the name of the writer?

Mr. MAYNARD. I prefer, as I stated, to withhold the name. We are all aware that a treaty stipulation to pay money is only a usual and ordinary one. Such a stipulation, made under the authority of the United States by the President, and ratified by the Senate, becomes an obligation of as high a character as can be assumed by this Government. Yet, like every other obligation, it may not be binding, because it may have been incurred under duress or by fraud, or through a mistake; or there may have been a partial or complete failure of consideration, or a breach by the other party. I suppose this nation would hardly plead either infancy or coverture. But an obligation fraudulently obtained, or obtained under a condition known in law as duress, or attended with such manifest abuse of authority as to affect with notice the other high contracting Power, we might disregard; and whenever such an obligation, so tainted, shall be presented to this House I shall be prepared to disregard it, and then to vote a declaration of war the next day. It would be an act of a hostile character, the legitimate result of which would be war. To repudiate the obligation because it is a hard or improvident bargain—in a word, a bad trade—because the money borrowed upon the bond was not needed, or was misapplied, or because, as is urged in this case, the territory acquired is not wanted, this is bad faith, pure and simple; the meanest and most ignoble species of perfidy.

I do not, therefore, agree with a portion of the majority report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs accompanying this bill, and I am sorry to see that they thought it necessary, in preparing their report, to indicate in advance the specific cases when in their judgment it would be expedient or proper for Congress to interpose to prevent the carrying into effect of a treaty. We cannot anticipate in what circumstances our nation will find itself in all coming time, and what may or may not be expedient or proper. It is the part of a wise judge to decide those questions that are brought before him for decision, and to withhold his opinion on all others until they legitimately arise.

Reference has been made in this debate, as it was by Jefferson in his opposition to Jay's treaty, to our Indian treaties. We are asked is a treaty entered into with a small Indian tribe to become the paramount law of this wide land covering thirty million people? Whatever force there is in that suggestion bears not upon the negotiation of the treaty, but upon our whole Indian policy. Our policy has been to regard the Indian tribes as nations, and to be treated with as such. I am not prepared to say that this policy was wise. I am rather inclined to think a different course would have been preferable had it been practicable. But the moment we recognized them as nations, as distinct peoples, gave them a character of nationality, and condescended, if you please, to treat with them, then by every principle of national good faith we were bound to give effect to those treaties just as though they had been made with the most enlightened and powerful people on the face of the earth. The binding force of a treaty is in no wise enhanced by the dignity or power of the other high contracting party. That might increase or lessen the chances of impunity in case of its violation.

Now, what have we done in the matter of Indian treaties? Here we have a volume—and it is not a small one—of Indian treaties that have been standing upon our statute-books and in the State Department some of them for sixty or seventy years, and we have executed them, so far as I know, in good faith, by making appropriations from year to year to carry them into effect. These same Indian treaties are our title-deeds to half the national domain. And because it devolves upon us under the Constitution to originate revenue bills, to impose taxes, to raise money, and to make appropriations to carry these treaties into effect, does it follow, therefore, that we have the power to inquire into them and to execute them or not, at our convenience, and with no jeopardy to the public faith? I do not so understand our duty. I do not so understand the frame of our Government, and I do not so understand its relations to the other powers. For while there has been a class of political theorists, already alluded to, who have taken occasion, whenever the execution of a treaty was to be provided for by appropriate legislation, to assail the treaty-making power, and even to declare that a treaty fairly negotiated and deliberately ratified about a subject-matter within the scope of the treaty-making authority has no higher moral obligation upon the conscience of legislators than any ordinary measure to be determined at discretion by expediency alone, yet, as a matter of fact, it has been the uniform practice of the House to carry all treaties into effect. The good sense and fair-minded good faith of a majority have always prevailed over such political teachings. I should be very sorry to see this treaty an exception or to have this bill coupled with any such conditions as are proposed either by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHBRIDGE] or the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELLIOT.] I am unwilling as a Representative to notify the nations of the world that our Constitution, giving the President and Senate the power to negotiate treaties, can no longer be trusted. I am unwilling to throw discredit on our ambassadors, our public ministers, and other representatives sent abroad to hold diplomatic intercourse with mankind. For such would be the effect, and is, perhaps, the intended effect, of these two propositions. They are conceived in a spirit of distrust on the part of the movers, and if adopted would beget a corresponding distrust on the part of other Powers in any negotiation that we might propose to them.

I am unwilling to do anything that will in the slightest degree impair our public credit. We cannot afford to it. It would cost us too much, be entirely too expensive, if there were no other reason. If the favor of Heaven is given to that man who swears to his own hurt, and changes not, the good will of man is equally given to that nation which regards its plighted faith and never departs from it. No nation can survive the disgrace of bad faith. Punica fides was more fatal to Carthage than the battle of Zama. Perfide Albion was a stain upon the escutcheon of England which all the blood of Waterloo could not wash out. A gentleman of great distinction, the late Mr. Choate, used to say that the Democratic party had manifested "a gay and festive defiance" in its treatment of foreign Powers. We paid for it when we became involved in our terrible struggle. How many friends, pray tell me, did we find that we could rely upon for a moment when war sounded upon our shores and we found ourselves upon capital trial? One there was, only one, in the whole family of nations—the Power so often and kindly mentioned in connection with this treaty. But the nations generally, great and small, were against us. We cannot afford to excite foreign hostility by so much as the appearance of unfair dealing. The great element of weakness in the Government of Great Britain is precisely in that direction. She has been an oppressive, tyrannical, domineering Power to the other nations of the earth, and the day which sees her downfall approaching will be a day of general rejoicing the world over. Those that she has trampled upon will rise in their gladness and shout "ha, ha," in the day of her sorrow. Like Babylon, hell from beneath will be moved to meet her at her coming.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether I am to understand and the country is to understand from this line of argument that the reason we had the opposition of France and England during the late rebellion was because we had acted in bad faith toward them? Am I to understand that? Does he wish to convey that idea to the country and to the world? That is a question I want answered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to convey the idea to the gentleman, and, if he please, to the country and the world, that "the gay and festive defiance" of foreign Powers was one among others of the reasons that arrayed those Powers against us with such fearful hostility—less of bad faith than of unbecoming treatment. I do not say it was the only reason, but it was one of them. Although there had been a change of Administration and the Government had passed into other hands, they visited upon the Government as such much that had accumulated under former Administrations and under the influences of a previous day.

Mr. PRICE. And they opposed us for our bad faith toward them?

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not say bad faith. They were opposed to us for what they regarded as our uncivil treatment toward them on various occasions, and seized this opportunity of paying up old debts, of settling old scores.

Mr. PRICE. Does the gentleman mean to say that we had acted in bad faith toward England or any other nation on the face of the globe? I am not prepared to admit that, and I do not think he is.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have already said that in our action upon treaties, the treaty with England for instance, the Jay treaty—and I might specify others—there had been an element disposed to discredit the treaty-making power, to question its exercise, and to throw distrust upon its negotiations. Still, so far as the legislation of Congress has dealt with them, they have been carried into execution. But the gentleman will perceive that he has touched a point hardly fit for discussion here, one that cannot be discussed without a certain feeling of embarrassment. I would approach the nakedness of my country with backward steps and averted face, and cover it sedulously from my own eyes as well as from the gaze of the world. My honorable and excellent friend, I am sure, would do the same.

The Public Expenditures—Purchase of Alaska.

SPEECH OF HON. B. M. BOYER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

June 30, 1868.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867—

Mr. BOYER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is not without considerable reluctance that I have arrived at the conclusion that it is my duty to oppose the appropriation for the purchase of Alaska. But so ungracious at first view may seem such a course, after all that has been done in the matter, that I am not content to record my vote against the pending bill without some words of explanation.

I have heard or read most of what the able and eloquent chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and other advocates of the bill have had to say in its behalf; but I have been little moved by any convictions of the substantial advantages likely to result from the acquisition of the inhospitable country we are invited to annex. The arguments which weighed most with me were those based upon what the treaty-making authorities of our Government had already done, and especially the circumstance of formal delivery of the purchased territory having already been made by Russia to the representatives of this country appointed by the President to receive it. The latter fact derives additional importance when we consider that such possession was permitted to be taken without any resolution of dissent or protest on the part of this House, although in session at the time and aware of the events which were transpiring. Under such circumstances courtesy to a great and friendly Power like Russia would seem to forbid retreat. Indeed, a retreat under such circumstances must be confessed to be somewhat humiliating, and probably will be so regarded by other nations. But there are still higher duties to be performed than those of courtesy, and a still higher ambition to fulfill than to stand well in the judgment of foreigners.

Our own national necessities and the duty of self-preservation being the higher law must determine my action upon this bill. Of all times for extraordinary expenditures of the public money this is the most inopportune and dangerous. The country is already struggling under a load of debt too heavy to be long endured, and it is extremely doubtful whether the next year we shall have the means to discharge its interest and defray the ordinary expenses of the Government. Seven million two hundred thousand dollars in gold, equal to $10,000,000 of our currency, may, to be sure, seem to many an insignificant sum, so accustomed have we become of late to count millions by the thousands instead of by the tens and hundreds. But in the days of Washington and the elder Adams and Jefferson $7,000,000 in gold was a sum more than sufficient to pay all the ordinary annual expenditures of the Government. A nation whose national debt has lately increased $10,000,000 in a single month, and which is threatened with a deficit of $30,000,000 at the end of the next fiscal year, is in no condition to speculate in the purchase of barren wastes of scarcely inhabitable territory.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

The Public Expenditures, &c.—Mr. Boyer.

HO. OF REPS.

This brings me to the single proposition as to whether we have the constitutional right to refuse this appropriation. In support of the affirmative of this question I find the highest authority among the framers of the Constitution, James Madison, and the greatest of American jurists, Chief Justice Marshall. With them I maintain that under the Constitution the President and the Senate may make a treaty, but it is binding upon us only when it is of a nature to be wholly completed by them. When it requires as an essential part of the contract the appropriation of money by the legislative branch of the Government the treaty is not the law of the land until completed by the grant of the appropriation. This position is sustained by reason as well as authority, and the House of Representatives pronounced a legislative construction upon their constitutional power in this regard when, in passing upon the very first foreign treaty ever negotiated by this Government after the adoption of the Constitution, they solemnly resolved, as early as 1796, that—

"It is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

Were it otherwise, the Executive, with the consent of the Senate, might deprive the House of Representatives of all control over this class of public expenditure, whether the treaty stipulated for the payment of seven or seventy million dollars.

But I put my opposition to this appropriation distinctly upon the ground that we cannot afford it. We are upon the verge of national bankruptcy, and if we would avert repudiation and financial ruin retrenchment and reform must become the rule of our action. I propose upon this occasion to review that wasteful and destructive policy which has reduced our country to its present deplorable condition. Professions of economy have been repeated often enough; but the louder the professions of the party in power the more recklessly extravagant has been their management of public affairs.

The seventh resolution contained in the Republican platform of principles adopted at Chicago this year declares that "the Government of the United States should be administered with the strictest economy." In this general proposition all parties must agree. So popular, indeed, is the enunciation of professions of economy by political parties upon the eve of a presidential election that it is sure to be repeated as often as the delegates of either party assemble in national convention. Much more emphatically and elaborately stated was this same doctrine when the Republican party first came into power in 1860. In their national convention at Chicago they then declared as follows:

"That the people justly view with alarm the reckless extravagance which pervades every Department of the Federal Government; that a return to rigid economy and accountability is indispensable to arrest the systematic plunder of the public Treasury by favored partisans, while the startling developments of frauds and corruptions at the Federal metropolis show that an entire change of administration is imperatively demanded."

Such was the doctrine proclaimed by a party which in a single administration of four years spent more public money than it cost to administer the Government from its foundation during seventy-two years of alternate peace and war, and in those four years piled up an accumulated public debt such as no nation in the world ever created in the same space of time.

I shall not pause to inquire how much of our present national debt may be set down to the wasteful extravagance with which the late war was conducted, nor how much of it arose from the plunder of the Government by "loyal" contractors aided by their official confederates. But so shocking to the common understanding had these depredations become, that in the midst of the war one of the Republican leaders of Congress thought it his duty to say publicly in his place in this House that more had been stolen from the public Treasury by "loyal thieves" during one month of Mr. Lincoln's administration than it had cost for the maintenance of the Government during the entire four years of the administration of Mr. Buchanan.

Excuses are sometimes pleaded for these excesses on account of the unavoidable wastefulness of all wars, and the inexperience of our Government in the conduct of a great war which came upon us suddenly when we were unprepared. But what excuses can be invented to justify the continuance of the costly establishments of war in a period of profound peace? Why could not the ordinary expenses of the Government—exclusive of the interest on the public debt—have been brought back, at least in the second year after the restoration of peace, very nearly to the expenses of the Government during the administration of President Buchanan?

There is no answer to this question except that which is based upon the necessities of the so-called reconstruction policy of Congress. That is the consuming moth which is eating up the substance of the people. It is that which has involved the maintenance of a vast standing army in the time of peace, and the creation and support of the Freedmen's Bureau, and the establishment of military governments in ten of the States to enforce the peculiar legislation of Congress over the local State governments, and especially to aid in the unnatural subjection of white majorities to negro domination, an offense alike against the principles of republican government and against the civilization of the age, a usurpation over a people once free, which would be impossible without the employment of force.

These extravagant and barbarous contrivances have brought their logical results in the shape of vast expenditures and enormous and otherwise unnecessary and therefore intolerable taxation. They have produced a disturbance of social order and a general sense of insecurity for capital, labor, and political liberty throughout the southern States.

Not only has the policy pursued by Congress rendered necessary a fearful expenditure of the national wealth for purposes hitherto unknown to our laws, but it has at the same time crippled the national resources and hindered their development and increase. To postpone the complete restoration of any section of the Union to its material prosperity is plainly an injury to the whole country; for thereby the increase of taxable property is prevented and the population of the suffering section are less able to bear their proportion of the national burdens. By persecuting the South the North has afflicted itself. By impoverishing the South the North is made poorer. By trampling upon the constitutional rights of the South the North is preparing the way for its own political enslavement.

Unless the whole system of national legislation be immediately reformed financial disaster, bankruptcy, and repudiation must inevitably overtake us.

The national debt during the month of May (the last month of which, at this date, we have the official report) increased $9,616,959 18, and the coin in the Treasury diminished $16,681,058 69. It is estimated even by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that the balance of receipts over expenditures for the current fiscal year ending June 30, will be only $26,616,392. With a yearly balance like that it would take nearly one hundred years to pay our national debt. The receipts for the year 1867 are officially stated at $490,526,947 49; and upon the best showing which the chairman of the House Committee of Ways and Means could make in what must be conceded to be an able, candid, and statesmanlike speech, he set down the total receipts for 1868 at $405,794,459 29, a falling off in one year of $84,732,488 20.

But the prospect is at present even worse than that. The statistics of the Treasury Department show that while our annual expenses are decreasing very slowly the revenue is diminishing in a much greater proportion; and this is taking place under the operation of the most grinding system of taxation ever endured by any people.

If we compare the expenditures of the three last years and the estimated expenditures of the next with the expenditures of the Government during the four years immediately preceding the war, we shall arrive at the relative cost of Democratic and Republican administrations in time of peace. The public expenditures of each of the four years of President Buchanan's administration were as follows, namely:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853:
Total expenditures, except interest.....$72,291,119 70
Interest on the public debt.....1,652,774 23
Total expenditures.....$73,943,893 93

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859:
Total expenditures, except interest.....$63,327,405 72
Interest on the public debt.....2,637,084 39
Total expenditures.....$65,964,490 11

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1860:
Total expenditures, except interest.....$60,010,112 58
Interest on the public debt.....3,144,620 94
Total expenditures.....$63,154,733 52

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1861:
Total expenditures, except interest.....$62,537,171 62
Interest on the public debt.....4,034,157 36
Total expenditures.....$66,571,328 92

Average annual cost of carrying on the Government during the four years of President Buchanan's administration, $68,159,756.

I shall skip over the period of the four years of the war during which the average annual expenditures of Mr. Lincoln's administration were $1,165,592,164 22, and during which a debt of nearly $3,000,000,000 was created, and come down at once to the years which have elapsed since the return of peace. The public expenditures of the Government for each of the three years of peace since the suppression of the rebellion have been as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866:
Total expenditures, except interest.....$387,683,198 79
Interest on the public debt.....133,057,741 69
Total expenditures.....$520,740,940 48

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867:
Total expenditures, except interest.....$202,947,537 42
Interest on the public debt.....143,781,591 91
Total expenditures.....$346,729,129 33

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, we have as yet the official statements for but three quarters. I shall therefore take for the fourth quarter the estimate of the chairman of the House Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK.] And as his speech upon the tax bill contains a tabular statement of the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, I shall take it entire from the Congressional Globe precisely as it came from

Estimated balance of receipts over expenditures for fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.....$26,616,392 46

There are several striking inferences to be drawn from the foregoing exhibits which I have made:

1. The average annual cost of carrying on the Government during the four years immediately preceding the war of the rebellion, including the interest upon the public debt, was $68,159,756, and, exclusive of the interest, it was $65,291,452, while the average cost of carrying on the Government since the war has been, including interest on the public debt, $415,552,712, and the average annual cost, exclusive of the interest, was $276,796,803.

2. Leaving out the interest on the national debt it costs, on an average, $211,505,350 more each year to carry on the Government in time of peace than it did during the last Democratic Administration. That is to say, it costs considerably more than three times as much, and counting in the interest on the public debt it costs six times as much.

3. The expenditures during the year just ended were greater than the year before by over thirty-two million dollars, ($32,448,937 50.)

4. While the expenditures the last fiscal year were so much greater than the year before, the revenue of the Government was less by nearly eighty-five million dollars, ($84,732,488 20.)

5. The national debt has increased about ten million dollars in the month of May, which is the last month of which we have any official account.

6. In the same month of May the gold interest-bearing debt has increased over fifty millions, ($57,449,550,) and the coin in the Treasury decreased in the same time over sixteen millions. These facts may be seen in the published statement of the Secretary of the Treasury for that month.

Nor is all this the worst. The prospect ahead is still more threatening, as I shall show by the introduction of a few more official figures. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his official estimate of the expenditures for the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1869, sets them down as follows:

For the civil service, including the expenses of foreign intercourse, courts, loans, public domain, and all other expenditures except for pensions, Indian, and War and the Navy Departments $37,860,400 03
For pensions.....30,330,000 00
For Indian department.....3,240,152 86
For Army proper.....51,639,134 20
For Military Academy.....335,012 00
For fortifications, armories, &c.....3,773,084 00
For harbor and river improvements, public buildings, &c.....8,233,769 88
For naval establishment.....47,317,133 95
For miscellaneous objects, including the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.....9,059,000 00
For compensation to the Post Office Department for mail services.....700,000 00
For civilization of Indians.....10,000 00
For arming and equipping the militia.....200,000 00
For bounties, per acts of July 26 and 28, 1866.....25,500,000 00
For interest on the public debt.....123,678,078 50
For the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, but payable out of unexpended appropriations on account of War, Navy, civil service, &c.....24,609,184 58
Total estimated expenditures.....$372,000,000 00

Supposing the revenue of the Government from all sources for the next year will be the same as the last, we should have $405,794,459 29 to meet these expenditures, which would leave a surplus over expenditures of nearly thirty-four million dollars. But certain sources of internal revenue have been cut off by the repealing acts of Congress, such as the tax on raw cotton, and certain taxes on manufactured articles. From this cause the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives has estimated there will be a falling off of $68,769,000 from the receipts of internal revenue, which last year were $190,000,000. His language is as follows:

"The revenue, therefore, from internal taxes for the next fiscal year, assuming all other matters in respect to taxes and administration in this branch of the revenue service to remain unchanged, must necessarily be predicated on the basis of the aggregate receipts of the current fiscal year, less the amount of taxes abated or repealed during the present session of Congress, or $190,000,000—$68,769,000—$121,231,000."

If, then, there should be this anticipated falling off of internal revenue without a corresponding increase in some other direction it is plain that the end of the next fiscal year will probably disclose a deficiency of nearly thirty-five millions of income below expenditures—a most discouraging contemplation for a tax-ridden people, and if realized, a most disastrous blow to the national credit at home and abroad.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means anticipates, to be sure, an increase of revenue under the operation of the new tax bill, if adopted. That anticipation, however, was chiefly based upon a radical reform proposed by him in the organization of the internal revenue department, a proposition rejected by the House. Under the present system, as I shall proceed to show, there can be no well-founded hope of essential improvement.

REVENUE FRAUDS.

The revenues are not honestly collected, and under the operation of the present system the business has been constantly advancing from bad to worse. Illicit manufactures and contraband merchandise everywhere abound. The people pay the price, including the supposed tax added on. But the superadded amount for the tax, which ought to have been paid to the Government, goes into the pockets of the ring. As during the war, enormous fortunes are still made by cheating the Government, and the thieves generally escape. The laws seem to have been made for their protection. It is estimated that about one hundred million gallons of whisky is manufactured in the country, counting all that is produced by the distilleries, great and small, engaged in the business. If so, the tax of two dollars a gallon ought to have realized to the Government a yearly revenue of $200,000,000. Instead of that the highest revenue from that source has been $30,000,000, and it has now dwindled down to $13,000,000 for the last year.

EFFECT OF THE CIVIL-TENURE ACT.

Under the operation of the civil-tenure act, which was invented by the party in power to baffle the Executive and keep their friends in office at any sacrifice, it is not possible for the President to protect the public from the depredations of dishonest officials. The power has been taken from the President, and there is no longer any responsibility anywhere.

Every practical man must recognize the frequent necessity of prompt removals from office, and especially in regard to those officers which are connected with the management and collection of the public revenues. As the law now stands, the President, who ought to be the responsible head, has been stripped of all authority to remove until the Senate have first deliberated and given their consent. He cannot even suspend except in the recess of the Senate, and even then he must furnish reasons satisfactory to the Senate at its next session or the deposed official will again be reinstated. The effect is to make the appointees of the Executive, when once in office, independent of the appointing power. The President is thus converted into a mere prosecuting officer and may be defied, baffled, and delayed until the time for efficient action has passed. During the pendency of such a controversy under the civil-tenure act before the Senate, a Cabinet officer is said to have written, upon a certain occasion, to the thieving official, begging him to consider his conscience and in the mean time steal as little as possible! The greater the office and the extent of its control over the public interests the more powerful is the dishonest incumbent in his means of defense and in the number and influence of his confederate friends and allies.

Suppose the President, acting upon reliable information, attempts to remove the collector of customs at one of the great ports or a collector of internal revenue in one of the principal cities where the tax upon whisky alone may amount to millions. Immediately upon the receipt of the telegram which brings the news the imperiled collector and his whole force of hireling dependents and confederate contraband traders, illicit manufacturers, and vendors who compose the ring are astir. As soon as steam can carry them to Washington the advance guard of these worthies appears at the Capitol to fight the Government with its own money. They lie in wait in the ante-chambers of the Senate. They button-hole Senators in the streets and capture them at their hotels and boarding-houses. They are not in want of help from men and women, too, of better looks and more alluring manners than their own. They bear with them also appointments to inspectorships and clerkships, if need be, for family friends of obliging Senators. They come armed with longlists of respectable signatures, such as may anywhere be cheaply got for the asking merely by any gentlemanly knave who lives in style and spends his money freely; certificates of leading merchants, lawyers, and divines.

By the same influences the new man appointed to the place is assailed from every point. Here, too, comes in the complication of outside rival claimants for the office. The President naturally prefers his own political friends for appointment. But the Senate, on that very account, refuses to confirm them, and regardless of mental or moral qualifications rejects them one after another. To get the office, therefore, it becomes necessary for the applicant to convince the President that he is his friend, and the Senate must be convinced that he is secretly the President's enemy. If he gets both the appointment and the confirmation it is because he has succeeded in persuad-ding the President that he will cheat the Senate, and he must have been equally successful in persuading the Senate that he means to cheat the President. Through such a gauntlet it is a rare miracle by which an upright man arrives at an office. The most artful sneak has always the best chance. What wonder, then, that the public is betrayed, and the Treasury plundered, and the laws evaded, and the public debt unpaid, and the people taxed in vain?

REPUBLICAN TESTIMONY RELATIVE TO REVENUE LAWS.

I could not better enforce this view of the virtual surrender of our public revenue to the manipulation of thieves than by quoting from the Congressional Globe the report of a recent debate in this House upon the tax bill, then under discussion. Mr. SCHENCK (chairman of the Ways and Means Committee) said:

"I would not give a sixpence for all laws, if you are to go on collecting the revenue with the President, Secretary of the Treasury, the Commissioner, and the Senate all to be consulted, and in the mean time nothing to be done except stealing—I steal; you steal; they steal; we all steal!" Such seems to be the conjugation of the verb with which we are engaged at this time.

Mr. PILE, (Republican.) I think instead of one fifth being in the hands of thieves that precisely the reverse is the truth—that one fifth, perhaps, are honest men, and four fifths are thieves.

Mr. RANDALL, (Democrat.) Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a mathematical question?

Mr. PILE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. About seven eighths are Republicans; and I wish to know how many thieves belong to the Republican and how many to the Democratic party?

Mr. PILE. I hope we shall be able to keep the question of politics out of this bill."

NATIONAL DISCREDIT.

Look now at the low estate to which the national credit has been brought even at home by the profligacy, mismanagement, and plunder of the party in power. Government paper in Russia is at twelve per cent. discount; in Italy it is fifteen per cent. below par; in Turkey it is at twenty per cent. depreciation; but worse than all these, and below even the Turk in financial reputation, a gold dollar commands in our market a premium of forty per cent. in the currency of our own Government.

AMERICAN AND BRITISH TAXATION COMPARED.

Yet in the struggle to pay the current expenses of our Government, and but little more than the bare interest of our public debt, we are the hardest taxed people on earth. There was a time when the taxes of England were a by-word and a scorn among our people; and when each year the anniversary of our Declaration of Independence came round the poor, down-trodden, tax-ridden subjects of Great Britain were the theme of much compassionate eloquence and self-congratulation in our Fourth of July orations. The taxes of England conveniently illustrated the costly extravagance of royal pageantry and the grinding weight of aristocratic institutions, from which our own proud, free, and prosperous Republic was so happily exempt. Such was our country. But, alas, time changed the picture! How humiliating the confession that while the English taxes amount to $10 92 per capita the taxes of the United States are sixteen dollars per capita. Even under the despotism of Napoleon III the French are taxed but $7 97 per capita.

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF AMERICAN AND BRITISH EXPENDITURES.

Let us compare the cost of maintaining the British Government with the expenditures of our own for a single year. I shall take the year 1867, which is the last year of whose expenditures we have as yet any full official statement. According to the official report of the English Chancellor of the Exchequer the civil service of Great Britain for 1867 cost $41,098 95, while it cost in the United States, exclusive of pensions, for the same year, $51,110,027. The army of Great Britain numbers two hundred and thirteen thousand men, and cost in 1867 $74,383,946. In this is included pensions, which are not embraced in our expenditures under the head of the War Department, and is included every other item of military expense. In the same year our own Army, set down at seventy thousand men, cost (exclusive of bounties) and for ordinary expenses merely, $83,841,555! being $9,457,609 more than it cost Great Britain to maintain an army three times as large. If we add military bounties to our expenditures, and deduct the pension list from theirs, which would be the fairest way of stating the case, the difference would be far greater, as will presently appear from the comparative table which I shall present.

The English national debt, the accumulation of centuries, is larger than ours, but its annual cost in interest is much less.

The navy of England costs more than ours, but it is much larger in numerical force. The British navy, having one hundred and twenty ships on squadron duty, and counting its coast guard and marine force, numbers sixty-seven thousand one hundred and twenty men; ours numbers but eleven thousand nine hundred men.

The following comparative statement of some of the expenditures of the United States and Great Britain, compiled from the official reports of both countries, will show the state of the case, the English pound sterling being reduced to Federal money:

	United States.	Great Britain.
Interest on debt.....	$143,781,591 91	$128,807,270
Civil service.....	51,110,027 27	41,098,995
War Department.....
Army proper.....	$83,841,558 80
Pensions.....	20,936,551 71
Bounties.....	11,382,359 83
Navy.....	116,160,967 34	74,383,946
Add Indian expenses, for which there is no corresponding item in the British budget.....	31,034,011 04	53,912,513
	4,642,531 77
Total expenditures of the United States for the year.....	$346,723,129 33
Add to the other side the remaining items of British expenditure, for which there are no corresponding items in ours, namely: the consolidated fund, the revenue department, and packet service.....		37,101,504
Total expenditures of Great Britain for the year.....		$385,308,418
Expenditures of the United States for one year in excess of the expenditures of Great Britain for the same year, both nations being at peace.....	$11,425,711 33

From this it is seen that American republicanism in the management of the Radical party is more profligate than British royalty, with all its courtly pomp and aristocratic appointments, its palaces, and its long lists of titled and official pensioners. Such was not the Government of our fathers.

EXTRAVAGANCE PERVADES ALL THE DEPARTMENTS.

If we analyze the expenditures of the Government in detail we shall find that their enormous increase is not confined to any one or two departments of the Government, but pervades them all. Since the 30th of June, 1865, the expenditures of the Army and Navy have averaged over $200,000,000 for each and every year. But the expenses of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government which are grouped in the accounts under the head of the civil list, for example, cost in 1860, $6,077,008 35; but in 1867 the same civil list cost $15,585,489 55. The whole expenses of the Government which do not come under the heads of the War or Navy Departments, and do not include either pensions, bounties, or Indians, or interest, in 1860 cost $27,931,336 17; while the expenditures for the same purposes in 1867 amounted to $51,110,027 07.

RECONSTRUCTION AT THE SOUTH.

But the two greatest drains upon the public purse are those expensive and arbitrary establishments which have been created for the subjugation of the southern States to the continued domination of the Republican party, and the perpetuation of that party in political power in the country by the aid of the negro vote. These establishments are the five military governments at the South and the Freedmen's Bureau.

I shall not upon this occasion dwell upon the violation of public and private rights which these institutions involve. My object now is to investigate their pecuniary cost.

MILITARY GOVERNMENTS OF THE SOUTH.

Ever since the surrender of the rebel forces in 1865, the southern people have in good faith kept the peace. Not an armed hand is there uplifted against the laws, yet an army of some sixteen thousand five hundred men, equipped, fed, paid, officered, and maintained at the national expense, is even now distributed throughout Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Texas, and Florida, and during three years of profound peace quartered upon those States. They are there not to repress insurrection, for none exists. They are there not to uphold civil government, but to subvert it. They are there to enforce military despotism, to sustain usurpation, to guard the Freedmen's Bureau, and to help ignorant negroes, led by carpet-bag adventurers, to make governments and rulers for the intelligent white people of that unfortunate section of our country.

Every dollar spent to maintain that army is a dollar uselessly and wickedly wasted.

DETAILED STATEMENT OF THE TROOPS IN THE FIVE MILITARY DISTRICTS OF THE SOUTH.

There are stationed in the five military districts of the South, at this time, the following troops: In the first district, comprising the State of Virginia, there are one company of cavalry, four companies of artillery, and twenty-seven companies of infantry. In the second district, comprising the States of North and South Carolina, there are four companies of cavalry, three companies of artillery, and twenty-eight companies of infantry. In the third district, comprising the States of Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, there are two companies of cavalry, two companies of artillery, and forty-four companies of infantry. In the fourth district, comprising the States of Mississippi and Arkansas, there are two companies of artillery and forty-two companies of infantry. In the fifth district, comprising the States of Louisiana and Texas, there are twelve companies of cavalry and ninety-two companies of infantry. Making a total in the five districts of nineteen companies of cavalry, eleven companies of artillery, and two hundred and thirty-three companies of infantry.

The infantry companies have been reduced to about sixty men each, but the cavalry and artillery companies retain about their ordinary complements of men. All the companies together compose at this date a force of about sixteen thousand five hundred enlisted men. The yearly pay, subsistence, clothing, fuel, medical supplies, quarters, and transportation of the officers and men composing this force is at least $16,500,000, or at the rate of $1,000 per man, which is not equal in proportion to the actual cost per man estimated from the aggregate cost of the whole Army, as appears from the official reports of the Secretary of War.

ADDITIONAL EXPENSES.

There have been since March, 1867, four distinct appropriations by Congress of money to pay the expenses of organization of the so-called civil governments of the different States under the military reconstruction acts of Congress, amounting in the aggregate to $2,224,701 55. But these appropriations were not nearly equal to the amounts called for by the different district commanders, and the last appropriation was drawn from the Treasury on the 8th of June, the very day the certified act of Congress appropriating the money reached the Treasury Department. The money has, therefore, been already absorbed under pressing need, and the cost is still going on. A deficiency bill of several millions to defray the additional expenses will be brought in at the next session of Congress, after the presidential election.

The actual direct outlay of money by the Government in maintaining its military establishments at the South in the interest of the Republican party may be set down as certainly over twenty million dollars a year.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Next to the southern army in cost, and a potent auxiliary of Radical reconstruction, is the Freedmen's Bureau. This has become a gigantic political machine. It was first organized under the act of Congress of March 3, 1865, and although limited by the terms of the original act to one year after the close of the rebellion, it has been continued ever since. There is nowhere to be found a full, fair, and precise account of what has been expended to sustain and extend it. Important omissions, underestimates, or a blending of periods of time in the statements of different classes of expenditures, characterize and confuse the fragmentary statistics which have thus far been furnished upon the subject. Enough, however, can be gathered from official figures which have escaped concealment to form a general estimate of that vast expenditure which in all its details will never be fully known or set down among the statistics of the Government.

It is true that Congress has as yet made but two direct appropriations of money for the support of the Freedmen's Bureau, amounting together to $10,780,750. But the first of these appropriations was not made till July 13, 1866, when the bureau had already been in operation on a large scale for more than a year, and no money upon either of the appropriations was actually drawn from the Treasury until August, 1867, considerably more than two years after the expenditures of the bureau began. The explanation is this: by the provisions of the act which organized the bureau in March, 1865, it was invested with authority to seize and appropriate for its use the abandoned lands in the insurrectionary States and those to which the United States had acquired title by confiscation or sale. It also appropriated funds from various other sources of revenue, as, for example, fines, taxes, retained bounties, &c.

The bureau had been practically in existence long before its organization in March, 1865, under the name of the Department of Negro Affairs, and had property and funds on hand which were transferred to the bureau. But the bulk of its means were supplied from another quarter. The most important part of the Freedmen's Bureau act, touching its resources, is that part which authorizes the Secretary of War to issue for the use of the bureau unlimited supplies of provisions, clothing, and fuel, subject only to such rules and regulations as he might himself direct. These supplies were accordingly furnished in lavish profusion.

SUPPLIES OF FOOD.

During twelve months from June, 1865, to May, 1866, the number of rations accounted for as having been issued by the War Department for the use of the bureau were as follows:

1865.
June.....	349,808
July.....	363,380
August.....	902,581
September.....	1,450,643
October.....	810,029
November.....	698,129
December.....	670,844
1866.
January.....	720,415
February.....	988,006
March.....	1,029,112
April.....	908,892
May.....	1,145,878
Total in twelve months.....	10,042,719

At twenty-five cents a ration, which is the cost as stated in the official estimates of General Howard, the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, the money value of the rations distributed from the subsistence department of the Army upon requisitions of the bureau in one year was $2,500,879 75. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, Congress appropriated for this purpose alone the sum of $3,106,250.

SUPPLIES OF CLOTHING.

But the bureau has clothed the freedmen as well as fed them. I have not been able to obtain any exact account of the clothing issued from the quartermaster's department upon the requisitions of the bureau in any one year, and of course not of those supplies which were issued without any requisition at all. But the amount in the aggregate must have been very large, as, according to Army estimates, it costs in general more to clothe than to feed a body of men supported by the Government.

In the report of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau of November 30, 1866, he says, "The value of quartermaster's property, including clothing, camp, and garrison equipage received by the bureau previous to April 1, 1866, was $525,035 34." This valuation was probably at the low standard of Government sales, and does not include the large distribution in the department of negro affairs before the bureau was organized. Some idea of the supplies actually furnished by the War Department under this head may be formed from the fact that the Commissioner of the bureau in his first annual report (to be found in House Executive Document No. 11, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress) estimates the supplies of clothing needed by the bureau for distribution during the year 1866 at $1,760,000, and the commissary stores for the same year at $4,106,250.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS IN THE PAY OF THE UNITED STATES EMPLOYED IN THE SERVICE OF THE BUREAU.

From the official statement of the Commissioner of the bureau, made in answer to House resolution of May 28, 1866, it appeared there were three hundred and sixty-eight commissioned officers paid by the United States, and employed wholly in the Freedmen's Bureau, namely:

1 major general, at.....	$445 00 per month,	$445 00
7 brigadier generals, at.....	299 50 per month,	1,997 50
9 colonels, at.....	194 00 per month,	1,746 00
7 lieutenant colonels, at.....	170 00 per month,	1,190 00
20 majors, at.....	151 00 per month,	4,379 00
157 captains, at.....	118 50 per month,	18,594 00
158 lieutenants, average, at.....	106 00 per month,	16,748 00
368 officers, pay per month.....		$45,099 50

This gives a total yearly amount paid by the Government to officers serving in the bureau of $541,194; nor are these the only commissioned officers paid by the Government to serve the Freedmen's Bureau.

ARMY SURGEONS IN THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

In the report of Surgeon Caleb W. Horner, the medical head of the bureau, dated October 31, 1865, upon the medical department of the bureau, he says:

"In pursuance of the plan of organization determined upon application was made to the Surgeon General for the detail to the bureau of the following surgeons and assistant surgeons of volunteers who were assigned to duty in various districts, the ranking officer serving on the staff of the assistant commissioner as surgeon-in-chief."

Then follows a list of fourteen surgeons and three assistant surgeons.

From a tabular statement in the same official report we learn that the number of commissioned medical officers on duty in the service of the Freedmen's Bureau and paid by the United States from October 1, 1866, to June 30, 1867, was twenty-three, besides the one hundred and fifty-five contract physicians paid by the bureau.

HOSPITALS AND HOSPITAL EMPLOYÉS.

I take from the late report of Mr. Eliot, chairman of the House Committee on Freedmen's Affairs—a report abounding in underestimates and important omissions—the following summary relating to hospitals supported by the bureau:

Greatest number of hospitals existing at any one time, (latter part of 1866 and early part of 1867.....)	48
Number in operation at present, (February 1, 1868).....	25
Number discontinued during year ending December 31, 1867.....	28
Largest number of medical officers at a given time, (September 1866).....	118
Number employed at present, (February 1, 1868).....	84
Greatest number of hospital attendants, stewards, nurses, cooks, matrons, &c., at a given time, (May, 1867).....	430
Number of attendants at present employed, (February 1, 1868).....	317

CIVIL EMPLOYÉS OF THE BUREAU.

I am tempted here to insert the complete list of agents, clerks, surgeons, and messengers now employed in the service of the bureau, with their salaries, as one means of conveying some adequate idea of the vast proportions and cost of this part of the machinery of the Freedmen's Bureau. The following list may be found in the last United States Official Register compiled under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and just published. The statistics it contains are brought up to September 30, 1867, and does not include the hospital attendants, nor the superintendents and teachers of schools:

Seven hundred and seventeen.....$815,731 94

This gives a total expenditure for salaries to the seven hundred and seventeen individuals named in the foregoing list of $815,731 94.

SCHOOLS.

The bureau has established and sustained on a grand and costly scale a system of schools for the freedmen throughout the limits of its jurisdiction.

The following statement is taken from the Fifth Semi-annual Report on Schools for the Freedmen, by J. W. Alvord, General Superintendent, dated January 1, 1868:

"Grand total: schools of all kinds, 3,084; teachers, 6,492; pupils, 189,517.

"It will be seen from the above table that there are regularly reported 1,486 day or night schools, with 1,744 teachers, and 81,873 pupils; 772 Sabbath-schools, with 2,105 teachers, and 57,177 pupils; and 39 industrial schools, with 1,603 pupils.

"Twenty-five of the above are high or normal schools.

"There are also 'within the knowledge of the superintendents, but not regularly reported,' 389 day or night schools, with 458 teachers, and 18,589 pupils; and 283 Sabbath-schools, with 2,185 teachers, and 30,270 pupils. Schools of all kinds, 3,084; teachers, 6,492; pupils, 189,517."

Of the whole number of schools the superintendent reports only one thousand as sustained either in whole or in part by the freedmen themselves.

The superintendent states the expenditures of the bureau in this department for the last six months as follows:

"This bureau has expended for rents, repairs, and construction of school buildings during the last six months, $361,205 48; and for other educational purposes during the same period, $97,201 87; making a total of $458,407 15.

"This amount includes the $67,208 48, as reported by State superintendents.

"The whole amount expended for the support of the above schools by all parties during the last half year has been $571,446 11.

Congress directly appropriated in 1866 and 1867 $1,046,000 to the support of these schools. Large sums are raised in addition by local taxes. But the bureau has not been particular from what source the funds were derived, and in case of need the Army funds, as usual, afford the never-failing resource, as the following extract from the report of General Fullerton, then assistant commissioner of the freedmen's bureau in Louisiana, will show:

"In Louisiana there are one hundred and forty-one schools for freedmen, and attending them are nineteen thousand scholars. These schools have been supported in whole by funds of the bureau. There are employed twelve directors, at a joint salary of $1,225 per month; three special agents, at a joint salary of $300 per month; five clerks, at a joint salary of $470 per month; twenty principals, at a joint salary of $1,350 per month; twenty-eight first assistants, at a joint salary of $2,080 per month; thirty second assistants, at a joint salary of $2,070 per month; eighty-nine primary teachers, at a joint salary of $5,340 per month; city superintendents of New Orleans, at a joint salary of $150 per month; one acting assistant superintendent, at a salary of $100 per month; added to the above are two members of the board of examination, who received five dollars per day while on duty, and eight janitors, who receive, each, from ten to twenty-five dollars per month. There are also several officers connected with the schools who draw salaries as officers in the military service. The cost of conducting these schools is now between seventeen and twenty thousand dollars per month."

In order, though, to support the schools, which were at once inaugurated, there was advanced by the quartermaster's department from the 1st day of May, 1864, to the 30th day of September, 1865, $237,699 20; of this sum, $158,229 70 were funds raised by an assessment on the corps d'Afrique, cotton crops, &c., and $79,469 50 were quartermaster's funds proper."

A school tax was assessed, and the assistant commissioner says further on:

"Forty-two thousand dollars of this tax had been collected, but none of this sum was set aside for the purpose of reimbursing the Government for advances made through the quartermaster's department. It was all paid out for freedmen's schools and other bureau accounts."—See House Executive Document No. 70, first session, Thirty-Ninth Congress.

TRANSPORTATION.

The transportation of freedmen and refugees and the stores belonging to the bureau, and of the large army of officers, soldiers, agents, clerks, teachers, and other employes in its service, all of which are moved about from place to place at the public expense, constitutes another heavy item of expense to the Government.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, Congress appropriated, by act of March 2, 1867, for this purpose alone $800,000; and the previous year, by act of July 13, 1866, Congress appropriated for this purpose $1,320,000; making for transportation alone in two years the sum of $2,120,000.

RESUMÉ.

From the statistics already furnished it is readily perceived that the yearly cost of so vast an establishment as that of the Freedmen's Bureau must be very great. But no precise amount will ever, nor probably can ever be made out.

The only official estimate of the probable expenses for any one year approximating to any honest result is the estimate made by General Howard, the Commissioner of the Bureau, for the fiscal year from January 1, 1866, to January 1, 1867. His words and figures are as follows:

"It is estimated that the amount required for the expenditures of the bureau for the fiscal year commencing January, 1866, will be $1,745,050. This sum is requisite for the following purposes:

Salaries of assistant and sub-assistant commissioners.....	$147,500
Salaries of clerks.....	82,800
Stationery and printing.....	63,000
Quarters and fuel.....	15,900
Clothing for distribution.....	1,750,000
Commissary stores.....	4,106,250
Medical department.....	500,000
Transportation.....	1,980,000
School superintendents.....	21,000
Sites for school houses and asylums.....	3,000,000
Telegraphing.....	18,000

This estimate is, in some particulars, much under the actual cost, as appears from the statistics already stated. As, for example, in the item of salaries the estimate amounting to but $280,300, and the actual amount paid in one year being $815,731 94, without including the large item of pay for school teachers, hospital attendants, and the army officers paid by the Government.

But, as before stated, no accurate statement can be made of the actual cost to the nation of the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau. The appropriations made by Congress afford but a small proportion of the necessary data. The War Department has ever been the unfailing source of all needful supplies for the bureau outside of direct appropriations of money by law, and the supplies so furnished being blended with the accounts of the Army elude calculation.

The Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau says in his report of December, 1865:

"From section two of the law establishing the bureau, specific authority is derived for issuing certain quartermaster's stores, such as clothing and fuel, for the destitute. These were furnished upon my requisition by the orders of the Secretary of War."

"During the war many officers of the quartermaster's department were detached as superintendents of freedmen, accounting through their chief to the Quartermaster General. These officers were, many of them, transferred to me with the public property they had on hand."

The second Freedmen's Bureau act of July 16, 1866, to continue in force the Freedmen's Bureau and passed over the President's veto continued the authority to the War Department to assign military officers and enlisted men to the service of the bureau, and authorizes the Secretary of War to issue "such medical stores and other supplies and transportation, and afford such medical or other aid as may be needful," &c. Under this authority what supplies besides those purchased out of specific appropriations went to the Freedmen's Bureau out of the Army stores of the United States, and were purposely and inextricably blended with the expenditures for Army purposes, probably not even the private memoranda of Edwin M. Stanton would disclose. But, although not charged to the bureau nor credited to the Government in the accounts of the bureau, they went to swell the sum total charged to the people for the maintenance of a great war establishment in a period of profound peace. If all could be ascertained, it would probably be discovered that the Freedmen's Bureau had been maintained at an annual cost to the nation of considerably over twelve million dollars.

BUREAU TO BE CONTINUED.

Congress has lately passed a bill to continue its existence. Whether it is to become a fixed establishment will probably depend upon the result of the next presidential election. But upon that election it is designed in at least ten States to exercise a controlling influence. Its ample treasury and its thousands of hired agents will doubtless be used to obtain the outward appearance of a sanction by the southern people of their own degradation at the polls. Disfranchisement, coercion, and fraud still needed the machinery of the Freedmen's Bureau to make them effectual. Whether, with this potent instrumentality negro rule can be perpetuated in the United States for the advantage of the Republican party will depend upon the recuperative energies, patriotism, and common sense of the American people, North as well as South.

FUNDS ACCUMULATED AND ON HAND.

Mr. ELIOT, the chairman of the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, in his late report already referred to, states the balance of unexpended funds in the possession of the bureau, January 1, 1868, as $7,071,925 05, under the following heads, namely:

Balance on hand, refugees and freedmen's fund.....	$61,601 39
Balance appropriation fund.....	6,332,835 61
Balance retained bounty fund.....	35,107 48
Balance school fund.....	7,118 71
Balance pay, bounty, and prize-money fund.....	585,201 86

Total balance on hand January 1, 1868, $7,071,925 07

From this it appears that notwithstanding the enormous cost of the various establishments connected with the Freedmen's Bureau, its operators have contrived so to use its resources during the administration of the War Department by Edwin M. Stanton as to be enabled to
